worth and would not rebut anything that was said in this case at all. * * * Now let me ask what would be thought if your honor is asked to give that instruction, that this book is only worth that much and that he paid that much taxes, and they must presume therefrom that he didn't have any other property, must not presume that, and if that instruction was given then I think it would have to be given under those circumstances. What value would this evidence be then? How can the jury then go into a speculation, into a speculative field as to whether he had anything else? The Court: Well, it would merely show that Ben Getzoff had in Los Angeles property that was assessed to him originally. [Deputy District Attorney:] That is all. [Counsel for appellant:] It constitutes no proof that he had no more. The Court: No, it doesn't constitute proof that he had no more. It constitutes proof of that one thing. [Counsel for appellant:] That would be admitted by us that he had that property and that he was assessed for it, and if the court is going to give an instruction to the effect that it is proof of that and nothing else, I do not think it would do so much harm under the court's instruction, under the proper instruction. [Deputy District Attorney:] All right. The Court: All right; call in the jury. [Counsel for appellant:] We do not, however, waive our objection. The Court: All right." The evidence would have been utterly harmless if the instruction mentioned had been given, as all present at the trial seem to have conceded, but it was not given. We think it was not incumbent upon the trial judge to give the instruction without a specific request for it, and it is clear to us that it should have been asked by appellants if, at the end of the trial, they still thought it necessary to their protection. The evidence was directed at appellant Keyes, and, if it had any appreciable effect, it was he who was injured by it. Under such circumstances, it is clear to us that he should have reminded the court to give the instruction at the conclusion of the long and arduous trial which occurred. We think the objection to the evidence was waived at least, even though the counsel stated that they did not waive it.

[6] Jacob Berman, who was one of the defendants named in the indictment, had made a statement concerning the facts of the case, and what he said was taken in shorthand and afterward transcribed. The statement was made in the presence of one who later became, or who then already was, a special prosecutor—and some question is raised as to this point—to conduct the instant case, and also in the presence of others, including two members of the grand jury. Berman was a witness for the prosecution, and, after his direct examination, during which the statement in question was not used, appellants demanded an inspection of the paper, the existence of which they ascertained on cross-examination. The prosecution refused to deliver it up, and the trial judge refused to require its delivery. Appellants insist that this latter refusal was error. Appellants brought out the fact on the cross-examination of Berman that he had never signed the statement, and they do not in their brief refer to any place in the record which shows that he had ever seen it. A decision of the Supreme Court clearly disposes of the point now presented. We quote from the opinion, which was rendered in a murder case:

"The bell boy, O'Connor, testified that he was an eyewitness to a part, at least, of the homicide, and related the circumstances. On cross-examination it was disclosed that immediately after the homicide he was taken to the police headquarters, and there made a statement to Capt. Seymour, which was taken down at the time. The defense then demanded that the district attorney produce the statement referred to by the witness, whereupon the district attorney admitted that he had such a statement in typewriting, but refused to produce it. Application was then made to the court for an order requiring its production, but the court refused to make the order. The statement could not have been used in evidence, except for the purpose of impeaching the witness by showing thereby that he had made statements out of court inconsistent with the testimony given by him on the trial. Code Civ. Proc., section 2052. The only statements that can be used for that purpose, if in writing, are statements made by the witness himself, either directly in his handwriting or over his signature, or indirectly by his adoption of, or admission of, the correctness of a written report of his statements made by some other person. He cannot be held responsible for a statement taken down by another purporting to be a report of his oral declarations, unless he has been made acquainted with the contents of such statement, and directly or indirectly admitted that it was correct. Inquiry as to the admissibility of such statements and as to the necessity of ordering their production is addressed to the court. Unless it is shown that there is good reason to believe that the document, when produced, would be admissible in evidence for some purpose in the case, the court need not compel its production. Ex parte Clarke, 126 Cal. 235, 58 P. 546, 46 L. R. A. 835, 77 Am. St. Rep. 176. There was testimony with relation to this statement from which the court could rightly conclude that the oral statements of the witness to Capt. Seymour were taken down in shorthand, by a stenographer, and afterwards written out in longhand, and that the document in the possession of the district attorney, and which he refused to produce, was the longhand typewritten copy of the shorthand notes. There was nothing to show that the witness had ever read the statement or seen it, or that he was aware of its contents. This being the case, the statement could not be used for purposes of impeachment, as a statement made by the witness, and it was not error to refuse to compel its production." People v. Glaze, 139 Cal. 154, 72 P. 965, 966.

It is evident that it was not error here for the trial judge to refuse to compel the production of the alleged statement of Berman. It is contended by respondent that the statement was privileged under the provisions of subdivision 5 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that for that reason a production of it could not be required. We find it unnecessary to decide this point, but, in view of the fact that the question may become of interest elsewhere, we refer to Sloane v. Hammond, 81 Cal. App. 590, 254 P. 648, as having a possible bearing upon it.

The witness Berman answered many questions inquiring for the circumstances leading to his presence on the stand as a witness for the prosecution. The appellants addressed five other questions to him, and an objection to each of them was sustained. It is insisted that the trial judge erred in each of these rulings.

[7] This was the first of the five questions: "And you felt that if you did make a statement to the proper authorities, that that would redound to your own benefit and be for your own good, did you not?" One of the objections to this question was that it had already been asked and answered, and the objection was sustained on that ground. Appellants do not show us that it had not been asked and answered. There was, therefore, no error in the ruling.

[8] This was the second question: "Now, in the Julian case, did you authorize your attorney, Mr. Donnelly of New York, to agree with the district attorney that if he would permit you to plead guilty to the first count of that indictment which charged conspiracy to obtain money by false pretenses, and dismiss the other counts, that you would testify for the prosecution, provided they would not object to a term of imprisonment in the penitentiary being made as short as it could be made or as the authorities could be induced to make it?" This question was in effect answered by Berman at a later place in the record. The question also called for a privileged communication between client and attorney. Jones, Evidence, § 750. There was here no error.

The third and fourth questions also called for privileged communications, and were therefore objectionable.

[9] This was the fifth question: "At the time you made the statement did you really expect to be tried on that charge?" The statement here referred to, as we learn from respondent's brief, was one made by Berman in the presence of his counsel and a deputy district attorney. The nature of the statement is not shown by appellants in their brief, nor do they even show to whom it was made. So far as we may gather from appellants' brief, then, the question asked is unintelligible. Quite naturally, there is nothing in respondent's brief to show that it was proper. If the question was a proper one, appellants have succeeded admirably in concealing the fact from us. We are therefore safe in saying that there was no error here.

The following matter comprises one of the divisions of the brief of appellant Keyes:

"During the cross-examination of Mr. Berman and for the purpose of showing the effort of Mr. Keyes to apprehend him, the following questions were asked:

"Q. And you left rather suddenly, did you not, on May 2nd? Q. Did you during that period (while he was away from May to September, 1927) ascertain that the district attorney and the authorities of Los Angeles county were looking for you in connection with the Julian matters? Q. What parts of the world did you visit during that period? Q. Well, the fact is, Mr. Bennett, is it not, that while you were in Europe you were dodging the law? Q. You were doing everything you could while in Europe, and during the time you were in this country during that period, were you not, to avoid arrest? Q. You ascertained at the same time (while in Europe) did you not, that the district attorney of Los Angeles county had detectives all over Europe who were following you and trying to capture you? Q. During that period (after he returned to New York from Europe) you were doing everything in your power to avoid arrest and detection on indictment number 30741, were you not? Q. Were you in hiding at that time?" The prosecution's objections to all of these questions were sustained by the court."

[10] This portion of the brief is headed, "Errors in connection with rulings during the cross-examination of Mr. Berman to questions which sought to show his flight," but with heading and text together we are unable to determine what questions of law counsel seek to present. There is neither argument nor citation of authority. In addition to these omissions, some of the questions included in the text of the brief are unintelligible, standing as they do. There is a failure to show us that there was error in sustaining the objection to any of these questions. We therefore say there was none.

[11] A claim is made by appellants that the prosecutors were guilty of misconduct. A deputy district attorney was called to the witness stand for the purpose of testifying to a certain conversation between himself and appellant Keyes. The witness was asked on cross-examination: "That accusation was the accusation provided for the purpose of removing officials charged with certain criminal matters?" The question was answered in the affirmative, and it was followed by another: "The indictment referred to for the purpose of identification was the indictment charging Mr. Keyes with the crime of bribery, a substantive offense?" This question was also answered affirmatively. It is contended that the asking of the two questions was misconduct, on the ground, as it is asserted, that the jury was informed by them that appellant Keyes had been made the respondent under an accusation for his removal from office, and had been indicted for an offense different from that under which he was being tried. Immediately preceding the two questions, the witness had been asked, for the purpose of fixing the time of the conversation: "State when that time is fixed?" To this question he had answered: "That was a day after the accusation was filed against Mr. Keyes and also the indictment which was subsequently dismissed and a new indictment found by the grand jury." Not only this, but no assignment of misconduct was interposed as to the asking of the two questions until after an objection to each was made, and neither objection was forthcoming until after the question to which it was applied was answered. In response to the assignment of misconduct, the trial judge observed: "It seems to me the question was asked for the purpose of fixing the time. That is the only purpose which the jury must consider it for. It is not that it tends to a circumstance, but it is that he may refresh his memory as to the time some other event happened. The jury must disregard the question for any other purpose than that limited purpose. You must not draw any inference of any kind from the question." Under all these circumstances, the claim of misconduct cannot avail appellants. It is quite important to note that the matter to which they take exception was placed before the jury by an answer of the witness made before the two questions were asked.

[12] One Pike was called as a witness for the prosecution, and gave testimony against the defendants. One McFadden was afterward put on the stand by the defendants, and testified to a conversation between himself and Pike which tended to show an extreme and bitter feeling on the part of the latter against the defendant to whom his testimony had principally related. In rebuttal, the prosecution called two witnesses, who, after the proper foundation had been laid by questions addressed to McFadden, related statements by the latter which tended to show a bias on his part in favor of some of the defendants and particularly in favor of appellant Keyes. It is contended that this impeachment of McFadden was improper, and, in presenting the point, appellants cite many cases in support of the well-known rule that a witness may not be impeached as to matters collateral to the issues being tried in a litigation. Strictly speaking, however, the question of the bias, interest, or motive of a witness is not a collateral matter. First, we quote from a decision of the Supreme Court: "When, under cross-examination as a witness, the defendant, in response to a question of the district attorney, declared that he had not previously been convicted of a certain felony. Subsequently, against the objection of defendant, the district attorney was permitted to introduce the record of the conviction. It is a well settled rule that a witness cannot be cross-examined as to any fact which is collateral and irrelevant to the issue, merely for the purpose of contradicting him by other evidence, if he should deny it, thereby to discredit his testimony. And if a question is put to a witness on cross-examination which is collateral or irrelevant to the issue, his answer cannot be contradicted by the party who asked him the question; but it is conclusive against him. But when the question asked on cross-examination calls for a response in respect to a matter which the party asking the question would have a right to prove as an independent fact, the rule does not apply. In the latitude permitted by the law in cross-examinations, many questions may be asked which could not be allowed on direct examination, because relating to matter purely collateral. The Code of Civil Procedure (section 2051) allows the cross-examiner to ask a witness if he has been convicted of a felony, and does not confine the evidence of that fact—as was the rule before the Code—to the record of conviction. But by the same section the right to prove the fact, by the record of conviction, is continued. The law authorized the district attorney to prove by the record the conviction as a distinct fact. It was not one of those matters entirely irrelevant, which may be inquired into only by virtue of the wide latitude permissible on cross-examination, and was, therefore, not simply collateral within the meaning of the rule, which prohibits any other evidence than the statement of the witness on cross-examination." People v. Chin Mook Sow, 51 Cal. 597, 600.

We call particular attention to the following sentence, contained in this quotation: "But when the question asked on cross-examination calls for a response in respect to a matter which the party asking the question would have a right to prove as an independent fact, the rule does not apply." It is always proper to show the bias or intent of a witness as an independent fact. "But the evidence containing the conversations between the witness LeForte and Mrs. McRea was not for the purpose of contradicting him as to the evidence he had given as to the facts of the case, but was for the purpose of showing his interest and bias in favor of the defendant on trial. That evidence tending to show the interest of a witness in the case may be given cannot be doubted, and evidence that a witness has endeavored to induce the prosecuting or any other witness to absent himself from the trial or to drop the prosecution of the case is clearly of such character. The bias and interest of the witness in the case is a matter going to the weight to be given his testimony." People v. Mack, 14 Cal. App. 12, 110 P. 967, 968. We can see no reason why this rule should not be applied to an impeaching witness as well as to any other witness in a lawsuit. We think there was no error in admitting the questioned testimony.

Appellants insist that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during the final argument of the cause before the jury. Some of the language employed by him was intemperate, there is no question, but we doubt whether it was sufficiently strong to be characterized as misconduct. If, however, it was misconduct, we think it was cured by the admonition which the trial judge addressed to the jury concerning it.

It is contended that the evidence was insufficient, in several particulars, to support the verdict. Respondent directs our attention to portions of the record which are ample to uphold it as to every one of these particulars. We can see no useful purpose to be subserved in a repetition of the supporting evidence here.

[13] Appellant Rosenberg makes a point which depends for its solution upon the question whether the evidence was sufficient to show that Getzoff and Berman were members of the conspiracy charged in the indictment, both having been named as defendants therein. The trial court received in evidence a telegram from Berman to Getzoff, and it is contended that error was committed in its admission. The telegram was as follows, the "Ed" referred to in it being appellant Rosenberg: "Received wire from Ed saying that if I don't send you money you won't do anything. I don't want Ed sending threatening wires as any promises I make I will keep and do not want him interfering in my business relations with you stop I think he should keep some of the promises he made on it. You and I can take care of our own business stop he wired me he didn't owe you a cent." We think there was ample evidence to show the connection of Berman and Getzoff with the conspiracy. The wire was therefore properly received as a communication from one conspirator to another in and about the subject-matter of the conspiracy.

Appellants make one or two other points which we think are not worthy of a specific consideration.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1930.

1. Conspiracy $\S$ 23—Unlawful agreement between two parties, one to give, and the other to receive, bribe, does not constitute criminal "conspiracy"; "bribery."

Unlawful agreement between two parties, the one to give, and the other to receive, a bribe, does not constitute a criminal conspiracy, since bribery requires for its commission the unlawful concert of one or more persons acting with one or more other persons having a different motive or purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Bribery; Conspiracy.]

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1167(1)—That defendant was wrongfully charged with criminal conspiracy to receive bribe was immaterial, in view of allegations charging substantive offense of bribery (Pen. Code, $\S$ 68).

Fact that defendant was wrongfully charged with criminal conspiracy to receive a bribe was immaterial, in view of existence in indictment of ample allegations showing unlawful and felonious agreements to accept a bribe, which was sufficient to charge offense of bribery under Pen. Code, $\S$ 68, particularly since punishment for substantive offense and for conspiracy to commit it is the same, and defendant therefore suffered no substantial injury by reason of conviction for conspiracy.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] In denying the petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Two, in the above-entitled cause, we deem it proper to say that we withhold our approval of so much of the opinion rendered as holds that in California, contrary to rulings elsewhere, an unlawful agreement between two parties, the one to give, and the other to receive, a bribe, may constitute a criminal conspiracy. It is true that a set of defendants may conspire to give, or a set of defendants may conspire to receive or accept, a bribe, but bribery requires for its consummation the unlawful concert of one or more persons acting with one or more other persons having a different motive or purpose. That being true, there is in such a case no room for the operation of a charge of conspiracy. In the indictment before us, Rosenberg and his codefendants, other than Keyes, are properly charged with a conspiracy to offer and give a bribe to said defendant, but as to defendant Keyes himself a criminal conspiracy cannot be properly charged. However, this fact is immaterial, in view of the existence in said indictment of ample allegations showing an unlawful and felonious agreement on his part to accept a bribe from the other defendants, which is all that is required to charge the offense of bribery. Pen. Code, $\S$ 68.

In fact, to employ the language necessary to charge a conspiracy to violate said section is to charge the substantive offense thereunder. Then, too, as pointed out in the opinion, the punishment for the substantive offense and for conspiracy to commit it is, under the Code, the same. The defendant has therefore suffered no substantial injury.

The petition is denied.

AHERN v. LIVERMORE UNION HIGH SCHOOL DIST. OF ALAMEDA COUNTY. (S. F. 12925.)★

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 30, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 1, 1930.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1002—In action for loss of fingers by power saw, evidence of negligence being sharply conflicting, jury's decision would not be disturbed.

In action for personal injuries, where evidence on issue of defendant's alleged negligence was in sharp conflict, appellate court would not disturb jury's determination.

2. Schools and school districts $\S$ 121—In manual training student's action against high-school district for fingers severed by power saw, evidence held to support finding that plaintiff, aged 14, was not contributorily negligent.

In action by manual training student against high school district for loss of two fingers severed by power saw, appellate court could not say, after judgment for plaintiff, that implied finding that he was not guilty of contributory negligence was unsupported by evidence, in view of fact that plaintiff was only 14 years old and testified with other students that no instructions were given relative to necessity of using a guard to the saw.

3. Statutes $\S$ 125(7)—Amendment to statute relating to liability of school trustees was not open to objection that it violated Constitution, in that subject was not included in title (St. 1923, p. 298; Const. art. 4, $\S$ 24).

St. 1923, p. 298, entitled, "An act to amend section 1623 of the Political Code, relating to the liability of school trustees," was not open to objection on ground that subject of amendment was not embraced in its title, and hence did not violate article 4, $\S$ 24, of the Constitution.

4. Statutes $\S$ 206—Statute should be construed, if possible, in such manner as to give meaning to every part thereof.

Such a construction should be adopted wherever possible as to give meaning and effect, not only to a statute or Code section as a whole, but also to each and every part thereof.

5. Statutes $\S$ 225—Court could not presume that statute was to be restricted by later one merely because bills were before Legislature at same time.

Where proposed statutes were before the Legislature at about the same time and were later enacted into law, neither of which referred to the other, assumption that statute first enacted was to be limited by terms of later enactment would be unreasonable.

6. Schools and school districts $\S$ 89—Statute held to create cause of action against school district by pupil injured through negligence of district (Pol. Code, $\S$ 1623, as amended by St. 1923, p. 298).

Pol. Code, $\S$ 1623, as amended by St. 1923, p. 298, provided that school authorities should be liable in name of the district "for any judgment against the district on account of injury to any pupil arising because of the negligence of the district or its officers or employees, and they must pay any judgment for debts, liabilities or damages out of the school funds." Held, this was not only statutory authorization to school board to pay judgment, but it also gave students right to institute action against district to recover for injuries sustained as a result of the district's negligence.

7. Statutes $\S$ 225—Statute dealing with liability to public and another with liability to school children, not embracing same subject, could not be construed together (Pol. Code, $\S$ 1623, as amended by St. 1923, p. 298; Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 5619).

Contention that Pol. Code, $\S$ 1623, as amended by St. 1923, p. 298, and Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 5619 (St. 1923, p. 675), both related to liability of school district for negligence and therefore could be construed together, could not be sustained, in view of fact that the latter dealt with the liability of counties, municipalities, and school districts to the public, and the former dealt with liability of a school district to school children.

8. Statutes $\S$ 162, 225 $\frac{1}{2}$ —In general, special statute will control general one, and will not be repealed by it.

As a rule, a special statute governs a general one regardless of date of enactment, and a general statute will not ordinarily repeal a special act, although containing a repealing clause and apparently dealing with same subject-matter.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Homer R. Spence, Judge.

Action by Martin Ahern, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Theresa J. Ahern, against the Livermore Union High School District of Alameda County. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 279 P. 1032.

Rehearing denied; RICHARDS, SHENK and PRESTON, JJ., dissenting.

Earl Warren, Dist. Atty., Ralph E. Hoyt, Chief Asst. Dist. Atty., and Agnes R. Polsdorfer, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Oakland, for appellant.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. The brief of the appellant herein correctly states the nature of this action and the general facts out of which it arose as follows: "This is an action brought by Martin Ahern through his guardian ad litem, Theresa J. Ahern, against the Livermore Union High School District of Alameda County for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, its officers and employees. The plaintiff was a student in the manual training department of said district and on the 7th day of December, 1925, while using a Greenlee Brothers power saw to cut a groove in a piece of scrap lumber, the plaintiff suffered the loss of the middle and index fingers of his right hand when they came in contact with the saw blade. The action was tried before the court sitting with a jury, which, at the conclusion of the trial returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant in the sum of $3,500. Motions for a nonsuit and for a new trial were made on behalf of the defendant and denied. The defendant denied negligence and alleged that the negligence of the plaintiff was the proximate cause of the accident, and also pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff." From the judgment herein, the defendant has appealed.

[1, 2] It is apparent from the reading of the record that the evidence as to the negligence of the appellant as well as that tending to show contributory negligence on the part of the respondent is in sharp conflict. While the school authorities testified that the respondent, together with all pupils who were permitted to use the power saw, were thoroughly instructed regarding its use and the necessity of using the guard when operating the saw, the respondent and other pupils in the school denied that they were ever given any such instruction. This was sufficient to constitute a conflict of the evidence upon this particular issue in the case, and, the jury having resolved such issue in respondent's favor, its determination of the matter will not be disturbed on appeal. As to the plea of contributory negligence, in view of the fact that the respondent was at the time of the accident a minor of the age of 14 years only, and that he, with other witnesses, testified that they had received no instructions as to the necessity of using the guard to the saw when operating the same, we cannot say that the implied finding of the jury that respondent was not guilty of contributory negligence finds no support in the evidence. We are therefore, of the opinion that the verdict of the jury finds justification in the evidence adduced at the trial.

Upon the assumption, therefore, that the school district was negligent in permitting the respondent to operate the power saw under the conditions shown in the evidence, and that the respondent, in operating said saw, was not guilty of any contributory negligence, the appellant still insists that the judgment is erroneous and should be reversed. At the 1923 session of the Legislature there were enacted two statutes relating to the liability of school districts for the negligent acts of their officers. The first of these statutes amended section 1623 of the Political Code (St. 1923, p. 298), and the other of said statutes will be referred to as Act 5619. Deering's Gen. Laws of 1923; St. 1923, p. 675. The trial court held, and we think properly, that the complaint stated a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff under either of these statutes. We think the evidence is also sufficient to justify a verdict in favor of the respondent under either of said acts of the Legislature. Were this all, it would be a simple matter to affirm the judgment of the trial court which was entered in accordance with the verdict of the jury. But the trial court gave certain instructions to the jury to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to recover if the jury believed that he had brought himself within the terms of section 1623 of the Political Code, as amended in 1923, and that, in order to recover, it was not necessary for him to meet the requirements of Act 5619. It follows that, if section 1623 is applicable to the facts of this case, the judgment must be affirmed, but, if Act 5619 is controlling and the respondent, in order to recover judgment against the school district for the negligence of its officers, must meet the requirements of said act, then the judgment must be reversed.

Section 1623 of the Political Code as amended in 1923 reads as follows:

"Boards of school trustees, high school boards, junior college boards and boards of education are liable as such in the name of the district for salary due any teacher on contract, and for all debts contracted under the provisions of this chapter, and for any judgment against the district on account of injury to any pupil arising because of the negligence of the district or its officers or employees and they must pay any judgment for debts, liabilities or damages out of the school funds to the credit of such district, subject to the limitation on the use of said funds fixed in the constitution of the State of California; provided, that the contracts mentioned in this section shall not be made in excess of the school moneys accruing to the district and usable for the purposes of such contracts during the school year for which the contracts are made, otherwise the district shall not be held liable.

"The district attorney of the county in which a school district is located shall without fee or other charge defend the district in any suit brought for injury to any pupil for any cause. In case suit is brought against the members of the board of school trustees or board of education as individuals for any act or omission in the line of official duty as trustee or board member, it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the county to defend the members of such board of school trustees or board of education without fee or other charge.

"Members of the boards of school trustees and city boards of education shall not be held personally liable for accidents to children going to or returning from school or on the playgrounds or in connection with school work." (St. 1923, p. 298.) The portions of said section included above in brackets were for the first time incorporated therein by the amendment of 1923.

Section 2 of Act 5619, which is the only portion of the act necessary to consider in this action, is as follows: "Counties, municipalities and school districts shall be liable for injuries to persons and property resulting from the dangerous or defective condition of public streets, highways, buildings, grounds, works and property in all cases where the governing or managing board of such county, municipality, school district, or other board, officer or person having authority to remedy such condition, had knowledge or notice of the defective or dangerous condition of any such street, highway, building, grounds, works or property and failed or neglected, for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice, to remedy such condition or failed and neglected for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice to take such action as may be reasonably necessary to protect the public against such dangerous or defective condition."

As we have already stated, each of these two enactments was passed at the 1923 session of the Legislature. Neither of them refers to the other, nor is there to be found in the terms of one anything which expressly purports to make said act subject to or dependent upon the other. From their terms each is an independent and complete enactment of the Legislature relative to the subject-matter embodied therein. The legislative history of these respective statutes shows that the measure providing for the amendment of section 1623 of the Political Code was introduced in the Assembly on January 19, 1923, was passed by the Assembly on April 14th, and the Senate April 24th, and was signed by the Governor May 10, 1923. Act 5619 was introduced in the Senate on January 15, 1923, passed the Senate April 5th and the Assembly May 16th, and was approved by the Governor June 13, 1923. Under the Constitution, both statutes took effect on the same day, which was 90 days after the adjournment of the Legislature.

[3] Appellant first contends that the amendment to section 1623 of the Political Code, enacted in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 298), violates article 4, § 24, of the Constitution of this state, in that the subject of said amendment is not embraced in its title. The title of the act amending said section is as follows: "An act to amend section one thousand six hundred twenty-three of the Political Code, relating to the liability of school trustees." This court has on more than one occasion sustained an act amending a Code section, the title of which is like or similar to the title of the act of 1923 amending section 1623 of the Political Code. Los Angeles City School District v. Odell, 200 Cal. 637, 641, 254 P. 570; Estate of Elliott, 165 Cal. 339, 132 P. 439; People v. Oates, 142 Cal. 12, 14, 75 P. 337. See, also, People v. French, 61 Cal. App. 275, 277, 214 P. 1003. The reasons for sustaining an act bearing such a title are fully set forth in the above decisions, and it is not necessary to state them again.

Appellant's principal contention is that section 1623 of the Political Code as amended in 1923 gives no right of action whatever in favor of school pupils who have sustained injury as a result of the negligence of the school district or its officers or employees, but that said section only creates a liability on the part of the district to pay "any judgment against the district on account of injury to any pupil arising because of the negligence of the district or its officers or employees." In other words, appellant contends that this section of the Code authorizes the payment of the judgment from the funds of the school district after the same has been recovered against the district under some authority of law giving a right of action against the district, and appellant maintains that section 1623 of the Political Code gives no such right of action, but that Act 5619 is the only statutory enactment making a school district liable for the negligence of its officers, and, unless an injured pupil brings himself within the terms of Act 5619—that is, unless he shows that the dangerous condition of the property of the district had been brought to the notice of the board of trustees of the district, and that they had neglected for "a reasonable time after receiving such notice to remedy said dangerous condition"—then the pupil cannot recover damages for the injury sustained by reason of the dangerous condition of said school property.

Appellant has called our attention to what it contends was the reason for the amendment of section 1623 in 1923. Some time prior to the enactment of said section, an action had been instituted in one of the counties of the state in which it was sought to make the trustees of a school district personally liable in damages for an injury sustained by a pupil through the negligence of the district. The trustees of many districts of the state became apprehensive of the danger to which they might be subjected should the plaintiff in that action prevail. Many of them resigned their positions, and some difficulty was experienced in securing competent persons to act as trustees in some of the districts of the state. Hence the amendment, in 1923, of section 1623 of the Political Code.

By its provisions it made three major changes in the then existing law:

(1) Said amendment provides that school trustees "are liable * * * in the name of the district * * * for any judgment against the district on account of injury to any pupil arising because of the negligence of the district or its officers or employees."

(2) It provides that the district attorney shall defend, without charge or fee, the district in any suit brought for injury to any pupil for any cause. It is also made the duty of the district attorney to defend, without fee or charge, any action "brought against the members of the board of school trustees or board of education as individuals for any act or omission in the line of official duty as trustee or board member."

(3) It expressly exempts the school trustees and members of city boards of education for any personal liability "for accidents to children going to or returning from school or on the playgrounds or in connection with school work."

Bearing in mind that the purpose of the amendment of 1923 to section 1623 of the Political Code was to relieve school trustees and members of boards of education from personal liability for accident to school children, it will be seen that the amendment most effectually accomplished that purpose. The amendment not only expressly relieved them from such liability, but it provided that the district attorney should, without charge to them, defend any such action that might for any cause pertaining, of course, to their duties as trustees of the school district, be instituted against them personally. We can readily understand that the fear existing within the ranks of school trustees and members of boards of education by reason of the attempt to hold them personally liable for injury to pupils was immediately dispelled by reason of this amendment, and that after the enactment these officials resumed their duties with the assurance that they would not be held personally accountable for injuries sustained by pupils in connection with school work. But while we are satisfied as to the effect of the amendment in regard to the liability of school officials, it might be pertinent at this time to ask what had become of the rights of the pupil. The latter's asserted right of action for injury against the officers had been taken from him by the amendment. Had anything been given him by the Legislature, in place of that of which he had been deprived by the terms of the amendment? While, of course, it would not be necessary for the Legislature to provide any protection to pupils sustaining damages as a result of the negligence of school authorities, yet we would hardly expect the lawmaking body of the state, while legislating upon the subject, to leave the pupils of our schools wholly unprotected, and we do not think it has.

[4] As we have already stated, the amendment provides that the trustees in the name of the district are made liable for any judgment against the district on account of injury to any pupil arising because of the negligence of the district or its officers or employees. This, it is conceded, means that the district itself is made liable for any such judgment. It is conceded that school boards are not authorized to pay school funds except in cases expressly provided for by statute. Appellant contends, therefore, that the provision of the amendment last referred to is simply an authorization to the school board to pay such a judgment, and that it creates no liability against the district for damages sustained by a pupil. This contention is, we think, completely answered by a further provision of this section of the Code, which immediately follows that just referred to, and which provides that "they (school boards) must pay any judgment for debts, liabilities or damages out of the school funds to the credit of such district." This last-quoted provision of the section constitutes complete statutory authority to school boards to pay any judgment for damages, which would, of course, include a judgment in favor of a pupil for the negligence of the district, or its officers, or employees. This being the case, if we are to give the amendment making school districts liable for any judgment for damages in favor of a pupil the construction contended for by appellant, then this provision is meaningless and was entirely unnecessary. It could be expunged from the section of the Code without altering or impairing its meaning or purpose in any manner. "It is fundamental that, if possible, a statute or code section should be construed so as to give meaning and effect, not only to the statute or code section as a whole, but to each and every part thereof." 23 Cal. Juris. 758; Crowe v. Boyle, 184 Cal. 117, 193 P. 111.

[5] It is conceded by appellant that at the time of the amendment to section 1623 of the Political Code in 1923 there was no other section of the Code or other statute which made school boards liable for injuries to the pupils resulting from the negligence of the district or its officers or employees. To adopt appellant's contention, we would have a provision of the Code making school districts liable for a judgment in favor of a pupil, but giving the pupil no right of action against the district whereby he might reduce his claim for damages into a judgment. This would be an absurd state of affairs, and we cannot believe that the Legislature ever intended that such a condition should result from the enactment of said amendment. But appellant maintains, although there was no statute giving a pupil such a right of action, that by the provision of Act 5619, subsequently enacted and approved, the pupil was given, under the general terms of this later statute, the right to institute an action against the district for the purpose of recovering a judgment for damages sustained by reason of negligence. Appellant asserts, although this later statute was not enacted when the bill providing for the amendment of section 1623 of the Political Code was approved by the Governor, that we must assume that the members of the Legislature, when they voted for said amendment to section 1623, and the Governor, at the time he approved said amendment, had knowledge of the pendency before the Legislature of the bill providing for the enactment of Act 5619, and that it must be presumed that, at the time of their respective actions in reference to said amendment, they had notice of said bill and of the progress it was making through each house of the Legislature. Therefore appellant contends that the Legislature enacted, and the Governor approved, the amendment, with notice of the terms and provisions of Act 5619, which gave pupils the right, under the terms and conditions of the later statute, to reduce their claims for damages against the district to judgment. Conceding that the members of the Legislature and the Governor, at the time of the enactment of said amendment, knew of the bill then pending before the Legislature providing for the enactment of Act 5619, neither the members of the Legislature, at the time they voted for the enactment of said amendment, nor the Governor, at the time he approved the same, knew or could have known what would be the ultimate fate of said bill. We know of no law that would justify us in holding that the Legislature or the Governor, at the time they acted upon the amendment to section 1623, did or could assume that Act 5619 would be subsequently enacted and approved. Neither statute refers to nor is limited by the terms of the other. It would therefore be most unreasonable to hold that the statute first enacted was to be limited by the terms of the later enactment simply because the bills providing for each statute were before the Legislature at or about the same time. Unless there is something in the terms of the statutes or in the subject-matter of the two acts indicating that one is subject to the other, each must stand as a complete expression of the legislative intent upon the particular subject embraced therein. We are therefore unable to agree with the contention of the appellant that, when the Legislature enacted this amendment to section 1623, making school districts liable for judgments against the district on account of injury to a pupil caused by the negligence of the district or its officers or employees, it had in mind the terms of said Act 5619 not then enacted, or that the right of action, out of which the judgment in favor of the pupil and for which the district is made liable by the terms of the amendment, was to be subsequently created in favor of the pupil by the enactment of said Act 5619.

[6] Section 1623 of the Political Code, as amended in 1923, having made school districts liable for judgments in favor of pupils arising from the negligence of the districts or their officers or employees, we must, in the absence of any other legislation upon the subject, hold that by the terms of this section as amended, the right is given the pupil injured through such negligence to institute an action against the district for the purpose of recovering such a judgment. Otherwise this provision of the Code section, as already observed, would be meaningless. Besides, this section purports to cover the whole subject of the liability for damages to pupils arising from negligence. The section, as amended, expressly exempts the trustees and members of boards of education from such liability, and, in making the district liable for judgments in favor of the pupils for injury arising from such negligence, the plain intent of the statute was to fix this liability, from which the officers had been freed by the statute, upon the district itself. The wording of the amendment may not be as precise and exact as we might wish. Had the wording thereof been that the district was liable for damages sustained by a pupil because of the negligence of the district or its officers or employees, there would be no question of the meaning of the amendment. We can see but slight, if any, difference between making a person liable for damages sustained by reason of his negligence and making him liable for a judgment for damages sustained by reason of his negligence. In this connection we might refer to said section 1623 of the Political Code prior to its amendment in 1923. Since 1874 up to its amendment in 1923, it provided that "boards of trustees are liable as such in the name of the district for any judgment against the district * * * due any teacher on contract." Under this section as it then stood, teachers for years successfully proceeded against districts to recover salaries due them on their contracts with the district. One such action was that of Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 74 P. 44. In sustaining a judgment in favor of a teacher for his salary, this court, on page 561 of the opinion, 74 P. 46, stated that "the Code provides that the trustees of every school district may sue and be sued (Pol. Code, § 1575), and that the trustees are liable in their official capacity for judgments for salaries against the district. (Pol. Code, § 1623.)" While the precise question involved in the present action was not stressed in the Hancock Case, the right of the plaintiff therein, a teacher, to maintain his action was evidently based upon section 1623 of the Political Code prior to its amendment in 1923, and in our opinion the judgment therein could have been sustained only by holding that a right of action against the district was given to a teacher by said section for the recovery of his salary. By the amendment of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 298), this provision of the statute was changed so that it now reads, "Boards of school trustees * * * are liable * * * for salary due any teacher on contract." Just what was the object to be accomplished by amending the section in this respect we are not advised, but we are confident that it confers no greater or different liability upon school districts for the salary of teachers in its amended form than was imposed upon them by the terms of the section previous to this amendment. It is therefore our conclusion that section 1623 of the Political Code as amended in 1923 creates a liability on the part of the school districts for damages sustained by a pupil by reason of the negligence of the school district, its officers, or employees.

[7, 8] Finally, appellant contends that the two acts (that is, section 1623, as amended, and Act 5619) relate to the same subject-matter, namely, the liability of a school district for negligence, and, as both went into effect on the same day, they should be read together as one act and construed accordingly. If section 1623 of the Political Code and Act 5619 dealt entirely with the same subject-matter, there would be considerable force in this contention of appellant. But, by reference to their provisions, it will be seen that such is not the fact. Act 5619 deals with the liability of counties, municipalities, and school districts to the general public for defective or dangerous conditions in the streets, grounds, or property of the counties, municipalities, or school districts, while that portion of the amendment to section 1623 of the Political Code enacted in 1923 with which we are now concerned, deals with the liability of the school district to school children for the negligence of "the district or its officers or employees," resulting in injury to said children. It is evident from the terms of these two legislative enactments that Act 5619 is a general act, defining the liability of the public bodies named therein to the general public and specifying the conditions under which said liability may attach, while the amendment of 1923 to section 1623 of the Political Code is a special act and purports to deal only with the liability of school districts to the children of the district for the negligence of the district or its officers or employees. In such a case the provisions of the special act must prevail over the terms of the general statute. "It is a general rule that a special statute controls a general one, without regard to their respective dates, and that an act general in character will not ordinarily repeal a special act, even though it appears to cover the ground and contains a general repealing clause." 23 Cal. Juris. pp. 706 and 707; Riley v. Forbes, 193 Cal. 740, 227 P. 768; McNeil v. Kingsbury, 190 Cal. 406, 213 P. 50. These citations also answer the claim of appellant that Act 5619, having been enacted subsequent to the passage of the amendment to section 1623 of the Political Code, controls the latter. Being a general statute, it must give way to the terms of the special statute, irrespective of the date of its passage.

As the provisions of section 1623 of the Political Code are determinative of the rights of the respondent in this action, the instructions of the court that respondent was entitled to recover if he brought himself within the terms of said section of the Code were proper.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; LANGDON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

PRESTON, J. I dissent. I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that section 1623 of the Political Code, as amended, confers any such right against a school district in favor of a person injured through the negligence of an officer or employee thereof. It seems too clear for controversy that a substantive right of action in such case is controlled by Act 5619 of the General Law.

The two enactments covering this subject are counterparts of each other and went into effect on the same day. They should be read together. Act 5619 covers rights of action against counties, municipalities, and school districts in negligence cases. Prior to the enactment of this law, the sovereign government could not be sued for the negligence of its officers and employees, and it is only by grace of the Legislature that such an action can be at any time maintained. The provisions of section 1623 are simply intended to make lawful the disbursement of school funds in payment of judgments obtained pursuant to the authority granted by Act 5619. Any other construction destroys the meaning as to the last-mentioned act altogether so far as school districts are concerned.

It is an innovation to have an action of this kind allowed at all, and I do not think the Legislature for a moment intended to give a broader right of recovery than provided by Act 5619.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Oriente Baroni against B. Rosenberg and another, wherein the Continental Casualty Company joined as intervening plaintiff and lien claimant. Verdict for defendant named, and, from an order granting a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed. Super-seding opinion 282 P. 508.

Louis V. Crowley and Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco (George F. Snyder, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PRESTON, J. The order granting a new trial, here appealed from by defendant B. Rosenberg, is affirmed. The sole question is whether the trial court abused its discretion in making said order.

[1] Plaintiff predicated his motion for new trial upon practically all of the statutory grounds (section 657, Code Civ. Proc.), but urged, as the main specifications of error, alleged prejudicial misconduct on the part of counsel for said defendant, hereinafter detailed, and that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. The insufficiency of the evidence cannot be urged in support of the order, however, as it is not therein specified as one of the grounds therefor. Section 657, Code Civ. Proc.

Plaintiff instituted the action for the purpose of recovering damages against defendants by reason of the fact that on November 1, 1926, he was struck by a five-ton dump truck owned by defendant B. Rosenberg and operated by one of his employees in connection with grading work on Rutland avenue, San Francisco. Plaintiff was at said time acting as grading foreman for Keystone Construction Company, and, in a half-kneeling position at the sidewalk edge on said avenue, was engaged in stretching string to mark the prospective line of curb for excavation purposes. The truck, in passing, hit his leg and so swung him around that one of his feet was caught under a wheel, crushed, injured, and rendered permanently useless. Continental Casualty Company, the carrier of workmen's compensation insurance for plaintiff's employer, which had expended in plaintiff's behalf some $1,000.20 for hospital expense and claimed $3,520.27 as compensation payments for 169 weeks, joined in the action as plaintiff intervener and lien claimant. The cause was tried before a jury and verdict rendered for said defendant. The alleged misconduct charged by plaintiff arose from a colloquy which took place between counsel in the presence of the jury, under substantially the following circumstances:

[2] Counsel for defendant called plaintiff as a witness under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure and asked him if he was receiving at that time workmen's compensation each week. Plaintiff's attorney objected unless the jury be instructed that such compensation would have to be paid back out of any verdict obtained. After remarks between counsel, the record shows the following:

"Q. (By Mr. Gallagher, counsel for defendant): It is a fact that you are weekly receiving indemnity from the Continental Casualty Company? A. Yes. I get $20.83 a week.

"The Court: As long as it has been mentioned, that is, from the fact that his employer paid workmen's compensation.

"Mr. Gallagher: Yes, your Honor.

"The Court: And that was between this plaintiff and his employer.

"Mr. Ryan: And will have to be repaid to the person who paid the insurance.

"Mr. Gallagher: Yes, and it will continue to be paid, too.

"Mr. Ryan: No, it will not. It stops at a certain time.

"Mr. Gallagher: He will get it as long as he lives.

"Mr. Ryan: No, he will not. I object to that and assign it as misconduct.

"The Court: I ask the jury to disregard all of that. * * * I ask the jury to disregard everything that has been said except what has been said by the court on the subject of the law governing this matter.

The statement of counsel, above quoted and in italics, was in fact not true. As was brought out by affidavit upon motion for new trial, plaintiff received under the Workmen's Compensation Act (General Laws, Deering 1923, part 1, Act 4749, p. 1710, as amended) a permanent disability rating of only 42¼ per cent., or the equivalent of 169 weeks of disability payments. In order to entitle him to compensation under said act for the remainder of his life, he would have to have been totally, and not partially permanently, disabled—that is, he would have to have received a total permanent injury rating of at least 70 per cent. Section 9, subd. 2(5) of said act. Here of plaintiff's whole body, his one foot only was permanently injured, thus entitling him to said rating of but 42¼ per cent. permanent disability. The facts as to the method of rating disabilities under the act and as to the rating received by plaintiff were not brought out prior to the proceedings upon motion for new trial. They were not in the record. Indeed, there was no way of incorporating them therein.

Under section 26 of said act, such testimony is inadmissible.

Moreover, the entire discussion as to compensation was extraneous to the issues. Although the court admonished the jury to disregard it, the harm, if any, was already done, and it had no power to wipe away the false concept of the situation, imprinted upon their minds. The remark was properly assigned as misconduct, and, despite the admonition, was, in our opinion, prejudicial. The fact of the matter is that the absolutely erroneous statement that plaintiff would get compensation as long as he lived was flatly made by defendant's counsel, before the jury, and correct information as to the method of rating disabilities under the act, which might have disabused their minds, was not and could not be given them. To our mind there was ample justification for the exercise by the trial court of its discretion in granting a new trial; hence our affirmance of its action. As authority for the conclusion announced, see Keena v. United Railroads, 197 Cal. 148, 239 P. 1061, and Gee v. Fong Poy, 88 Cal. App. 627, 639 to 647, 264 P. 564, and cases therein cited.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Nellie Wallace against John N. Gable and another, executors of the last will and testament of George Gable, deceased, upon a rejected claim against the estate. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Carleton Gray, of Oroville, for appellants.
Bond & Deirup, of Chico, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them, as executors of the last will of George Gable, deceased. The plaintiff's action was founded upon her rejected claim, presented against the estate for her services for cooking and general housework, nursing and care of decedent, continuously from July 1, 1894, to the date of his death, August 14, 1926, at the agreed price of one dollar a day, payable upon termination of the employment. The amount prayed for was $11,725, less $1,200 paid upon account, leaving $10,525, for which amount the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff. However, as it had been brought out at the trial that on September 22, 1924, the deceased had been declared an incompetent and a guardian had been appointed who had made a new contract with plaintiff, it became apparent that the original contract terminated at the time the guardian was appointed. The trial court denied a new trial upon condition that the amount of the judgment be reduced to $9,831 to conform to the situation presented by the proof, and the judgment was entered for such latter amount.

There is no merit in the contention that the record does not support the finding of the jury as to the existence of the contract for the plaintiff's services and that they were to be paid for at the time of the death of the employer or when the plaintiff should leave his service. The proof of this agreement was, naturally, somewhat difficult because of the death of one party to the contract and the consequent disqualification of the other as a witness. Only indirect evidence was available, but of this there is ample in the record to justify the conclusion of the jury.

[1] It is earnestly contended that this claim, if proven, is barred by the statute of limitations. It is conceded that the cause of action accrued on September 22, 1924, when the employer was adjudged incompetent. The claim of plaintiff was presented to the executors on May 25, 1927, or over two years and eight months after it had accrued. Seventeen days later this action was commenced. It is insisted by appellants that the claim was barred by section 339, subdivision 1, Code of Civil Procedure, and could not have been allowed by the executors because of the provisions of section 1499, Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] The respondent, on the other hand, contends that the general statute of limitations is extended by section 353, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides, in part: "If a person against whom an action may be brought die before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof, and the cause of action survive, an action may be commenced against his representatives, after the expiration of that time and within one year after the issuing of letters testamentary or of administration." The plaintiff complied with the provisions of this section. The employer died in August, 1926, before the expiration of the time limited for commencing plaintiff's action, and the action was commenced within one year after letters testamentary were issued, which was on September 13, 1926.

Appellant meets this situation by the position that section 353, Code of Civil Procedure, relates exclusively to the commencement of actions, and does not relate to or extend the time for presenting or filing claims against an estate, and that the claim was barred under the general statute before the claim was presented and that presentation of a valid claim is a condition precedent to bringing an action.

Reliance is placed upon the case of Morrow v. Barker, 119 Cal. 65, 51 P. 12. That case holds that no suit may be brought on a claim unless the claim be presented within the time limited by the notice to creditors. In that case, the claim was presented after the time limited in the notice. In the instant case, the claim was presented within the time mentioned in the notice to creditors and the claim and the action were both filed within one year after the appointment of the executors.

[3] We think the purpose and meaning of section 353, Code of Civil Procedure, is to extend the time within which to present claim and bring an action in the event of rejection. Since section 353, Code of Civil Procedure, expressly extends the time for bringing an action, a presentation of a claim at any time before action is barred is within time, provided it be filed within the time provided in the notice to creditors. Such was the view of this court, apparently, in the case of Barclay v. Blackinton, 127 Cal. 189, 59 P. 834, 835. In that case, the claim was presented to the administrator within one year after the death of the intestate, but suit was not brought thereon within the year allowed by section 353, Code of Civil Procedure. That year expired on March 2, 1897, and the action was not brought in time. However, the court said: "After the 2d day of March, 1897, the claim was barred by the statute of limitations, and thereafter neither the administrator nor the court had the power to allow it"—thus assuming that section 353, Code of Civil Procedure, extended the time for filing claim as well as the time for bringing an action.

There are no other matters which require discussion, and the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

KERR, County Registrar of Voters, v. RUSSELL, County Purchasing Agent.

L. A. 12153.

Supreme Court of California.
Feb. 20, 1930.

Alternative writ denied.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and R. C. McAllaster, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

[1-4] The petition for a rehearing is denied. The alternative writ of mandate was heretofore denied without opinion. In order to set at rest the question sought to be presented herein, it should now be stated that the petition is without merit. It has always been the policy of our law to preserve uniformity throughout the state as to the time for the election of elective county officers. Section 2¾ of article 2 of the Constitution preserves that uniformity, and provides for the election at the primary elections of nonpartisan county officers who receive votes on a majority of all the ballots cast for such officers. This is a general provision, is applicable throughout the state, and is self-executing.

Section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution prescribes how and in what manner county freeholders charters may be adopted. It is therein provided: "All elective officers of counties * * * shall be nominated and elected in the manner provided by general laws for the nomination and election of such officers." This is a provision relating especially to county freeholders charters. The last sentence in section 2¾ of article 2 of the Constitution is general, and purports to apply to all freeholders charters, but it must be held to apply only to freeholders charters wherein it is competent under other provisions of the Constitution to provide for a different mode, such as in municipal freeholders charters.

The special provision of section 7½ of article 11 above quoted must therefore be controlling over the last sentence of section 2¾ of article 2, which is general in its nature. Also any provisions of the Los Angeles county charter which are inconsistent with the controlling portion of section 2¾ of article 2 of the Constitution must be governed by the latter. Consequently said section 2¾ has operated since its adoption in November, 1926, so as to provide for the election of nonpartisan county officers of Los Angeles county at the primary election, and the names of such officers so elected were not in 1928 and are not required to be placed on the ballot at the succeeding general election.

1. Counties ⇨62—Preservation of uniformity of time for election of elective county officers throughout state is policy of law.

It is the policy of the law to preserve uniformity as to time for election of elective county officers throughout the state.

2. Constitutional law ⇨31—Constitutional provision for election of nonpartisan county officers receiving majority of votes at primary elections is general, self-executing provision, applicable throughout state (Const. art. 2, § 2¾).

Const. art. 2, § 2¾, providing for election of nonpartisan county officers receiving majority of votes cast for such officers at primary elections, is a general provision, applicable throughout the state, and self-executing.

3. Counties ⇨62—General constitutional provision as to election of nonpartisan officers is controlled by special provision for nomination and election of county officers as provided by general laws (Const. art. 2, § 2¾, and art. 11, § 7½).

Last sentence of Const. art. 2, § 2¾, providing that freeholders' charter provision for different method of electing nonpartisan officers than that prescribed in such section shall govern, must be held to apply only to freeholders' charters, wherein it is competent under other constitutional provisions to provide for different mode, as in municipal freeholders' charters, though general and purporting to apply to all such charters, and hence is controlled by special provision of article 11, § 7½, for nomination and election of all elective county officers in manner provided by general laws.

4. Counties ⇨62—County charter provisions, inconsistent with constitutional provision for election of nonpartisan county officers receiving majority of votes at primary elections, are governed thereby (Const. art. 2, § 2¾; Los Angeles County Charter).

Provisions of Los Angeles County Charter inconsistent with provision of Const. art. 2, § 2¾, for election of nonpartisan county officers receiving majority of votes at primary elections, are governed by such provision, so that names of officers so elected need not be placed on ballot at succeeding general election.

PROCTOR et al. v. JUSTICE'S COURT OF CITY OF BERKELEY et al.

S. F. 13666.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 20, 1930.

1. Criminal law §90(1)—All justices of peace are part of state constitutional judicial system having jurisdiction, conferred by Constitution and general laws; "county officer"; "city officer" (Const. 1849, art. 6, § 14; Const. 1879, art. 6, § 11, and § 11a as adopted Nov. 6, 1928).

Justices of the peace are neither "city" nor "county" officers, but are part of constitutional judicial system of state having concurrent jurisdiction with superior courts in certain matters expressly given by Constitution and also having such jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases as is given by general laws of state to all justices of peace without distinction between township and city justices, since Const. 1849, art. 6, § 14, and Const. 1879, art. 6, § 11, and § 11a as adopted Nov. 6, 1928, provide that Legislature shall determine number of justices of peace and fix by law their powers, duties, and responsibilities.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, City Officer; County Officer.]

2. Criminal law §90(4)—Justice's court of city of Berkeley within township of 30,000 population containing town of Emeryville, where intoxicating liquor was unlawfully sold, had jurisdiction over offense (Pen. Code, § 1425, as amended by St. 1929, p. 861; Code Civ. Proc. § 103; Wright Act; Pol. Code, § 4480).

Under Pen. Code, § 1425, as amended by St. 1929, p. 861, and Code Civ. Proc. § 103, justice's court of city of Berkeley of second and one-half class, and together with town of Emeryville, being within township having population exceeding 30,000, had jurisdiction over offense of maintaining place in Emeryville where intoxicating liquor was unlawfully sold and kept in violation of Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), since Pol. Code, § 4480, provides that provisions of the Codes must be construed with certain exceptions as though part of same statute.

Application by George Proctor and others for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the Justice's Court of the City of Berkeley and Oliver Youngs, Jr., as Justice thereof, to prevent the respondent court from proceeding with an action.

Alternative writ of prohibition discharged, and application for peremptory writ denied.

Stanley R. Sterne, of Oakland, for petitioners.

Earl Warren, Dist. Atty., and J. F. Coakley, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for respondents.

W. Cloyd Snyder, of Pasadena, amicus curiæ.

WASTE, C. J. Petitioners seek to prohibit the justice's court of the city of Berkeley from proceeding with the trial of an action wherein the petitioners are charged with having maintained a common nuisance in the town of Emeryville, county of Alameda, in violation of the state liquor law. The specific issue in the proceeding is whether or not the justice's court of the city of Berkeley has jurisdiction over the offense of maintaining a place in the town of Emeryville where intoxicating liquor was unlawfully sold and kept, in violation of the provisions of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), the alleged violation occurring since the most recent amendment of section 1425 of the Penal Code (St. 1929, p. 861).

Prior to its amendment, section 1425, in part, and so far as is material here, read as follows: "The justices' courts have jurisdiction of the following public offenses committed with the respective counties in which such courts are established. * * *" (Italics added.) Then follows an enumeration of certain misdemeanor offenses. As amended, the section reads:

"1425. The justices' courts have jurisdiction as follows: 1. In cities, cities and counties, towns and judicial townships, having a population of thirty thousand or more, said courts shall have jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to misdemeanor only, except those of which the juvenile court is given original jurisdiction.

"2. In those having a population of less than thirty thousand said courts shall have jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to misdemeanors only, punishable by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

It is petitioners' contention that the omission from the section, as amended, of the words "committed with the respective counties," etc., was deliberate and intentional, and intended by the Legislature to restrict the criminal jurisdiction of justices' courts to such misdemeanors only as may be committed within the territorial limits of the respective cities, cities and counties, and judicial townships in which such justices' courts are situated. The respondent contends that section 1425 has reference solely to the kind of offenses over which the justices' courts are given jurisdiction, as differentiated from territorial jurisdiction, and that notwithstanding the amendment of the section the jurisdiction of the justices' courts in criminal cases remains the same as it was before the amendment. So far as the present proceeding is concerned, we think that is so.

[1] The Constitution of this state has, from the beginning provided that the Legislature shall determine the number of justices of the peace, and fix by law their powers, duties, and responsibilities. Const. 1849, art. 6, § 14; Const. 1879, art. 6, § 11 (section 11a as adopted Nov. 6, 1928). Justices of the peace are therefore neither city nor county officers, but are part of the constitutional judicial system of the state (People v. Cobb, 133 Cal. 74, 65 P. 325), having concurrent jurisdiction with superior courts in certain matters expressly given by the Constitution, and also having such jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases as is given by the general laws of the state to all justices of the peace. In this regard, there is no distinction whatever between township and city justices. Graham v. Mayor of Fresno, 151 Cal. 465, 471, 91 P. 147; People v. Sands, 102 Cal. 12, 17, 36 P. 404. A study of the acts of the Legislature relating to justices' courts, beginning with the first enactment (St. 1850, c. 73, p. 179), supports the contention of the respondent that section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure relates to the kind of civil causes, and section 1425 of the Penal Code, supra, relates to the kind of criminal causes of which the justices' courts may take cognizance, and that these sections do not purport to fix the territorial jurisdiction of these courts. The only jurisdiction of justices of the peace conferred by the first statute on the subject (1850, supra) was jurisdiction in civil cases, and was "limited to the township wherein they may have been elected." The following year (St. 1851, pp. 22 et seq.) these courts were given jurisdiction, "except within the limits of the cities of San Francisco, Sacramento, and Stockton," of certain petty "public offenses, committed within their respective cities or townships." By section 107, article 5, of an "Act concerning the Courts of Justice of this State, and Judicial Officers" (Stats. 1853, pp. 287, 298), justices' courts, except in the city of San Francisco, were given jurisdiction over an increased number of civil and criminal causes. Following the adoption of an amendment of the Constitution in 1862, the Legislature, in 1863, revised the act concerning the courts of justice of this state (Stats. 1863, p. 333 et seq.). Chapter 7 of that act, as revised, relates to justices' courts and particularly to their jurisdiction. Section 48 provides that these courts "shall have jurisdiction" within their respective townships, or cities, of the following actions and proceedings: (Enumerating the kinds of civil actions and proceedings). Section 50 provides that: "The jurisdiction of justices' courts within an incorporated city, shall extend to the limits of such city or township in which the city is situated. Mesne and final process of justices' courts may be issued to any part of the county in which they are held." Section 51 provides: These courts shall have jurisdiction of the following public offenses committed within the respective counties in which such courts are established: (Enumerating certain misdemeanors). The law on the subject of the jurisdiction of justices' courts remained substantially in this condition until the Codes were adopted. Section 116 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1872 provided that the civil jurisdiction of justices' courts within an incorporated city "extends to the limits of such city, or township in which the city is situated." Section 117 substantially adopted the provisions of section 51, supra (Stats. 1863, p. 340). The subject of the criminal jurisdiction of these courts is not referred to in the first Penal Code adopted in 1872. In 1880, section 103 was added to the Code of Civil Procedure. It provided generally for justices of the peace and for the creation of justices' courts, making the township the basis for the establishment of such courts. This section has been amended many times since its adoption in 1880, the various amendments merely providing for and relating to justices in cities of different classes. The amendment of the section in 1891 has a very material bearing on this proceeding. It was then amended to provide that the "justices of the Peace of cities * * * shall have the same jurisdiction, civil and criminal (italics added), as justices of the Peace of townships and township justice's courts" (Stats. 1891, p. 456). In addition, they have jurisdiction of causes arising under city ordinances, both civil and criminal, and in other municipal and local police matters. Section 106 of the Code of Civil Procedure, based on the original Code section 116, supra, which, in turn, was based on the statute of 1863, supra (page 340), was also enacted in 1880. It provides that the civil jurisdiction of justices' courts extends to the limits of the township in which they are held.

We are of the view that it may be said with assurance that the Legislature has always regarded township justices' courts and city justices' courts in the same class in providing generally for their jurisdiction. In the early days, the three large cities of the state, including San Francisco, were excepted from the general jurisdictional features of justices' courts throughout the state. By the Consolidation Act of San Francisco, and the Act of March, 1866, special provision was made for justices' courts and justices in cities and counties of more than one hundred thousand population, with jurisdiction extending to the limits of the city and county. See, also, Code Civ. Proc. §§ 85-98.

There is a well-recognized rule of statutory construction that the Codes blend into each other, and are to be regarded as constituting but a single statute. Pol. Code, § 4480; People v. Dobbins, 73 Cal. 257, 14 P. 860; Butte County v. Merrill, 141 Cal. 396, 74 P. 1036. Section 1425 of the Penal Code, relating to the public offenses over which the justices' courts shall have jurisdiction, was once section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No doubt regarding the subject-matter as coming more appropriately within the purview and purpose of the Penal Code, the Legislature, in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 705), re-enacted the section as part of that Code, and in 1907 repealed section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1907, p. 682). See In re Yee Kim Mah, 31 Cal. App. 196, 200, 159 P. 1060. During all the time this was being done, however, section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra, remained unchanged in so far as this consideration is concerned, and provided, as it has since 1891, that the justices of the peace and justices' courts of cities shall have the same jurisdiction, civil and criminal, as justices of the peace of townships and township justices' courts.

[2] With this historical background of the legislation relating to the subject to support the contention of the respondent justice of the peace and justice's court, we are of the view that, in the absence of some positive prohibitory legislation depriving the justice's court of the city of Berkeley of jurisdiction of the public offense with which petitioners are charged, we need not indulge in speculation as to whether the omission of certain words from section 1425 of the Penal Code, supra, was intentional or not. Senate Bill No. 64, amending section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the civil causes over which the justices' courts shall have jurisdiction, and Senate Bill No. 734, amending section 1425 of the Penal Code relating to the public offenses within the jurisdictional cognizance of justices' courts, were each part of the legislative program for increasing the jurisdiction of justices' courts throughout the state, particularly in the more populous townships and cities, to more nearly approach the jurisdiction of the more recently created municipal courts. The language of each of the sections, as amended, is the same in providing that, "The justices' courts shall have jurisdiction as follows": Of certain civil causes (Code Civ. Proc. § 112 [St. 1929, p. 834]); and "The justices' courts have jurisdiction as follows": Of certain criminal causes (Pen. Code, § 1425 [St. 1929, p. 861]). Section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra, was not touched by the Legislature. By reason of the provisions of that section, the jurisdiction of a justice's court sitting in a city of the second and one-half class is made the same as, and co-extensive with, that of a township justice's court. Berkeley is a city of the second and one-half class, and both it and the town of Emeryville are within the confines of Oakland township. It cannot be denied that the justice's court of Oakland township and the justice of the peace thereof—that township having a population in excess of thirty thousand—would have jurisdiction over the criminal offense of which these petitioners were accused.

It follows that the respondent court and justice thereof may legally proceed in the matter here complained of. The alternative writ of prohibition heretofore granted is therefore discharged, and the application for a peremptory writ is denied.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE
ASS'N OF SEVENTH DAY ADVENTISTS
v. SMITH et al.*
Sac. 4201.

Supreme Court of California.
Feb. 19, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 20, 1930.

1. Deeds ⇨61—Valid delivery of deed to third person, to be delivered to grantee upon grantor's death, immediately reduces grantor's estate to life estate.

Valid delivery of deed to third person, with direction to deliver it to grantee upon grantor's death, immediately cuts down grantor's estate to life estate.

2. Deeds ⇨67—Grantor after delivery of deed is powerless to divest grantee of estate in remainder created by deposit with third person.

Deed after delivery cannot be recalled by grantor, and grantor is thereafter without power to divest grantee of estate in remainder created by deposit with third person.

3. Deeds ⇨58(4)—Delivery is lacking, where grantor intends to retain control of deed or rights in property until death after delivery to third person.

If grantor intends to retain control of deed or rights in property, including right to control and dispose of it, until his death with intention that depository shall deliver deed to grantee upon grantor's death only in event that grantor shall not have recalled it or made other disposition of property, delivery is lacking.

4. Wills ⇨88(4)—Deed delivered to third person for delivery to grantee after grantor's death is testamentary in character if grantor retains control.

Where grantor retains control of deed delivered to third person to be delivered to grantee upon his death, deed can only be considered as attempted testamentary disposition, which must fail if formalities for execution of will have not been complied with.

5. Evidence ⇨269(3)—Grantor's acts after parting with title may be proven to show intention at time deed was delivered to third person.

While evidence of declarations, acts, and conduct of grantor made after he has parted with title in disparagement of it is inadmissible, subsequent acts of grantor may be proven for purpose of showing intent at time deed was placed in hands of third person.

6. Deeds ⚡56(2)—Intent that deed should be immediately effective to diminish grantor's estate is essential of valid delivery to third person for delivery after grantor's death.

Intent that deed should be immediately effective to diminish grantor's estate is an essential of valid delivery to third person for delivery to grantee after grantor's death.

7. Deeds ⚡208(5)—Evidence in action to quiet title held to support finding that deed deposited with third person, for delivery after grantor's death, was never legally delivered.

In action to quiet title, where plaintiff claimed title under deed delivered to third person to be delivered to plaintiff after grantor's death, evidence showing that grantor retained control over deed after delivery to third person held to support finding that deed under which plaintiff claimed was never legally delivered to it or to any one on its behalf.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Northern California Conference Association of the Seventh Day Adventists against Theodore Smith and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, and Armfield & Eddy, of Woodland, for appellants.

Huston, Huston & Huston and Thomas B. Leeper, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff, Northern California Conference Association of Seventh Day Adventists, appeals from a judgment decreeing that defendant Theodore Smith is the owner and entitled to the possession of certain real property situate in the county of Yolo, and that it has no right, title, or interest therein, and that it take nothing. Plaintiff is a religious corporation organized to advance the doctrines of the Seventh Day Adventist faith.

Said plaintiff and defendant Theodore Smith claimed title by separate deeds from Sarah C. Hays. The conveyance to plaintiff of an undivided one-half interest in said property was executed by Mrs. Hays, then over seventy years of age, on June 8, 1923. She left said conveyance with the attorney who prepared it with instructions to deliver it to the grantee upon her death. Mrs. Hays died in December, 1924, and said attorney delivered the deed to representatives of plaintiff soon thereafter. Plaintiff raises the point in its reply brief that there is no evidence that the deed to plaintiff was not given for a valuable consideration, but was a gift. We think it clearly and indubitably appears from the nature and circumstances of the case that there was no consideration for the conveyance. It seems unlikely that the corporation even knew of the deed to it until after Mrs. Hays' death.

Defendant Smith claimed title to the entire estate in the premises under a deed deposited by Mrs. Hays with the Bank of Italy as an escrow holder on November 2, 1922, seven months before the execution of the deed to plaintiff, and the delivery of said deed to him after the death of Mrs. Hays upon his payment, on October 1, 1925, of $12,000 in cash and the execution of a note for $16,500 secured by a deed of trust on the property, in accordance with the terms of the escrow agreement. He learned of the deed to plaintiff after the death of Mrs. Hays, but before he elected to perform the terms of the escrow agreement.

Defendant Viola M. Rablin, administratrix of the estate of Sarah C. Hays, deceased, denied in her answer that plaintiff corporation had any interest in said premises and denied that her claim was without right, or that she had no right or title in said lands, but she did not set forth the nature or extent of the interest claimed, nor pray that it be adjudged that she, as administratrix or individually, was the owner of said lands, but only that plaintiff take nothing and for such other relief as might seem equitable.

Upon this appeal plaintiff states that although upon the record it would be entitled to a judgment as against all of the defendants, including defendant Smith, adjudging it to be the owner of an undivided one-half interest in said property, it is willing to recognize the rights of Smith provided judgment is ordered in its favor against the defendant Rablin, both individually and as administratrix, decreeing that she holds in trust one-half of the moneys received from Smith in payment of the purchase price of said property and also a half interest in the note and deed of trust given to secure the balance of the price.

Plaintiff claims the right to a sum of money and to an interest in the said note for $16,500, secured by deed of trust, in lieu of the land. It may be questioned whether the pleadings are appropriate for such recovery. The allegations of the complaint are in the usual form of suits to quiet title, averring ownership of specific real property by plaintiff and a claim of interest by defendants, which is without right. By the prayer of the complaint plaintiff seeks a determination of title and does not apply for a decree establishing a trust in a sum of money and a note secured by deed of trust. Conceding for purposes of discussion that the form of the pleadings is not a bar to the relief here sought, any substantive right which plaintiff may have is dependent upon the deed to it having been executed by a competent grantor and validly delivered. The case was tried before a jury, which found, in response to special interrogatories, that the deed to plaintiff was the product of the delusions of a diseased mind, and that when Mrs. Hays left the deed with the attorney who prepared it she did not intend to part with control over it, from which it would follow that there was no delivery. While there are grounds for contending that the evidence will not support the jury's verdict that the deed was the product of delusions, we will not here decide that question, for the reason that we prefer to place our decision of affirmance on the ground that the deed was never delivered. It will be necessary, however, to briefly review the evidence bearing on the question of mental capacity for the aid it furnishes in determining the question of delivery.

At the time of the execution of the deed to plaintiff, June 8, 1923, Mrs. Hays resided in the city of Sacramento at the home of her widowed daughter, the defendant Viola M. Rablin, and contributed to the expense of maintaining the household. The property described in said deed consisted of 160 acres of farm land near the city of Woodland, with the home place where Mrs. Hays and her husband had resided for many years. Eighty acres of said land had been devised to her by said husband, who had died many years previously, and the other eighty acres had been received from the estate of a deceased daughter, who had received it under her father's will. It would appear that Mrs. Hays possessed no other property except personal property of inconsequential value. By the will of said husband an eighty-acre tract was devised to each of their seven children.

For many years Mrs. Hays had been a member of the Seventh Day Adventist Church and a staunch supporter of the doctrines and precepts of that faith. During the period of her residence with her daughter the activities of said church unquestionably furnished the dominating interest in her life. She was regular in attendance upon church meetings and zealous in the missionary work of the body. No other members of the family were affiliated with, or interested in, said church.

The evidence as to her relations with her children, especially with the defendant daughter, with whom she had resided since 1920, is relied upon as indicating mental incapacity to a degree sufficient to vitiate the deed to plaintiff. The testimony of Mrs. Rablin, corroborated by neighbors and friends, would indicate that the mother had developed many of the attributes of character not infrequently associated with advancing years. She continually complained to her daughter and to neighbors that said daughter and her sons did not show her any consideration or kindness, and that her daughter had a very unpleasant disposition. When the daughter took the mother to task for complaining to neighbors, the mother denied having made any complaints or unkind statements. Upon several occasions she claimed that her daughter or other members of the household had stolen articles of small value belonging to her. When the articles were found where Mrs. Hays had left them, she accused her daughter of having replaced them. Even after the finding of the misplaced or lost articles the mother stated to persons outside the family that they had been stolen.

Upon one occasion, which was after the execution of the deed to plaintiff, the mother, without informing the daughter, left the daughter's house and rented a flat near by. The next day she returned and requested her daughter to permit her to come back. Upon her return she voluntarily told the daughter that all that she owned should pass to her when she died. She was frequently heard pacing back and forth in her room and mumbling to herself in a rather loud tone of voice.

The daughter's testimony would indicate that she exerted her best efforts to provide her mother with a comfortable and harmonious home, and that the mother's unhappiness was due to her own unfortunate disposition. The daughter further testified that she assisted her mother in all business transactions, both in regard to the ranch property here involved and in other matters.

The deed to plaintiff was prepared by one G. P. Hurst, Esq., a Woodland attorney, who had known Mrs. Hays for twenty-five years. He prepared a will for her in May, 1923. A few weeks after its execution she again called at his office and stated that she had concluded to dispose of her property by deeds, as somebody had told her wills were easily broken. There is no clear evidence as to the contents of said will, which was destroyed by Mrs. Hays after the deed to plaintiff was executed, but there are references in the testimony of Mr. Hurst and one other witness from which it may be inferred that said property or an interest therein was devised to plaintiff.

Mrs. Hays told said attorney that her children had been sufficiently provided for, that one or two of them had not made good use of the property they had, and that they had not shown due courtesy and kindness to her. She also recounted the supposed theft of her property by members of the family. She told him nothing of the deed deposited in escrow which defendant Smith was entitled to receive upon the payment of the price fixed in the escrow agreement. Said attorney states that he endeavored to impress on Mrs. Hays that it was difficult to break a will if it was properly drawn and the maker was legally competent; that he explained to her that the delivery of a deed to be good must be absolute; that a will would not divest her title, but under a deed title would pass to the grantee and she could not reclaim the deed, or thereafter convey the property. Mrs. Hays persisted in executing a deed. It was placed in an envelope and left with Mr. Hurst, the following instruction being written on the envelope: "Give the within deed to the grantees on my death. Date, June 8/23. Mrs. S. C. Hays." Shortly after the death of Mrs. Hays in December, 1924, Mr. Hurst delivered the deed to the representatives of plaintiff corporation.

[1-4] The advice given by her attorney was sound. The effect of a valid delivery made to a third person, with a direction to deliver the deed to the grantee upon the death of the grantor, is to immediately cut down the estate of the grantor to a life estate. A deed by its delivery is beyond the power of the grantor to recall, and the grantor is thereafter without power to divest the grantee of the estate in remainder created by its deposit with a third person. If the grantor intends to retain control of the deed or of his rights of property, including the rights of disposition and control, until his death, with the intention that the depository shall deliver the deed to the grantee upon the death of the grantor only in the event that the grantor shall not have recalled it, or made other disposition of the property, delivery is lacking. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 P. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Kenney v. Parks, 125 Cal. 146, 57 P. 772; Stone v. Daily, 181 Cal. 571, 185 P. 665; Donahue v. Sweeney, 171 Cal. 388, 153 P. 708. In such a case the deed can only be considered as an attempted testamentary disposition which must fail because the formalities for the execution of a will have not been complied with.

[5] The conduct of Mrs. Hays subsequent to the execution of the deed to plaintiff reveals a lack of intent that the deed should become operative upon being left with attorney Hurst to cut down her estate to a life interest, and hence a failure of delivery. While evidence of the declarations, acts, and conduct of a grantor made after he has parted with title and in disparagement of it is inadmissible, subsequent acts of the grantor may be proven for the purpose of showing the intent of the grantor at the time the deed was placed in the hands of a third person. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703; Donahue v. Sweeney, 171 Cal. 388, 153 P. 708.

[6] Mrs. Hays leased the premises to defendant on November 2, 1922, for a term commencing on that date and terminating on October 1, 1923. Smith immediately entered into possession, farming the land, and continued in possession at all times thereafter. On November 2, Mrs. Hays also deposited the deed to Smith with the Bank of Italy as an escrow holder, with instructions to deliver to Smith upon his payment of the price previously agreed upon between Smith and herself on or before October 1, 1923. On July 18, 1923, the lease and time for the exercise of the option to purchase were extended in writing to October 1, 1924, and on September 30, 1924, the time was extended to October 1, 1925. On that date Smith paid the sum of $12,000 in cash and executed a note and deed of trust for $16,500 payable to the administratrix of the estate of Mrs. S. C. Hays, whereupon the deed dated November 2, 1922, was delivered to him.

Smith testified that at the time of the extension granted July 18, 1923, which date was about a month after the execution of the deed to plaintiff, he took Mrs. Hays out to the ranch and talked the matter over with her, and she then asked him to stay with the matter. Upon other occasions, including the date of the extension given on September 30, 1924, she again requested him to continue and stated that she wished him to buy or that she would give him further extensions. She did not inform him of her deed to plaintiff. The defendant Mrs. Rablin corroborated the testimony of Smith as to Mrs. Hays' requests that he purchase the property.

J. R. Hays, a son of Mrs. Hays, testified that his mother told him two or three months before she died, and frequently before that time, that she wished to sell the property and asked him to direct prospective purchasers to her. She never informed said son or the defendant Mrs. Rablin of the deed to plaintiff corporation, but she told two friends, who were members of her church, that she had deeded her property to the church.

The effect of the deed to plaintiff, if a valid delivery was made to Attorney Hurst, was to immediately cut down the estate of Mrs. Hays to a life estate. By the escrow agreement previously entered into, Smith had bargained for the right to acquire an estate in fee upon his election to pay the stipulated price, and Mrs. Hays, following the execution of the deed to plaintiff, requested him to complete the purchase and offered to and did extend the time for the exercise of the option, thereby holding herself out as owner of the fee. She made no mention to Smith of the deed to plaintiff. The only satisfactory explanation of her conduct is that she did not intend that her rights in said property during her lifetime, including the right of disposition, should be abridged or changed and an estate vested in plaintiff by the execution of the deed left with her attorney, Mr. Hurst. By the answer, "No," made to the special interrogatory as to whether Mrs. Hays intended to part with control over said deed when she gave it to Mr. Hurst, the jury placed a construction upon the facts and circumstances which finds support in the evidence. An intent that the deed should be immediately effective to diminish the estate of the grantor was an essential of a valid delivery.

[7] In explanation of the action of Mrs. Hays in urging Smith to complete his purchase after the execution of the deed which, it is contended, cut down her estate to a life interest, appellant states that a person may contract to sell, and give an option on, property belonging to another, or may contract to dispose of a greater interest than he himself owns, with the expectation of thereafter acquiring the estate offered in order to make a conveyance. But evidence which would sustain a finding of such an intent on the part of Mrs. Hays is entirely lacking. Neither can it be inferred, under any reasonable construction of the evidence, that Mrs. Hays intended to vest an estate in appellant by the deposit of the deed with Mr. Hurst, but urged Smith to complete his purchase with a belief that the estate granted to appellant might be divested by Smith's exercise of his rights under the prior escrow agreement. We cannot attribute to Mrs. Hays technical legal knowledge as to the conflicting rights of appellant and Smith in such a situation, nor believe that she would seek to deprive her grantee of an estate conveyed to it by urging another to exercise his rights under a prior contract.

While Mr. Hurst's testimony would indicate that he gave Mrs. Hays a clear explanation and endeavored to make her comprehend the ambulatory character of a will as compared with a deed, her subsequent conduct with relation to the property furnishes strong evidence that she failed to understand the full meaning of his remarks. Said attorney throughout his testimony stated that he persisted in restating his explanation to Mrs. Hays upon the several occasions when she called, for the reason that she gave no indications of comprehending him. While he may have believed that the effect of his repeated statements of the law was to finally make the point clear, the subsequent behaviour of Mrs. Hays, considering her age and clouded mentality, indicates the contrary.

The notion that a deed may serve as a substitute for a will without diminishing the grantor's estate during his lifetime is very prevalent. Mrs. Hays' statement to Attorney Hurst that she wished a deed in place of the will previously executed because somebody had told her wills were easily broken, and her failure to tell Hurst of her contract with Smith, as well as the testimony of the two friends of Mrs. Hays, members of the Adventist Church, who testified to telling her that deeds were better than wills, indicates a likelihood of a belief on the part of Mrs. Hays that a deed would serve as a substitute for a will, and, like a will, would not affect her estate during her lifetime. While an explanation such as was given by Mr. Hurst should leave no doubt in the mind of the average person, Mrs. Hays was a woman over seventy years of age, who, if not afflicted with mental incapacity, as respondents contend, at least had displayed attributes of character and mind indicative of weakened powers of understanding.

In view of all the facts and circumstances, we cannot accede to appellant's contention that Mrs. Hays' persistence in executing a deed following the explanation of the effect of delivery by Mr. Hurst furnishes conclusive evidence of an intent that the deed should be immediately operative. We are of the opinion that the deed was never legally delivered to plaintiff or to any one on its behalf. Hence plaintiff must fail in its claim to one-half of the moneys paid by Smith on the purchase price of the land and to a half interest in the note, secured by deed of trust, given by him for the balance of said price.

Judgment affirmed.

OSOSKE v. KALINOWSKY et ux.

S. F. 12773.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 20, 1930.

1. Husband and wife $\S$ 262(1)—Property acquired during coverture in husband's name is presumably community property.

If, during coverture, title is taken in name of husband, disputable presumption arises that property is community property.

2. Husband and wife $\S$ 264—In action for specific performance of contract to sell realty, made by husband but not by wife, evidence showed property was community property.

In action against husband and wife for specific performance of contract for sale of real property executed by husband, evidence that husband brought action, to which wife was not party, to quiet title to part of property, and that record title was in husband's name for over sixteen years and continued in him for more than six months after execution of contract in suit, tended to show that property was community property under management of husband.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence that property was community property could not be disturbed on appeal.

In action against husband and wife for specific performance of contract to sell real property executed by husband, Supreme Court could not disturb finding of trial judge that property was community property where evidence was in conflict.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1)—“Subject to owners’ approval” did not necessarily mean that husband was not dealing with own property in contracting to sell.

In action against husband and wife for specific performance of contract to sell real property executed by husband containing clause, “subject to the owners’ approval,” contention that words quoted substantiated claim that husband was not dealing with his own property could not be sustained, since plaintiff’s explanation that he merely copied blank form used by real estate brokers was plausible, and was apparently accepted by trial court.

5. Husband and wife ⇨247—Amendment to statute relating to control of community property did not change status of property previously conveyed to husband (St. 1917, p. 829).

Status of real property conveyed to husband in 1907 was fixed by law then existing, and hence was not affected by subsequent amendment of Civ. Code, § 172 (St. 1917, p. 829), dealing with management of community property.

6. Records ⇨18(10)—Decree for husband quieting title to part of land conveyed to him did not conclusively prove all of land was community property (McEnerney Act).

Judgment for plaintiff, in action against husband and wife for specific performance of contract to sell real property executed by husband, could derive no support from decree in earlier proceedings, under the McEnerney Act (St. 1906, Ex. Sess. p. 78), whereby title to portion of property was quieted in husband, since plaintiff’s theory that decree was conclusive of husband’s ownership of community property was inapplicable, where judgment affected more property than was included within decree.

CURTIS, J.

Action for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of real property, executed by the defendant Otto Kalinowsky in favor of the plaintiff, which contract bears date the 3d day of May, 1924. The defendant Bertha Kalinowsky did not sign the agreement. The defendants are husband and wife. It is not denied that the plaintiff performed all of the conditions of said agreement on his part to be performed, and that he, within the time contemplated by said agreement, tendered the sum of $500, the purchase price called for by said contract, and demanded of defendant Otto Kalinowsky a deed to said real property in compliance with said contract. The defendant refused to execute or deliver to plaintiff any deed to said real property, and the defense interposed by said defendant and also by his wife, Bertha Kalinowsky, who has been made a party to this action, was that said real property, at all times since the same was purchased, and at the date of said agreement of sale, was the separate property of the said Bertha Kalinowsky. Upon the issue thus made by the pleadings as to the ownership of said real property, the court found, “It is not true that Bertha Kalinowsky, the wife of Otto Kalinowsky, is or at any time was the owner of said property, except as to her community interest therein.” The trial court, in accordance with the findings, rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

The defendants’ sole contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court that Bertha Kalinowsky was not the owner of said real property. The defendants Otto Kalinowsky and Bertha Kalinowsky were husband and wife on December 14, 1907, the date on which the real property in suit was conveyed from B. Paige & Co., a corporation, to the defendant Otto Kalinowsky. This deed was recorded on December 19, 1907, and said real property stood of record in the name of Otto Kalinowsky from said last-named date until over six months after the execution and delivery by the said Otto Kalinowsky of said agreement of sale. It is also admitted that, after the acquisition of said real property, Otto Kalinowsky instituted an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco under the act popularly known as the “McEnerney Act (St. 1906, Ex. Sess. p. 78), and secured a decree, made and entered on April 7, 1908, declaring and establishing his title to the real property described in the complaint in said action. The real property involved herein is a lot seventy-five feet in length and twenty-five feet in width, and is located on the south side of Augusta street in the city and county of San Francisco. The real property described in said decree in the McEnerney Act comprised the whole of said lot excepting the south twenty-five feet thereof. Bertha Kalinowsky was not a party to the action brought under the McEnerney Act. Neither was her name mentioned in any of the proceedings therein. On May 3, 1924, the defendant Otto Kalinowsky executed and delivered to plaintiff the agreement of sale which is the foundation of this action. As before noted, Bertha Kalinowsky did not sign said agreement. The evidence shows, however, that the day after this agreement was signed Bertha Kalinowsky called at the home of the plaintiff and asked plaintiff's sister if plaintiff had bought a lot for $500. Plaintiff's sister testified further regarding this visit and as to what was said by Mrs. Kalinowsky on this occasion. "She said her husband had told her he had sold the lot to my brother and she wanted to know if it was so. So I told her, yes, and my brother came in and spoke to her. After some conversation she said, 'Now don't tell my husband I came here.' * * * I did not ask her why. But afterwards my brother spoke to her for a while and then he said, 'Well, isn't that a good price for the lot, are you satisfied?' 'Oh, yes,' she said, 'Oh, yes.' That was the substance of the conversation. I don't know why Mr. Ososke asked her if she was satisfied. I don't know why she came. She said she wanted to know if it was true that my brother had bought the lot from her husband."

Plaintiff introduced evidence to the effect that the agreement of sale was just and equitable and that the sum of $500 was a fair price to pay for said lot. This latter evidence was not contradicted by the defendants. They confined their evidence to the status of the property, and each of them testified in support of their claim that the property was the separate property of Bertha Kalinowsky and that the property had been purchased with funds acquired by the defendant Bertha Kalinowsky prior to her marriage to Otto Kalinowsky. Bertha Kalinowsky testified that the money used to purchase said lot was money which she had brought from Germany, together with money which she had earned before her marriage. Her testimony was in a slight degree corroborated by a witness who testified that she had known Mrs. Kalinowsky before her marriage, and that Mrs. Kalinowsky "worked hard and she brought some money from Germany with her."

Defendants contend that, as both of them testified that the real property in question was purchased with the separate funds of Bertha Kalinowsky, and as there was no evidence to directly contradict their testimony in that regard, their testimony upon the status of the property stands uncontradicted. It is true that there is no evidence directly contradicting the statements of Bertha Kalinowsky that she brought some money from Germany and used it with other money earned by her prior to her marriage in the purchase of said real property; that is, no witnesses testified directly that she did not purchase said property with her separate funds. We do not think such evidence was indispensable in order to produce a conflict in the evidence as to whether said property was or was not her separate property. Any evidence which would tend to establish the fact that said property was the community property of Mr. and Mrs. Kalinowsky would be in conflict with the testimony of the defendants that it was the separate property of Mrs. Kalinowsky.

[1-3] There was evidence, in our opinion, which indirectly contradicted the statement of the defendants. In the first place, the title to the property was taken in the name of Mr. Kalinowsky during coverture, and the presumption is therefore that the property was the community property of the spouses. This presumption is, of course, disputable. Van Camp v. Van Camp, 53 Cal. App. 17, 199 P. 885; Freese v. Hibernia, 139 Cal. 392, 394, 73 P. 172; Estate of Warner, 167 Cal. 686, 688, 140 P. 583. In addition to the presumption that the property was community property, the evidence shows that the defendant Otto Kalinowsky, very soon after acquiring it, instituted an action in his own name under the McEnerney Act to quiet his title to a portion of said real property. His wife was not made a party to said action, and, as we have already noted, her name does not appear in those proceedings. It is hardly probable that those proceedings were taken without her knowledge. After a judgment was obtained in said proceeding quieting Otto Kalinowsky's title to the real property involved therein, he continued to hold the record title to the whole of said real property for over sixteen years, when, by the agreement of sale of May 3, 1924, he purported to contract for the sale of the said real property in his own name, and without the concurrence or consent of his wife. The next day after the execution of said agreement of sale, the wife, Bertha Kalinowsky, having heard from her husband that he had sold a lot to the plaintiff, called upon the plaintiff at his home and asked if he had bought a lot for $500. On being informed that he had, she merely cautioned the plaintiff and his sister, who was also present at this conversation, not to tell her husband of her visit to plaintiff's house. She was then asked by the plaintiff if the price which was to be paid for the lot was not a fair price and if she was satisfied, to which she replied "Oh, yes." She then left without making any objections to the sale and without making any claim that she was the owner of the lot, or that her husband had no right to sell the same. The evidence of the acts of the defendants from the time the property was conveyed to Otto Kalinowsky up to and after the time he had agreed to sell the same to the plaintiff, as we view it, tended in a greater or less degree to show that the property was the community property of the defendants and under the management and control of the husband. As such it was in substantial conflict with the evidence of the defendants that said property was purchased with the separate funds of the defendant Bertha Kalinowsky. The trial judge having resolved this conflict in favor of the plaintiff, this court is without the power to disturb his finding upon that question.

[4] Some reliance is placed by the defendants upon the phrase "subject to the owners' approval," incorporated in the contract of May 3, 1924, as substantiating their claim that Otto Kalinowsky was not dealing with his own property when he executed and delivered said contract. However, the explanation given by the plaintiff that he copied a blank form used by real estate brokers in making up the contract is plausible and was evidently accepted by the trial court.

[5] The real property was acquired prior to the amendment in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 829) of section 172 of the Civil Code, which deals with the management and control of community property. The husband therefore had the absolute management and control thereof, and could sell or incur the same without his wife's consent. The status of the property was fixed by the law as it existed at the time of its acquisition (Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 P. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170), and the amendment did not change the vesting nor give to the wife any greater right in the property than she possessed prior to the amendment (Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 218 P. 22). If, therefore, as found by the trial court, this property was the community property of the defendants, the husband, Otto Kalinowsky, could make a valid contract for its sale, the wife's consent was not necessary to the validity of said contract, and said contract was binding upon both of them. The judgment should therefore be affirmed.

[6] Plaintiff further relies upon the judgment quieting Otto Kalinowsky's title under the McEnerney Act. The case was tried and decided under the assumption that the decree in that proceeding covered the whole of said lot. The findings and judgment were made and rendered under the same assumption. After the case had been appealed and after all of the briefs had been filed, it was discovered that said McEnerney decree did not cover the south twenty-five feet of said lot, and accordingly an order diminishing the record herein showing this fact was then upon the stipulation of the parties made by this court. This order had escaped our attention at the time of the rendition of our former opinion in this action (283 P. 813), and for that reason we treated said McEnerney decree as applying to the whole of said real property and conclusive of Otto Kalinowsky's ownership thereof as community property. Whatever force or effect the McEnerney decree may have in determining title to said property, it can only apply to that portion thereof embraced within the terms of said decree. The contract of sale is for the whole of said land at a fixed price of $500. The judgment appealed from decrees the specific performance of said contract and includes land within as well as land without the terms of said McEnerney decree. The decree therefore cannot be relied upon in support of said judgment which affects property not embraced within said decree.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

On March 28, 1929, the plaintiffs commenced an action for wrongful death. In the first count of their complaint the plaintiffs alleged that on November 21, 1924, Edward E. Sears suffered an injury to the middle finger of his right hand; that he consulted the defendant Dr. Adams, and that the latter treated him; that later the injury developed into tetanus; that the malady proceeded to develop, and later caused the death of the decedent; that the defendant, by the use of ordinary care, should have injected a serum known as anti-tetanic serum, but the defendant negligently omitted to do so; that the said Edward E. Sears died on the 3d day of January, 1925; that he left him surviving a wife, one of the plaintiffs, and a son, the other plaintiff, who was at the time of the death of his father of the age of fifteen years; that on the 28th day of March, 1927, the mother was appointed guardian ad litem of her son, and thereupon this action was commenced by the guardian ad litem in behalf of the minor son and by the mother in her own behalf. In the second count, the same facts, except as to names and dates, are alleged regarding the defendant Dr. E. A. Majors. The defendants appeared separately, and each interposed demurrers to the second amended complaint. The demurrers were sustained without leave to amend, and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiffs have appealed and have brought up the judgment roll.

[1] The pleadings present the question, Was the complaint barred by the statute of limitations? Both parties concede that in their complaint the plaintiffs attempted to allege a cause of action, bringing themselves within the provisions of section 377, Code of Civil Procedure. Both parties agree that at the time the action was commenced the mother was barred by the statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3. However, the plaintiffs contend that the minor son was not barred by reason of the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 352 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiffs concede that section 377 is based, in part, on the English statute commonly known as Lord Campbell's Act, but they claim that said act has gone through so many changes that it can no longer be said the entire act has been inserted in the Code of Civil Procedure. In this behalf they assert that section 377 gives the rights therein mentioned and adopts and follows the Lord Campbell Act in part only. Continuing, they claim that subdivision 3 of section 340 is an entity unto itself and is a statute of limitations, not a part of the cause of action, but a statute applicable to the remedy only. Thereupon they claim that the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure, do not apply to persons falling within the exceptions defined in subdivision 1 of section 352.

Following this line of reasoning, the son, by his guardian, contends that his action was commenced in time, and that, the action having been saved as to the infant, it was also saved as to the mother. Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., 198 Cal. 290, 244 P. 1077. In reply, the defendants assert that a single joint cause of action is given to the heirs by section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, and that the language of the statute permits of no other construction. Civ. Code, § 1431; Salmon v. Rathjens, 152 Cal. 290, 294, 92 P. 733. Continuing, they claim that, the action being barred as to all excepting the infant, it was also barred as to him. We think the contention is well founded. True, the court has never decided the point with reference to Code of Civil Procedure, § 377, but the decisions are so closely in point as to be determinative. In the case of Robertson v. Burrell, 110 Cal. 568, 42 P. 1086, the plaintiffs sought to establish title to certain properties as the surviving heirs of their father, who, they alleged, was at the time of his death a partner of defendants' decedent. When their father died, he left him surviving a widow and minor children. The widow allowed the action to become barred prior to her death. At page 577 of 110 Cal., 42 P. 1086, 1088, the court said: "Where the right of action is joint, knowledge which would bar it as to one would bar it as to all, either in law or equity. Freem. Coten, § 375; Wait Act, & Def. p. 279; Jordan v. McKenzie, 30 Miss. 32; Hardeman v. Sims, 3 Ala. 747. And, where a right of action is barred to the ancestor, it is barred to his heirs. Shortridge v. Allen, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 193, 21 S. W. 419." The discussion in section 375 of Freeman on Cotenancy is most exact and instructive. Other text-books state the same rule. 2 Wood on Limitations (4th Ed.) p. 1079; 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. 182.

[2] It must be conceded that the common-law rule was as stated by Judge Freeman. Our statutes are presumed to state the common-law rule, unless they expressly otherwise declare. 23 Cal. Jur. 785. As our statute does not contain anything to the contrary, the common-law rule should be applied. As in harmony with what we have said, we cite May v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 184 Ky. 493, 212 S. W. 131, 137; Napier v. Little, 137 Ga. 242, 73 S. E. 3, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 91, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1013; Pickens v. Stout, 67 W. Va. 422, 68 S. E. 354; Settle v. Simpson, 204 Ky. 470, 264 S. W. 1092; Williams v. Sutton, 43 Cal. 65, 73. The trial court did not err when it made an order sustaining the demurrers.

The judgment is affirmed.

WOOD v. WOOD.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 10, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 28, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 10, 1930.

1. Divorce ⇨312—Divorced husband appealing from order changing custody of child to wife cannot question irregularity on hearing, where counsel acquiesced.

Husband obtaining divorce, and who was first awarded custody of minor child, cannot, after subsequent order taking custody from him and placing child in custody of wife, raise any question as to alleged irregularity which occurred on hearing of matter before referee appointed by trial court, consisting of examination by referee of minor daughter as witness without first administering legal oath and without presence of either of parties to proceeding, where record on appeal fairly disclosed that counsel for various parties agreed and acquiesced in procedure.

2. Divorce ⇨302—In absence of appeal from order giving father custody of child or finding otherwise, unfitness of mother must be considered established.

Where trial court, in action for divorce by husband, in awarding custody of minor child to husband, made findings that mother was not fit and proper person to have care or custody of child, in absence of other findings of fact with reference to fitness of mother, and no appeal having been taken from order based on finding, unfitness of mother as of date of order placing custody of child with father must be taken as having been conclusively established.

3. Divorce ⇨312—Error, if any, in excluding evidence of mother's conduct before order giving divorced father custody of child held not error, where mother seeking custody showed exemplary conduct (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Where entire evidence introduced on hearing of motion presented by mother to have custody of minor child changed to her from father obtaining divorce tended to prove that her then mode of living was, and for many months theretofore preceding had been, exemplary in all respects, with no suggestion of any irregularities or departures from established conventionalities, error, if any, in refusal of referee to consider in evidence matters and things that had transpired prior to making of original order or conditions as they existed at time of making of original order, did not result in miscarriage of justice within contemplation of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

4. Divorce ⇨303(3)—Failure to receive in evidence testimony on hearing of former motion regarding inherent mental condition of mother seeking custody of child held not error.

Failure or refusal of referee, on hearing of mother's motion to have custody of minor child changed from father to her, to receive in evidence and to consider transcript of testimony given by two witnesses on hearing of former motion therefor, relating to inherent mental condition of mother, held not error, since referee was concerned solely with question of whether, at time of hearing under consideration, mother was more fit than father to be intrusted with care and rearing of minor daughter.

5. Divorce ⇨312—In absence of abuse of discretion, order giving father custody of child and order changing custody to mother are conclusive.

In absence of clear abuse of discretion, order of court with jurisdiction placing custody of minor child with divorced father and subsequent order changing custody from father to mother were conclusive, since, in divorce proceedings, court may vary and modify decree as to custody of minor children from time to time as circumstances change.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

HOUSER, J. In an action for divorce between the parties hereto, an interlocutory decree was entered in favor of the plaintiff. Thereafter, by order of the trial court, the custody of a minor daughter of the parties was awarded to the father. Some 18 months later (by way of motion), the mother sought from the trial court a modification of the former orders, to the end that the custody of the daughter be changed from the father to the mother. It is from each of two several orders by which such change of custody of the daughter was directed that the appeal herein is taken.

[1] Appellant first complains of an alleged irregularity which occurred on the hearing of the matter before a referee appointed by the trial court, which, as stated by appellant, consisted of an examination by the referee of the daughter as a witness without first administering to her the legal oath, and without the presence of either of the parties to the proceeding; also in forbidding either examination or cross-examination of said witness by either of counsel representing the respective parties to the action. As in connection therewith the record on appeal fairly discloses the fact that "counsel for the various parties agreed and acquiesced in the said procedure," it is manifest that appellant is now in no position to raise any question with reference thereto.

Prejudicial error is suggested, in that the referee "refused to consider in evidence matters and things that had transpired prior to the making of the (original) order, * * * or conditions as they existed at the time of the making of the (original) order," by which the custody of the minor daughter was awarded to the father.

[2] As a basis for the first order, the trial court made certain findings of fact, among which is the statement that the mother was "not a fit and proper person to have the care or custody or control of said minor child * * * —the court having determined that the influence of the defendant (the mother) is disturbing to the child and has a tendency to retard her progress from the effect of certain former unfortunate and prejudicial influences." No other findings of fact having been made with reference to the fitness of the mother to have the care and control of the child, and, no appeal having been taken from the order which was based upon such finding, the unfitness of the mother, as of the date of said order, must be taken as having been conclusively established. The sole purpose of the later inquiry instituted by the mother was to determine whether, since the date of the former order, such an intrinsic change had taken place in the character of the mother and her surroundings, as manifested by her then disposition, proclivities, and general conduct since the rendition of the former order, as would justify the conclusion that, considering the then surroundings of the father and the daughter, the mother was more fit and proper than the father to have the care, custody, control, and rearing of such child.

[3] It is apparent that, so far as the hearing on the motion which resulted in the order here in question is concerned, even by the introduction of evidence identical with that which was adduced on the hearing of the former motion, or, if conceivable, even by stronger evidence relating thereto, a conclusion more unfavorable to the fitness of the mother to have the care and custody of the daughter as of the date of the first order would not have been possible. On the hearing of the motion made by the mother, so far as concerned the condition of her former unfitness to have the custody and control of the daughter, that condition was necessarily unconditionally accepted as, and conceded to be, a definite, incontestable, fact. Since nothing could be added to such conclusion as of the date of the former order, nor anything be subtracted from it, the uselessness of evidence relating to facts upon which to rest a like ultimate conclusion is manifest. The only bearing that evidence as to specific acts preceding the former order could have upon the issue as to the propriety of making a change in the custody and control of the daughter was that the former conduct of the mother might afford some indication as to what possibly might be expected in the future; but, considering the fact that the entire evidence introduced on the hearing of the motion presented by the mother, if it did not establish, at least it tended to prove, that her then mode of living was, and for many months theretofore preceding had been, exemplary in all respects, with no suggestion of any irregularities or departures from established conventionalities—it is apparent that the error (assuming it to be such) of which complaint is made was not of that importance which in itself would justify a reversal of the order. From a consideration of the "entire cause, including the evidence," this court is not of the opinion "that the error complained of (if any) has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Section 4½, art. 6, Const.

[4] Further complaint is registered by appellant because of the failure or refusal of the referee to receive in evidence and to consider a transcript of the testimony given by two witnesses on the hearing of the former motion relating to "the inherent mental condition" of the mother. In addition to other patent legal reasons for sustaining the objection interposed by counsel for the mother to the introduction of such testimony, it need only be reiterated that the referee primarily was concerned, not with conditions preceding the date of the former order, but was properly interested solely with the question of whether at the time of the hearing here under consideration was the mother more fit than the father to be intrusted with the care and rearing of their minor daughter.

[5] With much earnestness appellant urges this court to review the evidence, and, founded thereon, in effect to direct the entry of an order by which the custody of the child will remain in the father. But the law is well settled that, where the issue relates to the care and custody of minor children, in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion, the orders made by a court having jurisdiction in the premises are conclusive. The relative functions of the lower court and an appellate tribunal in such matters are aptly and forcefully stated in the case of Crater v. Crater, 135 Cal. 633, 634, 67 P. 1049, 1050, as follows:

"* * * It is well established that in divorce proceedings the court has the power to vary and modify its decree as to the custody of the minor children from time to time as circumstances change. The court, in revising and modifying its decree, proceeds upon new facts considered in connection with the facts formerly established, the change of circumstances, the conduct of the parties, and the best interests of the child. The good of the child is regarded as the controlling force in directing its custody, and the courts will always look to this, rather than to the whims and caprices of the parties. The morals of the parents, their financial condition, their subsequent marriage, the age of the child, and the devotion of either parent to its best interests, are all factors to be weighed and considered by the court. All such applications are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court below, and its conclusion will not be disturbed here, except it should clearly appear that its discretion has been abused. * * * " To the same effect see: Swenson v. Swenson (Cal. App.) 281 P. 674; Van Der Vliet v. Van Der Vliet, 200 Cal. 721, 254 P. 945; Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 352, 173 P. 582; Black v. Black, 149 Cal. 224, 86 P. 505; Dickerson v. Dickerson, 108 Cal. 351, 41 P. 475; Lefebvre v. Lefebvre, 48 Cal. App. 483, 192 P. 76.

For the reason that each of the other errors suggested by appellant is subsidiary to or dependent upon those alleged errors to which attention herein has been directed, it is deemed unnecessary to give to them further consideration.

The orders are affirmed.

MORGAN et al. v. MATTHIESON et ux.★
(Civ. 7237.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 29, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Feb. 28, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 27, 1930.

1. Deeds ⇨66—Whether grantor's handing of deed to grantee, after having placed it in trust subject to surrender, constituted delivery, vesting absolute title, held question of fact.

Where deed was delivered to grantee's husband to be held in trust, subject to surrender to grantor on demand at any time during his life, question whether grantor, thereafter receiving deed from trustee and handing it to grantee, made delivery, removing deed from operation of agreement and giving grantee absolute title, held one of fact for trial court, where evidence was conflicting.

2. Appeal and error ⇨994(3), 1012(1)—Trial judge sitting without jury passes upon credibility of witnesses and weight of testimony.

It is the function of the trial judge sitting without a jury to pass upon the credibility of witnesses, to weigh their testimony, and to draw inferences therefrom.

3. Evidence ⇨594—Judge trying facts may consider unimpeached testimony in light of conduct of parties and attendant circumstances.

Trial judge, as trier of facts need not give implicit faith to testimony not directly impeached, but is justified in testing it by the conduct of the parties, distinctive characteristics of transaction, and attendant circumstances.

4. Deeds ⇨208(1)—Finding that deed, recorded only after grantor's death and originally delivered in trust subject to cancellation, was never delivered to grantee, held justified in cancellation suit.

In action by executors to cancel deed purporting to have been made by deceased to defendant, which was not recorded until after maker's death, and which was originally given to grantee's husband in trust under agreement permitting its withdrawal on demand, finding of trial court that there had been no delivery to grantee and that executors were entitled to cancellation held justified.

5. Deeds ⇨200—Evidence of circumstances surrounding companion deed held admissible to establish intent of deceased grantor, in suit to cancel deed for want of delivery.

In suit by executors to cancel deed from deceased on ground that there had been no delivery, circumstances surrounding execution of companion deed were admissible in arriving at intent and real meaning of transaction, where the two deeds were made as parts of one scheme.

6. Deeds ⇨200—Subsequent letters and declarations of deceased grantor indicating intent not to give property held admissible in suit for cancellation of deed for want of delivery.

In suit by grantor's executors for cancellation of deed on ground that there was no actual delivery to grantee, letters and subsequent declarations of grantor made after the time of the alleged delivery were admissible on question of grantor's intent, where letters recited that grantee under companion deed had secured transaction through threats, and expressed wish that administrators would not give her home place, and declarations related to request to trustee to whom the deeds were given to "get those papers."

7. Deeds ⇨200—In suit to cancel deed for want of delivery, after grantor's death, reasonable freedom must be accorded in judging relevancy of evidence, where testimony was conflicting.

In suit for cancellation of deed of deceased grantor on ground of want of delivery, in which evidence was conflicting and two deeds were made as part of same transaction, reasonable freedom must be accorded in judging relevancy of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by A. S. Morgan and W. L. Pollock, as executors of the last will and testament of J. J. Morgan, deceased, against Henry H. Matthieson and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George M. Harker, of Los Angeles, for appellant Willa Matthieson.

G. R. Dexter and Raymond S. Taylor, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JOHNSON, Justice pro tem. This is an action by two of the three executors of the will of J. J. Morgan, deceased, to cancel a certain deed purporting to have been made by the decedent to the defendant Willa Matthieson, but not recorded until after the maker's death.

The defendant Henry H. Matthieson, being one of the executors as well as the husband of the defendant Willa Matthieson, did not join his fellow executors in prosecuting the action, and, though named as a defendant in his individual as well as his representative capacity, he filed a disclaimer, leaving the defense of the action to his wife.

The point in controversy is as to delivery of the deed in question; and, judgment having gone in favor of the estate, Mrs. Matthieson took this appeal.

The decedent, J. J. Morgan, a resident of Hollywood, who lived to the age of about 84 years, had known Mrs. Matthieson and her sister, Eleanor McIntyre, for about twenty-five years prior to his death, which occurred on May 31, 1925. The women, who were in the habit of calling Morgan "Uncle Jerry," were distantly related to him by marriage. Morgan, though eccentric and illiterate, was an intelligent, strong-willed, shrewd man of business, and had amassed an estate valued close to a million and a half dollars. He had married twice, had six children and certain grandchildren, but had been divorced from his second wife. After his divorce, he arranged with Mrs. McIntyre to keep house for him. She was about forty-four years his junior; and about six months before his death a written contract, dated November 10, 1924, had been made between Morgan and Mrs. McIntyre, which, after reciting an agreement to marry, obligated Morgan on or before the day of the marriage to convey to Mrs. McIntyre as her separate estate an undivided half interest in his home place, known as No. 1836 Taft avenue, Hollywood. And, by way of an antenuptial settlement, Morgan further agreed, at the end of each of four quinquennial periods following marriage, to pay to Mrs. McIntyre certain fixed sums aggregating $62,100; the successive payments being made conditional, however, upon the continuance of Morgan's life, and being intended to remove "all and every temptation that might spring up along life's journey." The wedding was postponed several times, but never took place.

The relations between Morgan and the Matthiesons were friendly. Mrs. Matthieson was called somewhat frequently to relieve her sister in the care of Morgan; and Mr. Matthieson's co-operation was sometimes sought by Morgan in business matters.

Morgan seems at various times to have indulged in promises of conveyances to Mrs. Matthieson and her sister; but he delighted more in promises than in performance. He did, however, give each of them a legacy of $5,000 in his will.

According to Matthieson's testimony, about a month and a half before Morgan died, he sent for Matthieson. When Matthieson arrived at the house, Morgan declared that he was going to make deeds to some "loved ones," whom he did not then name, but whom he said he had promised at different times to pay for what they had done for him. He wanted, however, to be sure that his interests were protected, as he put it; and after several conferences Matthieson was instructed on April 20, 1925, to have a deed drawn to his wife for the property in suit, another deed to Mrs. McIntyre for the home place, and two other deeds to two of the grandchildren, Hazel Knapp and Earl Pollock. The deeds were prepared, and were signed and acknowledged by Morgan on April 21st.

These four deeds were then delivered into the possession of Matthieson with a letter dated April 20th, drafted by Morgan, and, after correction, typed and signed in duplicate; one copy being kept by Morgan, the other by Matthieson. This letter stated that the deeds were to be held in trust by Matthieson, subject to surrender to Morgan on demand at any time during his life. The letter closed with this further injunction: "In the event of my death, you are to record these deeds at once, provided no circumstances arise which would cause doubt in your mind. At no time and under no other consideration are they to be so recorded." At the foot of the letter Morgan had Matthieson sign an acceptance of the trust, with an agreement not only to perform the duties undertaken, but also to pay Morgan all damages growing out of failure in any particular.

The story of delivery of the deeds, as pieced together from the testimony given in behalf of Mrs. Matthieson by her husband, her sister, and herself, is as follows: Morgan and Matthieson went together to the notary's office on April 21st. There the deeds were acknowledged; and, as they left the office, the deeds were handed by Morgan to Matthieson, who already had his copy of the letter of April 20th. The two men then returned to Morgan's house. Hardly had they arrived when Morgan asked Matthieson for Mrs. McIntyre's deed; and, on receiving it, Morgan turned to Mrs. McIntyre, then present, and handed her the deed, saying that he gave her the property for faithful service, and because of their marriage contract, and that the place was now her home. Nevertheless he asked her not to record the deed, stating that there might be objection from his children, and that for his better contentment he wished her to return the deed to Matthieson to hold for her. This she did; and, after she had left the room, Morgan remarked that that deed was "out from under the agreement."

Then, before Matthieson left the house, Morgan asked him to bring Mrs. Matthieson that evening, saying he wished to deliver her deed to her. The Matthiesons arrived early in the evening, and immediately at Morgan's request Matthieson handed him Mrs. Matthieson's deed. Thereupon Morgan passed the deed to the lady, telling her that he had that afternoon given Mrs. McIntyre a deed to the home place, and added that he had been promising Mrs. Matthieson a present for twenty-five years and was now giving her a lot in Hollywood. Mrs. Matthieson, taking the deed, laid it on the mantel with her purse and gloves. Morgan then said that Mrs. McIntyre had agreed to let Matthieson hold her deed while he himself lived, and asked Mrs. Matthieson as a favor to him to let her husband hold her deed likewise, so that it would not be recorded during Morgan's lifetime. Mrs. Matthieson assented, and, as they left, handed her deed to her husband.

According to the testimony, Morgan told both Mrs. McIntyre and Mrs. Matthieson that he might want to buy the properties back from them, in which case he would pay them certain amounts, which he named.

Nothing more was done with the deeds until the day of Morgan's funeral, at which time Matthieson recorded the deeds made in favor of his wife and her sister, and also the deeds to the two grandchildren; and, after the deeds had been recorded, he gave them to the respective grantees.

While such was the testimony at the trial, given by the witnesses for the defendant, Mrs. McIntyre's testimony was in conflict with that previously given by her in a deposition, wherein she admitted that she knew of the deposit agreement when it was being prepared, and that it had been handed to her at that time to look over. She said also, in reference to the return of her deed to Matthieson, that that was done because Morgan did not want anybody to interfere with the instructions he had given Matthieson, and that all the deeds were to be held under the same instructions. Nothing was said in her deposition about her deed and Mrs. Matthieson's being "out from under the agreement." Likewise Matthieson's testimony was impeached by an affidavit made by him on September 22, 1925, before the suit was begun, and when he was acting as special administrator of the Morgan estate. In that affidavit, after stating how the deeds were made and setting forth a copy of the deposit agreement, he declared that the four deeds were delivered to him by Morgan after being shown to Mrs. McIntyre and Mrs. Matthieson "for the purpose of apprising them of the existence of said deeds, it being the intention and desire of said decedent that said deeds be kept by affiant under the terms and conditions of said memorandum of agreement herein set forth." He declared also that the deeds remained continuously in his possession until recorded, and that no other or further instructions were ever given him, except that Morgan had said that he might want to recall them for financial reasons, and that, if demand had been made by Morgan upon him, he would have surrendered the deeds to Morgan. This affidavit was made for use in connection with a return filed for the purpose of fixing the federal estate tax, and was made by Matthieson at the request of his coexecutor Pollock, to whom Matthieson had previously made like verbal statements.

Further evidence casting doubt upon the testimony concerning delivery to the two women consisted of two letters written by Morgan in his own hand, and found in his safety deposit box after his death. One was written April 22, 1925, the very day after the alleged deliveries, the other on April 23d, and both were addressed to Morgan's administrator, or all whom it may concern. In those letters, idiocratically spelled, Morgan states, in substance, that on April 21st he deeded the home place to Mrs. McIntyre, but that she had "secured the transaction" through threats of bringing him into court in connection with his agreement to marry her, and that what he had done was to escape notoriety and rather than to have his "good name villified"; and in the letter of April 23d he expressed a wish to have the administrators "help her to the amount of $1,000 to $1,500 dollars, but not the Home place." The letters were witnessed by Morgan's secretary, to whom he said that they were important documents and would mean a great deal after his death.

These letters, calculated indeed to "cause doubt" in the mind of the depositary, are significant aids to the interpretation of the peculiar language of the deposit agreement; and, when read with that agreement, necessarily cast discredit on the testimony of the parties interested in the deeds.

While Mrs. Matthieson's testimony was not directly impeached, as was that of her husband and her sister, yet the alleged delivery of the deed to her was so concatenated with that of the deed to Mrs. McIntyre as to put both, as Matthieson is reported by one of plaintiffs' witnesses to have said, in the same basket. The letters help also to point the meaning of certain remarks of Morgan during his last illness. To his daughter, Mrs. Pollock, and her husband, one of the executors, who were sitting at his bedside on an occasion when Matthieson and Mrs. McIntyre left the room together, Morgan said, according to Pollock's testimony, "Watch them, they will steal everything you have got; there is an important paper, find it; it means thirty thousand dollars to the estate."

The trial court found, among other things, that the deed to Mrs. Matthieson had been delivered to her husband by Morgan with instructions to hold it for Morgan during his life, but subject to surrender upon his demand, and in no event to record the deed until after Morgan's death; that it was not Morgan's intention to divest himself of title or to vest a present title in Mrs. Matthieson; that there never had been a delivery of the deed to Mrs. Matthieson; and that the property formed part of the Morgan estate. The court accordingly held the executors entitled to have the deed canceled and possession of the property surrendered to the estate.

There is no attempt on the part of Mrs. Matthieson to found investiture of title in herself upon the deposit of the deeds with her husband under the agreement of April 20th. It is conceded that Morgan's retention of control defeated transmission of title. 9 Cal. Jur. 163, 171.

[1, 2] The defendant does insist, however, that there was a personal delivery to her by Morgan, whereby her deed was removed from the operation of the agreement, and she acquired absolute title on the evening of April 21st. That issue involved a disputed question of fact which it was the function of the trial judge to determine from the facts and circumstances in evidence. It was for him to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses, to weigh their testimony, and draw therefrom his inferences. Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 368, 382, 224 P. 455, 56 A. L. R. 734; Duffy v. Duffy, 71 Cal. App. 251, 258, 235 P. 62.

[3] In all such cases, evidence as to the delivery of a deed, not recorded until after the chief actor's death, must necessarily be closely scrutinized; and the law demands that such a deed shall have in its support evidence clear, unequivocal, and convincing, such as satisfies the court of actual intent to pass immediate title. It is manifest from the written decision of the trial court that the judge did not find the evidence in behalf of the defendant to be of a convincing character, and concluded that the preponderance of the evidence was in favor of plaintiffs. Though Mrs. Matthieson was not directly impeached, yet the judge was not bound to give implicit faith to her testimony. He was justified in testing its verity by the conduct of the parties, the distinctive characteristics of the transaction, and all the attendant circumstances. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 128, 113 P. 147; Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 722, 723, 141 P. 217; Caldwell v. Weiner, 203 Cal. 543, 546, 264 P. 1110.

[4] Our statement of the evidence, as gathered from the record, exhibits abundant justification for the decision rendered, and the finding of the trial court is conclusive on this appeal.

[5] The defendant complains of the admission of evidence concerning Mrs. McIntyre's deed and the precautions taken in relation to it by Morgan. In the admission of that testimony the court did not err. The deeds were made as parts of one scheme. And, in respect of the alleged personal deliveries, one in the afternoon, the other in the evening, of April 21st, Mrs. Matthieson's deed was so linked to her sister's as to make the circumstances surrounding both occurrences proper evidentiary matter as an aid in arriving at the intent and real meaning of the transaction. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 645, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703; Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 380, 156 P. 509.

[6] The letters and subsequent declarations of Morgan were also admissible, not to disparage the deed, but to give light on the question whether in any of his dealings about the deeds Morgan's intent was to divest himself of title. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 648, 649, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703; Fisher v. Oliver, 174 Cal. 781, 788, 164 P. 800.

[7] In cases of this character, the truth cannot always be elicited by focusing the evidence sharply on the precise point in dispute. There are often sidelights of revealing power; and reasonable freedom must be accorded in judging the relevancy of evidence and sifting the facts. We are satisfied that no undue latitude was permitted in this instance.

The judgment is affirmed.

LAMPLE v. McDOUGALL. (Civ. 4015.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 8, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 10, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 7, 1930.

1. Deeds $\S$ 194(2)—Presumption is that deed found among papers of grantor after his death was never delivered.

Where deed which has been duly executed and acknowledged is subsequently found among papers of grantor after his death, presumption arises that it was never delivered, and burden of proof rests on party claiming under deed, notwithstanding provisions of Civ. Code, $\S$ 1055, which provides that grant duly executed is presumed to have been delivered at its date.

2. Deeds $\S$ 194(2)—Burden of proving deed found among grantor's papers was delivered rests on claimant.

Where deed which has been duly executed and acknowledged is found among papers of grantor after his death, burden of proving delivery of deed rests on party claiming thereunder.

3. Deeds ⚡208(2)—Evidence held to support finding that deed found among grantor's papers was never delivered.

In action to quiet title to property, deed to which was found among papers of grantor after his death, evidence held to support implied finding that deed was never delivered.

4. Quieting title ⚡29—Where husband devised all property to wife, husband's heirs, during wife's lifetime, could not attack deed found among husband's papers after his death conveying land to wife as regards claim that action to quiet title was barred by laches (Civ. Code, §§ 700, 1386, subd. 8).

Where husband, after bequeathing all his property to his wife, executed deed conveying certain land to his wife, which deed was found among his papers after his death, husband's heirs, during lifetime of wife, could not maintain action questioning validity of deed, as regards claim that cause of action to quiet title was barred by laches, since, if they would take anything, they would take under Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8, which provides for succession of property of surviving spouse, and as heirs had mere expectancy which is not deemed interest of any kind under section 700.

5. Evidence ⚡271(17), 317(18)—Statement of defendant's intestate showing that property had been conveyed to her held hearsay and self-serving.

In action to quiet title, statement of defendant's intestate tending to show that property had been conveyed to her held inadmissible as hearsay and self-serving.

6. Executors and administrators ⚡453(2)—Where husband had devised all property to wife, judgment that wife's administrator in suit by husband's administrator to quiet title had no right to land held erroneous.

Where husband devised all property to his wife, and subsequently executed deed conveying certain land to his wife, which deed was found among his papers after his death, in suit by administrator of husband's estate after death of wife to quiet title to land, judgment that administrator of wife's estate had no right, title, and interest to land held erroneous, since, on settlement of husband's estate, residue would go to wife's estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by Agneda E. Lample, as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Peter Paulson, deceased, against Donald McDougall, as administrator of the estate of Trena Paulson, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed as modified.

Eric Lyders, of San Francisco, and C. H. S. Bidwell, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to 20 acres of land. The complaint also states a cause of action for the recovery of money, but the court granted a nonsuit as to that cause of action, and it need not be further considered. Judgment was entered quieting plaintiff's title to the land, and the defendant has appealed.

The plaintiff sues as the administratrix with will annexed of the estate of Peter Paulson, deceased. The defendant is the administrator of the estate of Trena Paulson, deceased. The decedents were husband and wife. The land in suit was the separate property of the husband. October 9, 1912, he executed the will referred to, devising and bequeathing all his property to his wife. November 24, 1919, Peter Paulson signed and acknowledged a deed purporting to convey the land to his wife "in consideration of love and affection." February 11, 1921, he rented a safe deposit box at a bank, giving instructions that no one was to have access thereto but "just himself." March 23, 1922, he died. The deed was in this safe deposit box at the time of his death. Trena Paulson did not file the will for probate, but caused the deed to be duly recorded April 3, 1922. She held possession of the land and exercised dominion over it until May 14, 1925, when she died intestate. It appears that neither the husband nor the wife left any surviving children, but that fact is immaterial in this case. That is a question to be determined in the administration of their respective estates. The only issue of fact in this case is whether the deed referred to was ever delivered by Peter Paulson to his wife.

[1-3] Appellant relies on section 1055 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "A grant duly executed is presumed to have been delivered at its date." There is a conflict in the decisions as to whether the presumption mentioned in that section relates to the fact of delivery or merely to the time of delivery after the fact of delivery has been proved. For the purposes of this opinion, it may be conceded that the presumption relates to the fact of delivery as well as to the time of delivery. "Where a deed which has been duly executed and acknowledged is subsequently found in the possession of the grantor, a presumption arises that it was never delivered, and the burden of proof rests upon the party claiming under the deed. The rule applies where a deed is found among the papers of the grantor after his death." 18 C. J. 417; Tweedale v. Barnett, 172 Cal. 271, 275, 156 P. 483; Donahue v. Sweeny, 171 Cal. 388, 390, 153 P. 708; City Lumber Co. v. Brown, 46 Cal. App. 603, 606, 189 P. 830. The defendant called a witness to prove that Peter Paulson stated, subsequent to the date of the deed, that he had conveyed the land to his wife. The only rational inference, however, from the conflicting statements of the witness, is that the husband, in the language of the witness, "wanted her to have the property," but did not say he had conveyed it to her. Up to the time of his death, he managed the property as his own, and it does not appear that his wife had any voice in the control thereof. The evidence fully supports the implied finding that the deed was never delivered.

[4] The answer alleges that the plaintiff's cause of action is barred by laches. This contention is based upon the erroneous theory that the heirs of Peter Paulson, at all times since his death, could have maintained an action to have it adjudged that the deed was never delivered. If such heirs succeed to any part of the property, they will take under the provisions of subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code. Subject to the contingency mentioned in that subdivision, Trena Paulson took title in fee simple under her husband's will. She could have sold the property or disposed of it by will to the exclusion of her deceased husband's heirs. During her lifetime they had no interest in the property, and, of course, could maintain no action in relation thereto. "A mere possibility, such as the expectancy of an heir apparent, is not to be deemed an interest of any kind." Civ. Code, § 700.

[5] Appellant contends that he should have been permitted to prove statements of Trena Paulson tending to show that the property had been conveyed to her. Such evidence would have been hearsay and self-serving.

[6] The judgment is erroneous in adjudging that the defendant, "as administrator of the estate of Trena Paulson, deceased, has not any estate, right, title, interest or claim whatever in or to said real property hereinabove described, or in or to any part or portion thereof." Upon the settlement of the estate of Peter Paulson, the residue of the estate remaining, after payment of debts and expenses of administration, will go to the estate of Trena Paulson, and will be subject to the payment of her debts and the expenses of administration of her estate. In the proceeding to administer her estate, it will be determined whether or not she left issue and whether or not she made a will disposing of the property in suit, questions which manifestly cannot be determined in this action. The proper judgment to be rendered in such a case as this appears in Rice v. Carey, 170 Cal. 748, 750, 151 P. 135.

The judgment is modified by adding to the part thereof quoted herein the words "except such title, estate and interest as vested in Trena Paulson as heir at law or devisee under the last will and testament of Peter Paulson, deceased." As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

In re POZZO'S GUARDIANSHIP.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 11, 1930.

1. Insane persons ⇨26—Order appointing guardian constituted decision that facts conferring jurisdiction were present, and in absence of appeal would be binding if incompetents had notice.

Order appointing guardian constituted decision by court that facts necessary to confer jurisdiction were present, and that determination in absence of appeal would be binding if incompetent persons for whom guardian was appointed had legal notice of the proceedings.

2. Insane persons ⇨26—Erroneous determination of question whether court appointing guardian had jurisdiction, would not show lack of jurisdiction.

Erroneous determination of question whether court appointing guardian of adult incompetent persons had jurisdiction of either subject-matter or of persons, would not show a lack of jurisdiction.

3. Insane persons ⇨13—Incompetents were entitled to statutory notice of time and place of hearing of petition for letters of guardianship of their persons and estates (Code Civ. Proc. § 1763).

Incompetent adult persons for whom guardian was appointed, were entitled to at least five days' notice of time and place of hearing of petition for letters of guardianship of their persons and estates, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1763, as jurisdictional prerequisite of court, and if notice was not given, order appointing guardian would be void, since finding of court cannot bind incompetent persons if in fact they had no notice.

4. Insane persons ⇨25—Upon motion to vacate order appointing guardian, court upon new evidence could decide wards had no notice, jurisdiction of person depending upon fact thereof.

On motion accompanied by petition and affidavit to set aside and vacate order appointing guardian of adult incompetent persons and their estates, court upon new evidence would have had power to decide that wards had received no legal notice in fact, for, at least upon direct attack, jurisdiction of person depends upon fact of notice rather than upon record of notice.

5. Insane persons ⇨25—Affidavit of service of notice on incompetents introduced on motion to vacate order appointing guardian, is presumably affidavit which was before court appointing guardian notwithstanding alteration.

Notwithstanding that affidavit of service of notice upon adult incompetent persons for whom guardian was appointed contained alteration of date when introduced upon motion to vacate order appointing guardian, affidavit was presumably identical affidavit of service of notice which was before court at time guardian was appointed, since there is a presumption in favor of the regularity of judgment.

6. Insane persons ☞27—It may be assumed alteration in affidavit of service upon incompetents in evidence without objection was accounted for to court appointing guardian (Code Civ. Proc. § 1982; Pen. Code §§ 113, 132, 470).

Since there is presumption in favor of regularity of judgment, it may be assumed that alteration in affidavit of service of notice upon adult incompetents, for whom guardian was appointed, was properly and sufficiently accounted for when it was received in evidence by stipulation, and without objection, by court appointing guardian, doing away with necessity of one offering it to satisfactorily account for condition, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1982, since unauthorized alteration of affidavit after being sworn to, or spurious or clandestine alteration, would likewise be unlawful under Pen. Code, §§ 113, 132, 470.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Proceedings for the appointment of a guardian of Francis Pozzo and another, contested by Carmen Pozzo, in which Frank Pozzo was appointed guardian of the persons and estates of the adult incompetent persons. A subsequent order set aside and vacated the order appointing the guardian, and the guardian appeals. Reversed, and a new trial of the motion ordered.

Whalen, Harzfeld & O'Brien, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Oneal and C. E. Luckhardt, both of San Jose, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Justice Koford prior to his death, is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court:

After proceedings to that end had in the superior court of the county of Santa Clara, Frank Pozzo was appointed guardian of the persons and estates of Francis Pozzo and Constance Pozzo, adult incompetent persons. The order was made on the 17th of August, 1928. Thereafter on the 18th of September, 1928, Carmen Pozzo, mother of said adult incompetent persons, served and filed a notice of motion, accompanied by a petition and affidavit to set aside and vacate the order appointing guardian of August 17, 1928. Thereafter on the 22d of January, 1929, a new notice of motion was served and filed for the same order specifying that the motion would be made on January 29, 1929. On the day last named, after hearing the motion, the court granted the same, setting aside and vacating the said order appointing guardian. This is an appeal by Frank Pozzo from the said order last named.

[1, 2] The grounds of the motion and the grounds upon which the said order are defended by the respondent are that the court making the order of August 17, 1928, had no jurisdiction either of subject-matter or of persons for several reasons. With respect to most of these grounds, the original order appointing guardian constituted a decision by the court that the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction were present. Such determination, in the absence of appeal, in this proceeding would be binding if the incompetent persons had legal notice of the proceedings. The erroneous determination of these questions by the court making the original order would not show a lack of jurisdiction.

[3] The main ground upon which the order appealed from is defended, is, that the incompetent persons never had legal notice of the time and place of the hearing of the petition for the appointment of guardian. With respect to this jurisdictional fact, a finding of the court cannot bind the incompetent persons, if, in fact, they had no notice of the hearing. Legal notice to them was jurisdictional. They were entitled to at least five days' notice of the time and place of hearing of the petition for letters of guardianship of their persons and estates. (Code Civ. Proc., § 1763.) This notice is jurisdictional and if not given, the order appointing guardian is void. Snyder v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 274 P. 337; Grinbaum v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 528, 221 P. 635; McGee v. Hayes, 127 Cal. 336, 59 P. 767, 78 Am. St. Rep. 57; Estate of Eikerenkotter, 126 Cal. 54, 58 P. 370; 33 Cor. Jur., pp. 1079, 1080; 34 Cor. Jur., p. 370.

[4-6] The question presented by this appeal is, therefore, whether the court could decide from the evidence before it that the previous order appointing guardian was made without jurisdiction of the persons of the wards for lack of legal notice. The court making the vacating order appealed from, heard no new and independent evidence. At the hearing of the motion all the files of the case were by stipulation considered as in evidence before the court, but no new evidence was received. In granting the motion, the court upon this evidence made written findings of fact and conclusions of law. The findings of fact upon the issue of notice recited that the affidavit of service of notice upon the incompetent persons specifies that the notice was served upon the 15th of August, 1928; that it was sworn to on the 16th of August; that on the face of the affidavit the figures 15 are crossed with a line and replaced by the figures 11, but that it does not appear from said affidavit when, or by whom, the said change in figures was made; that the change was not initialed; that the certificate of inability of the incompetent persons to attend court was signed and acknowledged by the medical superintendent of the State Home for Feeble Minded on the 16th day of August, 1928. Under the heading of conclusions of law, the court found that there was no jurisdiction of the said incompetent persons and that they had received no notice of the time and place of hearing of appellant's petition as required by law. Upon new evidence the court would have had power to decide that the wards had received no legal notice in fact, for, at least upon a direct attack, jurisdiction of the person depends upon the fact of notice rather than upon the record of notice (14 Cal. Jur., § 89, pp. 1025, 1026). Here, however, the court from a mere inspection of what amounts to the judgment roll of the order appointing guardian decided that no notice was given. Notwithstanding the above-mentioned alteration upon the face of that judgment roll, it was presumably the identical affidavit of service of notice which was before the first court at the time the guardian was appointed. Several reasons may be stated for this. There is a presumption in favor of the regularity of the judgment. 34 Cor. Jur. 352, 353; 15 Cal. Jur., pp. 67, 68, 75, 76. From this it may be assumed that the alteration in the affidavit was properly and sufficiently accounted for when it was received in evidence by the first court. The unauthorized alteration of the affidavit after being sworn to, or the spurious or clandestine alteration of the affidavit in the custody of the county clerk after the first hearing would likewise be unlawful. (Pen. Code, §§ 470, 113, 132.) Finally, while it is true that when a mutilated or altered document is offered in evidence, it devolves upon the one offering it to satisfactorily account for its condition before it may be received in evidence (Code Civ. Proc., § 1982), in this case it was received by stipulation and without objection.

These presumptions negative all the possible grounds we are able to think of which would authorize the second court to decide without new evidence that the notice was not in fact timely served, or that the record of the guardianship proceedings showed upon their face that no legal notice was given.

We must, therefore, hold that the evidence given upon the motion to vacate the order appointing guardian was insufficient to support the court's decision that the order appointing guardian was void. The order appealed from is reversed, and a new trial of the motion is ordered.

BERG v. TRAEGER, Sheriff. (Civ. 5659.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 6, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 8, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 7, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨23—District Court of Appeal must take cognizance of own jurisdiction, though jurisdiction to pass upon appeal has not been questioned.

Though jurisdiction of District Court of Appeal to pass upon pending appeal was not questioned in case, nevertheless it must at all times take cognizance of its own jurisdiction.

2. Courts ⇨472(6)—Superior and municipal courts have no concurrent jurisdiction in cause of action at law arising within city having municipal court or outside, but within county (Const. art. 6, § 13, and § 5, as amended November 6, 1928; Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, Act 5238, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2; Code Civ. Proc., § 76, as amended).

Under Const. art. 6, § 13 and Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, Act 5238, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2, providing municipal court has exclusive original jurisdiction of all civil cases arising within city at law for $2,000 or less, and Const. art. 6, § 5, as amended November 6, 1928 and Code Civ. Proc. § 76, as amended, providing superior court has original jurisdiction in all civil cases, except those in which jurisdiction is given to municipal court, superior court and municipal court do not have concurrent jurisdiction of cause of action at law arising either within city having municipal court or outside city, but within county.

3. Appeal and error ⇨64—District Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction of appeal from superior court's judgment affirming municipal court's judgment in action for $999 and interest (Const. art. 6, §§ 4, 4b, 13, and § 5, as amended November 6, 1928; Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, Act 5238, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2; Code Civ. Proc. § 76, as amended).

Under Const. art. 6, § 13 and section 5, as amended November 6, 1928, and Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, Act 5238, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2, and Code Civ. Proc. § 76, as amended, providing that municipal courts and superior court have no concurrent jurisdiction of cause of action at law arising within city having municipal court, and Const. art. 6, § 4b, giving District Courts of Appeal jurisdiction of cases in which superior court has original jurisdiction, so that action for $999 and interest in municipal court appealed to superior court was not within appellate jurisdiction of Supreme Court, under Const. art. 6, § 4, there was no right of appeal to District Court of Appeal from decision of superior court.

4. Constitutional law ⇨111—Change in appellate jurisdiction of District Court of Appeal, effected by statutory amendment concerning municipal courts, related to remedy only (Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2).

The change in appellate jurisdiction of District Court of Appeal, effected by amendment of Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, Act 5238, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2, providing that each municipal court has exclusive original jurisdiction of all civil cases and actions arising within city of cases at law in which demand exclusive of interest of value of property in controversy is $2,000 or less, related to change of remedy only.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1—Right of appeal must be based on Constitution or statutes.

Appeals have no existence at common law, and any right of appeal must be based upon some provision of the Constitution or statutes.

6. Appeal and error  64—District Court of Appeal cannot consider appeal from superior court's judgment affirming municipal court's judgment in action for $999 and interest, where, during pendency, act withdrew jurisdiction in enlarging jurisdiction of municipal court (Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, Act 5238, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2; Pol. Code, § 327).

District Court of Appeal was without jurisdiction to pass upon appeal from judgment of superior court affirming judgment of the municipal court in action to recover $999 and interest as damages for conversion of automobile, where, during pendency of appeal, Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, Act 5238, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2, enlarged jurisdiction of municipal court, thereby changing appellate jurisdiction of District Court of Appeal, and since persons acting under any statute are deemed to have acted in contemplation of power of repeal under Pol. Code, § 327, so providing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action by Enoch Berg against William I. Traeger, as Sheriff of Los Angeles County. A judgment adverse to defendant in municipal court of the city of Los Angeles was affirmed by the superior court of Los Angeles county, and the defendant appeals therefrom. Appeal dismissed.

Nathan M. Dicker and Abe Richman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. E. McManus, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ELLIOT CRAIG, Justice pro tem. This action was commenced and prosecuted to judgment in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles. Defendant appealed from that judgment to the superior court of Los Angeles county. The superior court affirmed that judgment, and defendant on March 30, 1927, appealed to this court from the judgment of the superior court affirming said judgment of the municipal court. This is an action to recover the sum of $999 and interest as damages arising out of the alleged conversion of an automobile by the defendant as sheriff of Los Angeles county. The record shows that the cause of action arose within Los Angeles county.

[1] The jurisdiction of this court to pass upon said pending appeal has not been questioned in this case; nevertheless, this court must at all times take cognizance of its own jurisdiction. Discussion is required on only two questions:

First. Is there now a right of appeal to this court in a case of this kind?

Second. If the first question is answered in the negative, then does this court now have jurisdiction to pass upon an appeal heretofore duly perfected, but not yet decided?

Our discussion is somewhat shortened by reference to the case of Johnston v. Wolf, 280 P. 980, decided by the Supreme Court of this state on September 27, 1929, on hearing after judgment in the District Court of Appeal (274 P. 1028), under date of February 14, 1929. That decision rests upon the jurisdiction of municipal courts, as provided by section 29 of the act authorizing the establishment of municipal courts, etc. (Deering's Gen. Laws, Consol. Supp. 1925-27, p. 1607), as said section stood prior to the legislative amendments of 1929, effective August 14, 1929. The opinion as rendered by the Supreme Court does not disclose any consideration of said 1929 amendments, although said amendments became effective while the motion to dismiss was pending in that court.

Prior to August 14, 1929, said section 29 did provide that municipal courts shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, amounts to $1,000 or less, arising in the city where the court exists, and concurrent jurisdiction with the superior and justices' courts of causes of like amount, arising outside of the city, but within the county in which the court is situated. Section 13, art. 6, of the Constitution provides: "Notwithstanding any provision contained in this article, the legislature may fix by law the jurisdiction of municipal courts and inferior courts in cities having municipal courts. * * * " As amended by chapter 477, Statutes of 1929, p. 837, said section 29 now provides that: "Each municipal court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all civil cases and actions, arising within the city * * * in which such municipal court is established, of the following classes:

"1. All cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to two thousand dollars or less. 2. * * * 3. * * *," and "Each municipal court shall have original jurisdiction of all cases specified in subdivisions 1, 2 and 3 hereinabove, arising outside the city in which a municipal court is established, and within the county in which such municipal court is established. * * * "

In conformity with the provisions of section 5, art. 6, of the Constitution, as amended November 6, 1928, section 76 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended by the Legislature, effective August 14, 1929. Said code section now reads: "The superior courts shall have original jurisdiction: 1. In all civil cases and proceedings except cases and proceedings in which jurisdiction is or shall be given by law to municipal or to justices' or other inferior courts, and in all such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for. * * *

[2] A study of the Constitution and statutes on jurisdiction of superior and municipal courts, as demonstrated by the material parts thereof fully set forth above, shows that there is now no instance of concurrent jurisdiction in the superior court and the municipal court in an action at law wherein the cause of action arises either within the city in which such municipal court is situated or outside such city but within the county.

The jurisdiction of District Courts of Appeal is provided for and controlled by section 4b, art. 6, of the Constitution, to wit: "The district courts of appeal shall have appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts (except in cases in which appellate jurisdiction is given to the supreme court) in all cases at law in which the superior courts are given original jurisdiction. * * *

[3] An action of this kind is not within the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Section 4, art. 6, Const.

It is therefore apparent from all of the foregoing that there is now no right of appeal to this court in a case such as the one before us.

We next take up the second question. "Any statute may be repealed at any time, except when it is otherwise provided therein. Persons acting under any statute are deemed to have acted in contemplation of this power of repeal." Pol. Code, § 327.

As said by Chief Justice Chase in Ex parte McCardle, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 506, 514, 19 L. Ed. 264, and approved by the Supreme Court of this state in People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 65, 71, 112 P. 866, 37 L. R. A. (N. C.) 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148: "Jurisdiction is power to declare the law, and when it ceases to exist, the only function remaining to the court is that of announcing the fact and dismissing the cause."

[5] "Appeals have no existence at common law, and any right of appeal must be based upon some provision of the Constitution or of the statute." Pacific Gas Radiator Co. v. Superior Court, supra; Gale v. Tuolumne Water Co., 169 Cal. 46, 145 P. 532.

[6] In the case of Pacific Gas Radiator Co. v. Superior Court, supra, at page 202 of 70 Cal. App., 232 P. 995, 996, the court said: "As a general rule every state has full authority to control all remedies which it may provide, and may abolish a previously existing remedy by appeal, even as to cases which have been appealed. * * * When the jurisdiction of an appellate court depends upon a statute, which is repealed after an appeal has been taken, but is still undetermined, the appeal should be dismissed. Ex parte McCardle, 74 U. S. 506, 19 L. Ed. 264. In People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 65, 112 P. 866, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148, our Supreme Court, after reviewing the authorities at great length, announces the rule to be that when pending an appeal from a judgment the law which is its sole support is repealed, the appellate court cannot proceed further with the litigation. This decision cites many authorities to the effect that, where jurisdiction depends upon a statute, suits brought during the existence of the statute fall at once upon its repeal."

We conclude, therefore, that this court is now without jurisdiction to pass upon this appeal.

The appeal to this court is dismissed.

H. E. WOODWARD, Doing Business Under the Firm Name and Style of Alamitos Heights Realty Company, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Leo DREHER, Defendant and Appellant. (Civ. 5741.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 6, 1930.

Appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Hartley Shaw, Judge, affirming a judgment of the Municipal Court in an action to recover real estate broker's commission. Appeal dismissed.

Louis N. Whealton and Raymond J. Kirkpatrick, both of Long Beach, for appellant.

Doyle, Clark & Thomas and W. Ward Johnson, all of Long Beach, for respondent.

ELLIOT CRAIG, Justice pro tem. This action was commenced and prosecuted to judgment in the municipal court of the City of Long Beach. Defendant appealed to the superior court of Los Angeles county from that judgment. The superior court affirmed the judgment, and defendant on June 28, 1927, appealed to this court from the judgment of the superior court affirming said judgment of the municipal court.

This is an action to recover the sum of $475, and the cause of action is based upon a written agreement to pay a commission to a realtor for procuring a purchaser for certain real property. The cause of action arose, as disclosed by the record, within Los Angeles county and within the city of Long Beach.

This appeal must be dismissed upon the ground that this court is now without jurisdiction to proceed further in the case. The law applicable hereto is fully set forth in the decision in Berg v. Traeger, 285 P. 332, this day filed by this court.

The appeal to this court is dismissed.

D. Q. SERVICE CORPORATION v. SECURITIES LOAN & DISCOUNT CO. ★
(Civ. 5657.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 6, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 8, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 7, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨23—District Court of Appeal must take cognizance of own jurisdiction, though jurisdiction to pass upon appeal is unquestioned.

Though present jurisdiction of District Court of Appeal to pass upon pending appeal is not questioned, nevertheless court must take cognizance of its own jurisdiction.

2. Appeal and error ⇨64—District Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction of appeal from judgment of superior court in action for $430.10 for conversion of truck tires, which is within original jurisdiction of municipal court (Const. art. 6, §§ 5, 11, 13; Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, Act 5238, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2; Code Civ. Proc. § 76).

Since under Const. art. 6, §§ 11, 13, and Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-27, Act 5238, § 29, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2, action for recovery of $430.10, as damages for alleged conversion of truck tires, was within original jurisdiction of municipal court and not within original jurisdiction of superior court of Los Angeles county, where municipal courts exist under Const. art. 6, § 5, Code Civ. Proc. § 76, there is no right of appeal from judgment of superior court to give District Court of Appeal jurisdiction.

3. Constitutional law ⇨111—Statutory right to review on appeal may be taken away by repeal, even as to causes previously appealed.

A statutory right to have cases reviewed on appeal may be taken away by repeal of statute, even as to causes which had been previously appealed to higher courts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Action by the D. Q. Service Corporation against the Securities Loan & Discount Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Pacht, Pelton & Warne and William W. Leavitt, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry G. Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ELLIOT CRAIG, Justice pro tem. This action was commenced in the superior court of Los Angeles county for the recovery of the sum of $430.10 as damages for an alleged conversion of two truck tires. Judgment was in favor of defendant. On November 26, 1926, plaintiff appealed to this court from that judgment. The record shows that the cause of action arose, if at all, within Los Angeles county.

[1] The present jurisdiction of this court to pass upon said pending appeal has not been questioned in this case; nevertheless, this court must take cognizance of its own jurisdiction.

[2] An action of this kind is now within the original jurisdiction of the municipal court. Sections 11 and 13, art. 6, Const. of Cal.; Deering's Gen. Laws, Consol. Supp. 1925-27, p. 1607, and chapter 477, St. 1929, p. 837.

An action of this kind is not now within the original jurisdiction of the superior court of Los Angeles county (being a county wherein municipal courts exist). Citations, supra, re municipal courts; section 5, art. 6, Const.; Code Civ. Proc. § 76; Berg v. Traeger, 285 P. 332, decision filed in this court this day. It follows that there is now no right of appeal from the superior court judgment. Berg v. Traeger, supra.

A study of the Constitution and statutes discloses that no saving clause has been provided under either Constitution or statutes for a continuance of jurisdiction over a pending appeal in this kind of an action.

[3] The power of this court to pass upon an appeal heretofore duly perfected but not yet decided is fully discussed in Berg v. Traeger, supra. "A statutory right to have cases reviewed on appeal may be taken away, by a repeal of the statute, even as to causes which had been previously appealed." Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (8th Ed.) p. 794.

By reason of the foregoing and upon the authority of Berg v. Traeger, supra, we conclude that this court is now without jurisdiction in this case.

The appeal to this court is dismissed.

Rehearing Denied March 8, 1930.

Appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Hartley Shaw, Judge, affirming a judgment of the Municipal Court in an action for goods sold and delivered. Appeal dismissed.

D. A. Knapp, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Victor R. Hansen, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ELLIOT CRAIG, Justice pro tem. This action was commenced by plaintiff in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles. The complaint contained two causes of action. The first count was for the recovery of the sum of $620 upon an alleged indebtedness for certain goods, wares, merchandise, and labor, and the second count was for the recovery of the same sum of $620 upon an alleged account stated.

Plaintiff had judgment in his favor and defendant appealed to the superior court of Los Angeles county. The appeal before us is by defendant on June 23, 1927, from the judgment of the superior court affirming the judgment of the municipal court.

The record discloses that the causes of action arose, if at all, within the county of Los Angeles.

This appeal must be dismissed upon the ground that this court is now without jurisdiction to proceed further in the case. The law applicable hereto is fully set forth in the decision in Berg v. Traeger, 285 P. 332, this day filed by this court.

The appeal to this court is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Findlay against Homer S. Terry upon a foreign judgment. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dunn, White & Aiken and Hamilton Wright, all of Oakland, for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action on a foreign judgment, the validity and enforceability of which was challenged in the trial court by the defendant on the several grounds hereinafter mentioned, all of which were pleaded as special defenses in the answer and by the trial court sustained. Accordingly, judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiff has taken this appeal therefrom.

[1, 2] In determining the question of the enforceability of a judgment theretofore entered in a court of record of a sister state, it is a fundamental principle of law universally recognized, that the "full faith and credit" clause of the federal Constitution (article 4, § 1) requires only that the judgment be given such faith and credit as it had by the law or usage of the state of its origin. Board of Public Works v. Columbia College, 17 Wall. 521, 21 L. Ed. 687. The judgment here sued upon was entered by confession in the records of the circuit court of Piatt county, Ill.; and it appears without contradiction from the judgment itself as well as from the other court records introduced in evidence at the trial by appellant, that the judgment was entered by the clerk of said court in recess during the October term of said court in the year 1923; and admittedly under the law of that state, judgments by confession can be legally entered by the clerk only "in vacation." During "term time" they must be entered in open court. Wilson v. Josephson, 244 Ill. App. 366; Schmieg v. Burkhardt, 215 Ill. App. 240; Anderson v. Field, 6 Ill. App. 307; chapter 110, § 188, Smith's Illinois Rev. Stats. 1921. It follows, therefore, that the judgment in question was invalid under the law of the state of its origin, and consequently it is unenforceable here.

[3] In support of the judgment appellant argues that under the decisions of that state the term "in recess" is sometimes held to mean "in vacation." But, as pointed out in the case of Wilson v. Josephson, supra, which reviews many of the earlier Illinois cases upon the subject, the term "in recess" is construed to mean "in vacation" only when it appears that the recess interval extends over a period of more than one judicial day, and not where the adjournment is taken merely from day to day. In the present case the wording of the court documents, including the judgment, is that the judgment was entered in recess "during October term," and since there is nothing in the record indicating that the recess mentioned extended over a period of more than one judicial day, the language of the judgment is controlling.

In further support of the judgment, appellant seeks to invoke the aid of the legal presumption of regularity and verity with which all judgments of courts of record are clothed; and in this connection appellant cites a number of cases from Illinois, and from other jurisdictions interpreting the Illinois cases, to the effect that by virtue of statutory enactment in that state, a judgment entered by confession by the clerk "in vacation" has the same force and effect and is entitled to the benefit of the same presumptions as a judgment entered by the court. On the other hand, respondent calls attention to other Illinois decisions which evidently hold to the opposite view, upon the theory that in entering judgment by confession the clerk exercises no judicial power, but acts merely in a ministerial capacity. The latter view is apparently the one taken in this state. See opinion refusing hearing by Supreme Court in Shirran v. Dallas, 21 Cal. App. 405-423, 132 P. 454, 462; also, Old Settlers' Investment Company v. White, 158 Cal. 236, 110 P. 922. But, whatever may be the correct Illinois rule as to the status of such judgments, it does not aid in establishing the validity of the judgment under consideration here, because admittedly the statute referred to, in terms, is restricted to judgments entered by the clerk "in vacation," which, as the evidence shows and the court found, is not this case. Moreover, appellant frankly states in its brief that the point is presented upon the assumption that the judgment was entered "in vacation."

Another ground of attack upon the judgment in the trial court was that the court in which it was entered did not acquire jurisdiction over the person of respondent. This contention is based upon the following facts: The judgment was founded on a promissory note for the sum of $1,689.95, dated Findlay, Ill., January 25, 1908, and was signed by respondent, made payable on demand to "The Findlay Store Co.," and subsequently indorsed to appellant. Annexed to it and forming a part thereof was a warrant of attorney, reading as follows:

"And to secure the payment of said amount I hereby authorize, irrevocably, any attorney of any court of record to appear for me in such court, in term time or vacation, at any time hereafter, and confess judgment without process in favor of the holder of this note, for such amount as may appear to be unpaid thereon, together with costs and 10 per cent.

attorney's fees, and to waive and release all errors that may intervene in such proceedings, and consent to immediate execution upon such judgment, hereby ratifying and confirming all that my said attorney may do by virtue thereof."

Acting under the authority of said warrant of attorney, a cognovit or confession of judgment, as it is commonly called, was signed and filed in the circuit court by an attorney named Whitaker, and it was in pursuance thereof that the clerk assumed to enter the judgment. The particular contention respondent makes in reference to the point of jurisdiction is that said note was barred by the statute of limitations long prior to the institution of the proceeding which resulted in the entry of the judgment, that necessarily all authority granted under the warrant of attorney lapsed at the time of the expiration of the remedy to collect the note, and that consequently the cognovit or confession of judgment signed and filed by said attorney in pursuance of said warrant of attorney was void and conferred upon the court no jurisdiction whatever over the person of respondent.

It is definitely settled by the law of Illinois, and of other states as well, that a warrant of attorney, such as we have here, confers no authority to confess judgment on a note after the payee's remedy for the collection of the debt has become barred by the statute of limitations. Matzenbaugh v. Doyle, 156 Ill. 331, 40 N. E. 935; Walrod v. Manson, 23 Wis. 393, 99 Am. Dec. 187; Kahn v. Lesser, 97 Wis. 217, 72 N. W. 739; First National Bank of La Junta v. Mock, 70 Colo. 517, 203 P. 272, 21 A. L. R. 770, citing and following the Illinois and Wisconsin cases. Furthermore, it is held that where, without legal authority, an attorney enters the appearance of a defendant, the judgment based on such unauthorized act is void and may be collaterally attacked (Bruschke v. Der Nord Chicago Schuetzen Verein, 145 Ill. 433, 34 N. E. 417), and although a recital in the record to the effect that the defendant appeared by attorney is deemed conclusive proof of the fact that the attorney did so appear, it is only prima facie evidence of the authority of the attorney to appear, which latter fact the defendant is at full liberty to disprove (Welch v. Sykes, 3 Gilman [Ill.] 197, 44 Am. Dec. 689).

The determinative question presented by this branch of the case is, therefore, whether said note was, as respondent claims, barred by the statute of limitations prior to the institution of the proceedings in the circuit court, for if it was, then, under the authorities above cited, the power granted by the warrant of attorney expired with the remedy to collect the note, and any confession of judgment signed and filed in pursuance thereof subsequent to that time was legally insufficient to support a valid judgment. In this regard, it is conceded that the Illinois statute fixes a ten-year period within which actions on promissory notes may be commenced. Section 17, c. 83, Rev. Stats. of Ill. 1921. The action on this note was instituted in the circuit court on October 20, 1923, which was more than 15 years after the demand date of the note. The Illinois statute further provides, however, that if any payment shall have been made on the note, the period of limitation commences to run only from the time of such payment. The record of the Illinois court was introduced in evidence at the present trial by appellant and embodied in one of the documents forming part of said record was a copy of said note. On the reverse side of the note appeared certain entries indicating the payment of interest and part of the principal each year up to and including the year 1914. But in this connection the respondent testified without contradiction that he made no payments whatever on said note; that as a matter of fact the note was given by him for the credit and accommodation of his father and that he (respondent) received no part of the principal sum of the note; and that, although he understood that his father was to make payments on said note, he (respondent) did not authorize any such payments to be made, nor did he authorize or consent to the making of any of the indorsements of payment on said note. In that state of the record it cannot be held that the mere presence on the reverse side of the note of entries of payments had the effect of tolling the statute, for in the first place it is the law of that state that an "indorsement of partial payment on a note, made by the holder without the privity of the maker, is not of itself and uncorroborated, sufficient evidence of payment to repel the defense created by the statute of limitations." Metcalf v. Metcalf, 219 Ill. App. 98, citing other cases; Simmons v. Nelson, 48 Ill. App. 520. In other words, as held in Robinson v. Waddell, 184 Ill. App. 29, a mere indorsement of part payment on a note is not such evidence of part payment as will support the implication of a new promise and extend the period of the statute of limitations. And, secondly, it is also the law of that state that part payment on a note by any person, other than the one in whose favor the statute is running, does not operate to extend the period statute as to the latter if he has neither contributed to nor authorized such part payment. Davis v. Mann, 43 Ill. App. 301; Kallenbach v. Dickinson, 100 Ill. 427, 39 Am. Rep. 47; Deaton v. Deaton, 109 Ill. App. 7; Lash v. Bozarth, 78 Ill. App. 196. The states of Michigan and New York evidently follow the same rule. Borden v. Fletcher's Estate, 131 Mich. 220, 91 N. W. 145; Akin v. Van Wirt, 124 App. Div. 83, 108 N. Y. S. 327. We find nothing in the case of MacFarland v. Utz, 175 Ill. App. 525, stressed by appellant, at variance with the rule above stated.

[4, 5] Appellant argues that respondent's testimony related to extrinsic matters amounting to a collateral attack upon the judgment, and therefore was erroneous. But, as will be observed, the testimony had a direct bearing upon the question of want of jurisdiction of the Illinois court over the person of respondent; and it is a rule of general application that a judgment of a sister state is always open to attack on the ground of lack of jurisdiction of the court rendering the judgment over the person of the defendant. Chicago Life Ins. Co. v. Cherry, 244 U. S. 25, 37 S. Ct. 492, 61 L. Ed. 966; Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. Ed. 897; Estate of Hancock, 156 Cal. 804, 106 P. 58, 59, 134 Am. St. Rep. 177; Greenzweig v. Strelinger, 103 Cal. 278, 37 P. 398; 15 Cal. Jur. 245. In other words, as declared in the Estate of Hancock, supra: "A judgment of a court of record of another state differs in its conclusive effect from a judgment of a court of record of this state in one material respect, viz., that it is always open to the person against whom the judgment is attempted to be used to show by evidence other than the record of the judgment, and even by evidence opposed to recitals contained in such record, that the court purporting to give the judgment was without jurisdiction either of the cause or of the parties. If such lack of jurisdiction in one or the other of these respects is not made to appear, the judgment is as final and conclusive on collateral attack as would be a judgment of one of our own superior courts; but, if such lack of jurisdiction is made to appear, the judgment must be regarded as a nullity." See, also, Greenzweig v. Strelinger, supra; Estate of James, 99 Cal. 374, 33 P. 1122, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60. The cases cited and relied upon by appellant deal with the rule relating to domestic judgments and consequently are not in point. For the reasons above stated we are of the opinion that the testimony objected to was admissible upon the issue of jurisdiction.

[6, 7] During the argument before the trial court on motion for a new trial, appellant asked leave to introduce additional evidence for the purpose of showing, as it claimed, that the circuit court was actually in adjournment at the time the judgment by confession was entered by the clerk; also for the purpose of contradicting respondent's testimony to the effect that he gave the note for the accommodation of his father, and that he neither made payments thereon nor authorized the same to be made. The trial court denied such application. Since then and prior to the submission of the cause on appeal, appellant made application to this court, under rule 38 of the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal, and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, for an order permitting the production of such additional evidence; also of evidence showing that the statute of limitations was suspended by the absence of respondent from the state of Illinois.

It appears from the record, however, that all of the points upon which appellant now seeks to introduce evidence were raised and argued in the trial court prior to the rendition of its decision upon the merits, and that no application was made for continuance to obtain the additional evidence which it now seeks to introduce before this court; the reason assigned for not offering such evidence at the trial being that counsel representing appellant at the trial was not at that time aware that the judgment sued upon was, as now it is claimed, entered during an adjournment of court; and that he believed the other evidence mentioned was not admissible.

Under such circumstances, we are of the opinion that the situation is not such as comes within the purview of the rule of court and the section of the Code above mentioned. As held in Estate of Wirt (Cal. Sup.) 277 P. 118, 120: "Section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure is not intended to have application to cases wherein the production of original evidence was sought to be permitted in this court and the purpose of the production of such evidence would be to lead us to a reversal of the cause upon appeal." In other words, as indicated in Leal v. Leal (Cal. Sup.) 274 P. 965, the powers now vested in the reviewing courts on appeal authorize the taking of additional evidence when, in the discretion of the court and in the interest of justice, the record presented should be supplemented, but does not allow the cause to be tried de novo on the application of a party as a matter of right.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF FINDLAY (a Corporation), Plaintiff and Appellant, v. Homer S. TERRY, Defendant and Respondent. (Civ. 6677.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 29, 1930.

Application for an order permitting the taking of additional evidence. Denied.

Dunn, White & Aiken and Hamilton Wright, all of Oakland, for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appellant makes application, under the provisions of rule 38 of the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal, for an order permitting the taking of additional evidence in the above-entitled cause. The merits of the application have been discussed and determined in the decision this day filed ([Cal. App.] 285 P. 336) affirming the judgment on appeal. For the reasons and upon the grounds therein stated, the application is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action in replevin by the Western States Acceptance Corporation against the Bank of Italy, a corporation, Mrs. B. Kennon and another. From a judgment of nonsuit as to named defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arnold C. Lackenbach, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Ferrari and J. J. Posner, both of San Francisco, and S. M. Spurrier, of Stockton, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. The complaint herein sets forth a cause of action in replevin to obtain from defendants possession of a Lincoln automobile alleged to have been wrongfully converted. Judgment was prayed for the return of the property, or the recovery of its value in case delivery could not be had. By separate answers the three defendants, after denying the material allegations of the complaint, set up facts, by reason of which they averred, plaintiff was estopped from asserting any title to or right of possession of the car. Trial was had, and, at the close of plaintiff's case, motion was made for a nonsuit upon various grounds by defendants Bank of Italy and Mrs. B. Kennon. The motion was granted as to such defendants.

The main issue presented by plaintiff at the trial turned upon the question as to whether or not the car was purchased by plaintiff corporation from the Ford Company, on its own behalf, with retention of title in itself, to be thereafter delivered to defendant Ballard under a trust agreement, or whether the car was purchased by defendant Ballard with money obtained by him as a loan from plaintiff corporation. Upon this subject there was a decided conflict in the evidence, and, without more, a nonsuit would have been unjustified. Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., 198 Cal. 294, 244 P. 1077. Defendants, however, pleaded an estoppel, and this question was fully gone into as part of plaintiff's case. The evidence upon this subject was without conflict and conclusively showed that plaintiff was estopped from asserting its alleged title as against the particular defendants in whose favor the judgment of nonsuit was rendered. The question of title therefore became unimportant.

[1, 2] The facts show that on or about April 20, 1925, defendant Ballard was engaged in business as a retail dealer in automobiles at Sacramento. He represented the Lincoln automobile. At this time he was also vice president and a director of plaintiff corporation, which was engaged in the exclusive business of financing Ford and Lincoln automobiles. The Ford Motor Company of Delaware was doing business in San Francisco, but did not sell cars to any one but the recognized dealers. Ballard, being a recognized dealer in Lincoln cars at Sacramento, could buy Lincoln cars only from the Ford Company. He was desirous of acquiring for sale a certain type of Lincoln car, and he consulted the general manager of plaintiff corporation with reference to that company financing it. The manager knew Ballard, having had previous business relations with him, and he also knew that he was a Ford and Lincoln dealer at Sacramento and, further, that he was one of the directors of plaintiff corporation, and he agreed to the arrangement, and thereupon telephoned the Ford Company and obtained the motor number of the desired car. A check was drawn by plaintiff corporation for its full price, and was paid by it to the Ford Company, and delivery was made directly to Ballard. Prior or subsequent to the payment, Ballard executed a certain trust receipt in favor of plaintiff corporation, whereby he agreed to hold the car in trust as the property of plaintiff and not to operate the same for demonstration purposes, and, upon demand, to return it in an unused and good condition. He also agreed not to sell, incur, or otherwise dispose of the same, except upon written consent of plaintiff. About three weeks after Ballard was in possession of the car, he received a notice from the Ford Company informing him that there was a shortage of the type of car it had delivered to him, and requesting that he release the same to the firm of Gaudin & Pahl, Ford dealers, as that firm had a sale for this particular model. Ballard agreed to the arrangement on condition that the company would furnish him another car in its place, as soon as it arrived. Accordingly, Ballard sold the car to Gaudin & Pahl, for $4,660.50, and received a check for the same. At the time Gaudin & Pahl purchased the car they had no actual notice or knowledge of any claim of ownership, or of possession, or any interest in the same, by plaintiff corporation. Gaudin & Pahl thereafter sold the car to respondent, Mrs. Kennon, under a conditional sales contract, which contract was thereafter sold to respondent, Bank of Italy, which was carrying Gaudin & Pahl's paper. The bank gave credit to Gaudin & Pahl for the sum of $3,634.40, the balance of the purchase price due under respondent Kennon's contract. At the time the firm of Gaudin & Pahl made the sale to Mrs. Kennon it made application to the motor vehicle division for certificates of registration. A white certificate was issued to Mrs. Kennon as registered owner, and a pink certificate to the Bank of Italy as legal owner. Plaintiff learned of Ballard's sale and thereafter its officers had a conversation with him concerning the transaction, and Ballard thereupon offered some used cars to offset the amount he was indebted to the company. After investigation the company refused to accept the same and wrote to Ballard a series of letters demanding a settlement of his account. After acquiring knowledge of the sale of the car to respondent Kennon, no demand was made by plaintiff upon Ballard for a return of the same, nor was any notice of claim made upon respondents until some months later when this action was commenced, and only after plaintiff had finally failed to obtain a settlement with Ballard of his various transactions. Defendants Bank of Italy and Mrs. Kennon urgently insisted in the court below, and do here, that, irrespective of the question of title, plaintiff having negligently permitted Ballard, a known automobile dealer, to appear as the apparent owner with the right of disposition of the car, should be estopped from asserting title as against them. There can be no question that the evidence clearly establishes an estoppel. It is well settled in this state that if personal property is delivered to a buyer who is engaged in the business of selling property of the same kind and, with knowledge of the seller, is placed on display for sale with such other property, the holder of the reserved title is estopped to assert it as against a bona fide subvendee for value. In such a case the rights of the innocent subvendee do not depend upon the actual title or authority of the party with whom he deals directly, but are derived from the act of the real owner, which precludes such owner from disputing, as against the innocent party, the existence of the title or power which, through negligence or mistaken confidence, he has caused or allowed to be vested in the party making the sale. Pacific Finance Corporation v. Hendley (Cal. App.) 284 P. 736. Here, so far as the evidence before us shows, plaintiff did nothing whatsoever to protect the rights of innocent purchasers, and the apparent title was at all times in Ballard. The Gaudin & Pahl company was never informed by any one, nor did it have any knowledge whatsoever, of any kind or character, that plaintiff had any interest in the property. No bill of sale of the car was ever executed by the Ford Company to plaintiff corporation, nor was its alleged title ever registered with the motor vehicle division. Entire lack of notice of plaintiff's claimed interest misled respondents to their detriment.

[3, 4] The duty rests upon one financing a retail dealer to see to it that cars upon which he has a lien or other interest are not left under the domain or control of such sale dealers on his salesroom floor, to be offered to the public. Secret arrangements which place it in the power of a dealer to deceive unsuspecting purchasers should be, and they are, condemned. General Securities Corp. v. Reo Motor Co., 91 Cal. App. 16, 266 P. 576. Whether, therefore, plaintiff had or had not any interest in the car is unimportant, for if it had, it negligently permitted Ballard, a known automobile dealer in this make of car, to appear as apparent owner with the right of selling the same, and it should therefore be estopped from asserting its alleged title as against respondents, who are innocent purchasers without notice. Where one of two innocent purchasers must suffer through the act or negligence of a third person, the loss should fall upon the one who by his conduct created the circumstances which enabled the third party to perpetrate the wrong or cause the loss.

[5] The question of estoppel having been fully presented as part of plaintiff's case, and there being no conflict upon this subject, the conflict in the evidence as to title becomes unimportant and the court was justified in granting the nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed,

To justify payment to custodian of securities, borrower must have knowledge of fact of possession at time of each payment, mere possession alone being insufficient.

5. Principal and agent ⇨105(5)—No authority in agent arises by implication to receive principal before maturity.

No authority to agent arises by implication to receive principal of note secured by deed of trust before maturity.

6. Principal and agent ⇨105(8)—Where one having no authority to collect more than interest for first six months, and, lacking possession of indicia of indebtedness, solicited payment of principal before due, defendants made latter payment at their peril.

Where agent was expressly authorized to collect interest which had accrued for first six months only, and he lacked at all times possession of indicia of indebtedness, and solicited and obtained payment of principal before it was due, and, to induce such payment, offered reduction of principal of note secured by deed of trust, such circumstances put the defendants on inquiry as to agent's authority, and payments, other than first payment of interest, were made at defendants' peril.

7. Principal and agent ⇨154(1)—Where defendants paid note secured by trust deed to one without authority to collect it, situation was not changed by ultimate deed of reconveyance.

Where defendants paid amount of note secured by deed of trust to one who had no authority to collect it and who misappropriated money, situation was not changed by reason of ultimate delivery of deed of reconveyance which was delivered at time defendants made their last payment of small sum, where trustee, without inquiring as to payment of indebtedness, had deed of reconveyance signed by one of its officers, using ordinary form which recited payment of indebtedness in full, and which document passed into collector's hands without any direction from beneficiary under trust deed.

8. Principal and agent ⇨105(8)—Even habitual payment of interest to agent, who in turn remits to creditor, does not establish authority to receive principal.

Even habitual payment of interest to an agent, who in turn makes remittance to creditor, does not establish his authority to receive any part of principal.

9. Principal and agent ⇨137(1)—Habitual payment of interest to an agent, who in turn makes remittance to creditor, does not raise any estoppel against creditor as regards authority to collect principal.

Even habitual payment of interest to an agent, who in turn makes remittance to creditor, does not raise any estoppel against creditor to claim agent had no authority to collect principal.

10. Principal and agent ⇨166(2)—Payee of note secured by trust deed did not ratify unauthorized acts of person collecting principal and misappropriating money by accepting two payments from him, where payee did not know all of facts.

Payee of note secured by deed of trust did not ratify unauthorized acts of person collecting principal and misappropriating money collected by accepting two payments from such person, after meetings between payee and debtors in district attorney's office, where it did not appear that payee knew that person collecting money had represented that payee needed money, and if debtors would help her by payment in advance of maturity, she would deduct $50 from amount owing, and that it was on the strength of this statement that debtors delivered their checks drawn to his order.

11. Principal and agent ⇨166(1)—"Ratification" rests upon assent and must be made with full knowledge of all facts necessary to intelligent exercise of judgment.

Ratification rests upon assent, and to be binding, it must be made with full knowledge of all facts necessary to intelligent exercise of judgment.

12. Principal and agent ⇨169(1)—Intention to confirm agent's unauthorized acts, when implied from conduct, must be exhibited by acts inconsistent with any other hypothesis.

An intention to confirm agent's unauthorized acts, when implied from conduct, must be exhibited by acts inconsistent with any other hypothesis.

13. Principal and agent ⇨164(1)—Ratification is effectually implied only in respect of act done by person professedly acting as agent of party sought to be charged as principal.

Ratification is effectually implied only in respect of an act done by person professedly acting as agent of party sought to be charged as principal.

14. Novation ⇨5—Agent making unauthorized collections and converting proceeds was not substituted as debtor, nor were original debtors released by creditor's acceptance of payments from agent's earnings to minimize loss.

Creditor's acceptance of payments from agent's earnings to minimize loss on account of proceeds of unauthorized collections converted by agent, did not substitute agent as debtor in place of original debtors or release latter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Margaret Schomaker against J. B. Petersen and wife and others, upon a promissory note. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court; SEAWELL, PRESTON, and LANGDON, JJ., dissenting.

Cross & Brandt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dunn, White & Aiken, Carlos G. White, and Edward J. Smith, all of Oakland, for respondents.

JOHNSON, Justice pro tem. This is an action based on a promissory note executed to the plaintiff by the defendants, J. B. Petersen and S. Matthesen, together with their respective wives, and at all times after its delivery kept by plaintiff in her own exclusive possession.

The question presented on this appeal by plaintiff concerns itself with the authority of a real estate agent, who had negotiated the transaction giving rise to the note, to bind the payee by receipt of a payment procured on such agent's own solicitation, and misappropriated by him.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Schomaker, acting through E. B. Field, doing a brokerage business in Oakland under the trade name of E. B. Field Co., sold to Messrs. Petersen and Matthesen a lot of land, taking as part payment a promissory note for $1,900, executed by all the defendants and secured by their deed of trust. The sale was closed by an employee of Field, named Fred Hauschildt; and the note, with the deed of trust, was duly delivered to the plaintiff and has been retained ever since in her possession.

The note, which was dated October 29, 1923, was made payable one year thereafter, and bore interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable monthly, and compounding if not so paid. The trustee named in the deed of trust was the Oakland Title Insurance & Guarantee Company; and the instrument was recorded November 14, 1923.

Mrs. Schomaker, who is described by Mr. Sevier, deputy district attorney of Alameda county, as an ignorant woman, appears to have had no business experience; and, moreover, she was occupied with the care of a helpless son. A period of six months having gone by without any interest being paid, she informed Hauschildt of the default. He told her that he would procure the interest money; and soon thereafter, on March 3, 1924, he obtained from Petersen a check for $66.60, which Petersen drew in favor of Hauschildt, and the latter, after giving Petersen a receipt for interest from October 25, 1923, to April 25,

On August 15, 1924, Hauschildt, acting on his own initiative, procured from Matthesen a check of $66 in Hauschildt's favor, receipting for the amount as "six months interest on loan of $1,900 to Margaret Schomaker from March 29, 1924, to August 29, 1924." Mrs. Schomaker had no knowledge of this payment, nor did she receive any of the proceeds of the check.

At about this time Hauschildt chanced to see Mrs. Schomaker and stated to her that the makers of the note were getting ready to pay her, whereupon she remarked that "that was all right." She heard no more of the matter until the following September, at which time Hauschildt told her that the makers were in position to pay her, but that she would have to sign a reconveyance; and he asked her if she would do so. She replied that she would, if she had to sign in order to get her money; and he then said that he would mail the paper to her for signature.

Shortly thereafter Hauschildt sent to plaintiff, by mail, a form which in express terms directed the Oakland Title Insurance and Guarantee Company to execute and deliver a reconveyance of the property described in the deed of trust executed by the defendants. Nothing was mentioned in these instructions concerning any collection to be made, nor was delivery of the reconveyance made conditional upon payment of the note. But in his letter to Mrs. Schomaker, Hauschildt said: "If you will kindly sign this and mail same back to me, I will see that the money is deposited in the Oakland Title Insurance and Guarantee Co. and mailed to you." Mrs. Schomaker accordingly signed the form, and mailed it back to Field's office in an envelope which came with the letter to her. The instructions were then delivered, presumably by Hauschildt, to the trustee; and on November 12, 1924, the trustee, without inquiring as to payment of the indebtedness, had a deed of reconveyance signed by its officers, using one of its ordinary forms, which recited payment of the indebtedness in full. This document then passed, without any direction from Mrs. Schomaker, into the possession of Hauschildt in some way not disclosed in the evidence. It was not recorded until February 25, 1925.

Before procuring from Mrs. Schomaker the instructions to the trustee, Hauschildt, by false representations, had already induced Petersen and Matthesen to pay to him $1,815 of the principal amount of the indebtedness. In September he represented to Petersen that Mrs. Schomaker was greatly in need of money; and that if Petersen could help her, she would deduct $50 from the amount owing. Petersen, without any inquiry concerning either the possession of the note or Hauschildt's authority to collect the indebtedness, gave Hauschildt a check on September 19, 1924, for $890, and had Matthesen, on October 22, 1924, give Matthesen's check to Hauschildt for $925. These checks were both drawn in favor of Hauschildt, and were cashed by him. At the time of the delivery of Petersen's check, Hauschildt promised that he would get a reconveyance on payment of the residue; and when he received Matthesen's check, he said the reconveyance would be sent in a few days. After procuring the reconveyance from the trustee, Hauschildt gave it to Petersen on November 14, 1924, and at the same time demanded and received from Petersen a check for $33, which Hauschildt stated was for interest and the expense incident to execution of the reconveyance. This amount, together with the moneys previously collected by Hauschildt, aggregated $1,980.60, all of which Hauschildt appropriated to his own use, with the exception of the item of $66 sent in March, 1924, to Mrs. Schomaker, as a payment of interest for the first six months.

After Mrs. Schomaker had signed the instructions to the trustee she heard nothing further from any one, and waited until March, 1925. At that time she telephoned to Hauschildt, who told her that nothing had been paid, that failure to make payment was mere carelessness, and that the money was perfectly safe and the security ample. Thus reassured, and her attention being centered on her helpless son, Mrs. Schomaker let matters drift until the following October, at which time she again made inquiry of Hauschildt, and was told as before that nothing had yet been paid. So matters went on with repeated inquiries and reassurances for about a year until October, 1926. Being then in need of money, Mrs. Schomaker communicated with a friend, who suggested that she make inquiry of the Oakland Title Insurance and Guarantee Company. Upon doing so, Mrs. Schomaker learned that a deed of reconveyance had been made and recorded long before; and she was advised to see Mr. Field. This she did, and then sought out Mr. Petersen also, whom she had never met previously; and from him learned that payments had been made to Hauschildt.

Hauschildt had been discharged from Field's employ on September 1, 1926, and thereupon became connected with the real estate office of Tucker-McElhinney Company. Upon being informed of the misconduct of Hauschildt, Field brought the matter to the attention of Mr. Sevier, deputy district attorney, who issued a citation requiring Hauschildt's attendance at the district attorney's office. Two meetings were held. Besides Hauschildt and Sevier, there were present at both meetings Field, Petersen, Matthesen and Mrs. Schomaker; and at the second meeting there were in addition Edward J. Smith, attorney for Petersen and Matthesen, and Warren Tucker, Hauschildt's new employer. Hauschildt admitted his guilt, and at the first meeting it was suggested by Mr. Sevier that the conference be continued for a week to see what could be done by Hauschildt about making reparation. At the next meeting Mr. Tucker, stating that Hauschildt had good earning capacity, proposed that after allowing Hauschildt a limited sum for living expenses, he himself would arrange to have the residue of Hauschildt's earnings applied in a way to rectify the wrong.

Petersen and Matthesen, claiming through their attorney to be discharged of all liability, expressed utter indifference as to the whole proceeding. Mrs. Schomaker had not an attorney present, and no one explained to her that question had been raised as to Hauschildt's agency. She sat mute, and at times in tears, throughout the discussion, until she was asked whether the arrangement proposed was agreeable to her. To this question she replied that as long as she got her money, she did not care where it came from. The conference ended after a suggestion had been made that Tucker should make payments from Hauschildt's earnings to Field, and Field should pay the amounts as received to Mrs. Schomaker.

Thereafter, on March 3, 1927, Hauschildt brought Mrs. Schomaker a check of Tucker-McElhinney Company for $100, and on June 30 he brought $100 in currency. Subsequently Hauschildt absconded and Mrs. Schomaker received nothing more from any source.

On October 5 this action was instituted against the defendants to recover on their promissory note. In their answer the defendants allege that Mrs. Schomaker held forth Hauschildt and Field as her agents, authorized to receive payment, and that believing them to possess such authority, the defendants had paid to Hauschildt for plaintiff the full sum demanded in satisfaction of the note, and had received from Hauschildt deed of reconveyance. Defendants further averred that they would not have paid Hauschildt except for the fact that they had made previous payments to him which plaintiff had received and accepted, and that plaintiff had caused the deed of reconveyance to be placed in Hauschildt's hands for the purpose of effecting collection. Upon these grounds, defendants charged that plaintiff was estopped to deny the agency of "Fred Hauschildt and/or E. B. Field Co." to make collection for her. Defendants pleaded in addition that plaintiff had ratified the acts of the defendants in making the payments as they had, and "agreed to look solely to said Fred Hauschildt and/or E. B. Field Co. as her agents therefor"; and that in March and June, 1927, she had received from Hauschildt payments of principal and interest on account.

The case was tried without a jury, and the court, deciding in favor of defendants, made a general finding that all the allegations of the answer were true. Owing to the ambiguous character of the averments of agency ascribed to "Fred Hauschildt and/or E. B. Field Co.," it is not altogether certain whether the court regarded only an undetermined one of the two persons, Hauschildt and Field, as the agent of Mrs. Schomaker to make collection, or both as vested with equal authority. As a matter of fact, Field knew nothing of the collection until after Mrs. Schomaker had learned of it from Petersen, and had then informed Field. However, we will assume that the court drew from the evidence the inference that Hauschildt and Field were authorized to bind Mrs. Schomaker by collections made by either independently, or by both in concert.

The question thus becomes primarily one of law as to the sufficiency of the evidence to establish such agency. Our courts have not had occasion hitherto to promulgate a rule on this subject; but the principles applicable have become so firmly established as to make our way plain.

It is to be borne in mind that at no time after the delivery of the note and the deed of trust to Mrs. Schomaker in November, 1923, did either Hauschildt or Field have possession of either instrument. And the deed of reconveyance was not exhibited by Hauschildt, or delivered to Petersen, until the last payment of $33 was made.

"Whoever insists," says Mechem in his treatise on Agency, "that he has discharged an admitted debt, by paying it to some one other than the creditor himself, has ordinarily the burden of proving that the person to whom he paid it was authorized by the creditor to receive the payment." 1 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) p. 667.

While authority may arise by implication, still agency is not lightly to be inferred. And in the matter of a loan, "the mere fact that the agent was employed to make the loan or negotiate the contract or draft the securities upon which the money is payable, will not, as of course, confer upon him the incidental authority to receive a payment which may become due upon such contract. If the authority goes no further, the agent's power will be exhausted when the loan is made or the contract is negotiated." 1 Mechem, p. 669.

If, however, the agent who negotiated the transaction is allowed to retain possession and control of the securities, his authority to collect is implied under what is sometimes called "the scrivener's rule."

"The presumption in these cases is founded upon the negotiating agent's possession of the securities; it does not arise if the securities are not left in the agent's possession, and if once created, it ceases when the securities are withdrawn by the principal. It is incumbent, therefore, upon the debtor to assure himself on each occasion when a payment is made that they still continue in the agent's possession, for if they have been withdrawn, the payment will not bind the principal, unless actual authority can be shown or his conduct has been such as to estop him to deny the agency." 1 Mechem, p. 672.

The leading American case on the subject is Williams v. Walker, 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 325, where the English authorities are gathered and reviewed; and the principles there applied are discussed at length and followed in Smith v. Kidd, 68 N. Y. 130. The current of authority runs steadily in one direction; and a study of the numerous decisions shows concurrence in the following rules:

[1] 1. A borrower making payment to a person other than the lender himself does so at his peril, and has the burden of showing the recipient of the money to have been an authorized agent of the lender for collection.

[2] 2. Negotiation of the loan by a person acting therein as agent of the lender does not operate to invest that agent with authority to receive payment, either of interest or principal.

[3] 3. Authority to receive payments of interest does not carry with it authority to collect the principal.

4. If, however, the agent who negotiated the loan is entrusted with possession and control of the securities, then in the absence of notice to the contrary, the implication arises that he possesses authority to collect principal as well as interest while he is known to retain control of the securities, but no longer.

[4] 5. To support the implication of authority to collect under the scrivener's rule, there must be the union of two elements—agency in making the loan, and known possession of the indicia of indebtedness intentionally left in the negotiating agent's custody.

6. To justify payment to a custodian of the securities, the borrower must have knowledge of the fact of possession at the time of each payment. Mere possession alone does not suffice. It is the possession, known at the time, which gives the appearance of authority. Neither possession existing at the time, if unknown to the borrower, nor possession known to exist before or after, but not at the time of, payment, will give rise to any implication of authority. Absence of the securities on the occasion of any payment implies absence of authority at that time.

[5] 7. Authority inferred from the known possession of securities is at most, authority to collect interest and principal as they fall due. No authority arises by implication to receive the principal before maturity. Nor even when there is express authority to collect, is the agent authorized to receive payment before it is due.

For verification of the principles embodied in the rules here formulated, reference may be made to Williams v. Walker, 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 325; Smith v. Kidd, 68 N. Y. 130, 23 Am. Rep. 157; 2 C. J. 619-622; 21 R. C. L., 868-

672; 2 Jones on Mortgages (8th Ed.) §§ 1231, 869; 1 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) pp. 669-1232, 1235.

[6] Hauschildt was expressly authorized to collect the interest which had accrued for the first six months. That collection was made, and the money transmitted to Mrs. Schomaker. He had no express authority to make any other collection, nor from the circumstances does any implication of authority arise. He lacked at all times possession of the indicia of the indebtedness, solicited and obtained payment of the principal before it was due, and to induce such payment offered a reduction of the principal. These circumstances all put the defendants on inquiry as to Hauschildt's authority; and the payments, other than the first payment of interest, were made at defendants' peril.

[7] Express authority was equally necessary for any reduction of principal, and for acceptance of principal prior to maturity. Defendants make no contention of any express authority; and there is likewise an insufficiency of evidence to show any implied authority to collect any of the moneys here in question.

Nor is the situation changed by reason of the ultimate delivery of the deed of reconveyance. This was not delivered until November 14, 1924, at which time defendants made their last payment amounting to $33. Even when a trustee releases a deed of trust and receives payment of the amount of the debt, without actual authority and without producing the securities, the party paying is charged with notice of the lack of authority in the trustee. Fortune v. Stockton, 182 Ill. 454, 462, 55 N. E. 367; Wynn v. Grant, 166 N. C. 39, 52, 81 S. E. 949; Cummings v. Hurd, 49 Mo. App. 139, 147.

[8, 9] The plaintiff in no way held out Hauschildt to the defendants as her agent for the collection of the principal. And even habitual payment of interest to an agent, who in turn makes remittance to the creditor, does not establish his authority to receive any part of the principal. Nor does it raise any estoppel against the creditor. Dorman v. West Jersey T. & G. Co., 92 N. J. Law, 487, 489, 105 A. 195. There was nothing in the plaintiff's conduct calculated to mislead the defendants, or to make it appear that Hauschildt had the authority which he assumed. The defendants placed their trust and confidence entirely in the assertions of Hauschildt himself, and it was by him that they were deceived. If they had taken the precaution of following the general custom, and demanding surrender of the securities, as a condition of payment of the principal, this litigation would probably have been avoided. In Smith v. Kidd, 68 N. Y. 130, 141, the court says, quoting from Henn v. Conisby, 1 Ch.

Cas. 93: "The circumstance of the creditor keeping the security is conclusive. No man would pay the money due on a mortgage or bond without having the security given up. The debtor's payment to the scrivener without taking up his security, was an evidence that he trusted the scrivener more than the creditor did, who always kept the security." Any other principle would be dangerous in the extreme."

This case differs from Quinn v. Dresbach, 75 Cal. 159, 16 P. 762, 7 Am. St. Rep. 138, on which defendants lay stress, in that there the creditor accepted several payments of interest, and also payments of part of the principal, made through his attorney; and the acceptance of principal so paid without repudiation of agency was regarded as an indication of authority sufficient to justify the debtor in paying the balance of the principal through the same agency. In the present case the only payment by defendants which the plaintiff received through Hauschildt was the one payment of interest; and authority to collect interest creates no ostensible authority to collect principal in the absence of the securities, especially when payment is made before maturity and in a reduced amount.

[10-12] As there is nothing in the evidence to create an estoppel against the plaintiff, so, also, the evidence fails to show ratification of Hauschildt's unauthorized acts. For purposes of ratification there must be "confirmatory conduct, or at least conduct inconsistent with disapproval. Facts are not to be stretched, or ambiguous, inconclusive or independent acts made the basis of a ratification." 1 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) p. 348. It is contended by defendants that the acceptance by plaintiff of two payments of $100 each, after the meetings at the district attorney's office, operated as ratification of Hauschildt's assumed agency. Ratification rests, however, upon assent; and to be binding it must be made with full knowledge of all the facts necessary to an intelligent exercise of judgment. An intention to confirm, when implied from conduct, must be exhibited by acts inconsistent with any other hypothesis. 2 C. J. 492; Culver v. Nichols, 140 Md. 448, 453, 117 A. 873; Ballard v. Nye, 138 Cal. 588, 597, 72 P. 156.

[13] It does not appear from the evidence that Hauschildt represented to Petersen or Matthesen that he had any real authority to receive the money for Mrs. Schomaker. His statement to Petersen was that Mrs. Schomaker needed the money, and if Petersen would help her by payment in advance of maturity, she would deduct $50 from the amount owing. It was on the strength of this statement that Petersen and Matthesen delivered to Hauschildt their checks drawn to his order. One might infer that they trusted him as their own messenger. These were material facts for Mrs. Schomaker to know; but the evidence does not bring knowledge of such facts home to her at the time when she received the two installments from Hauschildt. And ratification is effectually implied only in respect of an act done by a person professedly acting as the agent of the party sought to be charged as principal. Pacific B. C. & F. Co. v. Bleakmore, 81 Cal. App. 659, 665, 254 P. 618; Puget Sound L. Co. v. Krug, 89 Cal. 237, 243, 26 P. 902. Moreover, in receiving those payments, Mrs. Schomaker was not accepting any benefits of Hauschildt's corrupt acts. There were no benefits for her to accept. Hauschildt had maneuvered so as to get the debtors' money for himself and had squandered it. The case is not one where an agent abused or exceeded an authority conferred. There was utter want of authority; and in such case ratification is less readily inferred. John A. Eck Co. v. Coachella V. O. G. Ass'n (Cal. App.) 282 P. 408. Whatever reparation Hauschildt made was a benefit to the debtors whose trust he had betrayed. We discover nothing in the occurrences at the district attorney's office indicating confirmation or adoption of Hauschildt's actions; and when Mrs. Schomaker was asked whether Mr. Tucker's proposal looking to reparation by Hauschildt was agreeable to her, her answer was that so long as she got her money she did not care where it came from. This assuredly was not a consent to look to Hauschildt instead of her real debtors. Perhaps if she had been represented by an attorney, he might have suggested for form's sake that Hauschildt make his payments through Petersen and Matthesen; but the mechanics do not change the essential character of the arrangement. What Hauschildt paid, he paid not as Mrs. Schomaker's agent, but as the individual who had defrauded Petersen and Matthesen; and the amounts paid redounded to their benefit. It was the part of common sense to take whatever could be obtained in the way of redress; and the installments paid to Mrs. Schomaker should, in law, not be regarded otherwise than if Hauschildt had paid the money to Petersen and Matthesen, and they had transmitted it to Mrs. Schomaker to apply on the note.

We think it quite clear that Mrs. Schomaker had no knowledge of her rights until after Hauschildt had absconded; and it is of the essence of ratification that what is done shall be done advisedly and with full knowledge of the party's rights. Brown v. Rouse, 104 Cal. 672, 676, 38 P. 507; King v. Lagrange, 50 Cal. 328, 332.

[14] The mere willingness to receive and apply on the note what might become available from Hauschildt's earnings was in no sense equivalent to substituting Hauschildt as the debtor in place of Petersen and Mat-thesen. Mrs. Schomaker was neither reaping the fruits of Hauschildt's wrongful acts, nor adopting them as acts done on her account. The money paid was not part of the proceeds realized by Hauschildt, nor was it accepted on the basis of any valid exercise of agency. Remedy against a party legally liable is not forfeited by efforts to effect a friendly settlement or to avoid needless loss. 2 C. J. 490, § 110; Crute v. Burch, 154 Mo. App. 480, 135 S. W. 1004; Gilman Linseed Oil Co. v. Norton, 89 Iowa, 434, 56 N. W. 663, 48 Am. St. Rep. 400.

Hauschildt's payments of $200 from his earnings served to mitigate the defendants' loss to that extent, but did not absolve defendants of liability for the residue.

The evidence, being insufficient to show either agency, ratification, or estoppel, does not afford justification for the findings; and hence the judgment in favor of defendants is without legal support.

The judgment is reversed.

IN re CARPENTIER'S ESTATE.

WINTER v. FERRIS et al.

Civ. 7250.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 13, 1930.

Wills §229.—Will, though irrevocable as contract, is revocable as will, and injured party may not contest later will, but is remitted to independent action to enforce rights under contract.

Will, though it may be irrevocable as contract, is nevertheless revocable as a will, and, in case such will is revoked, injured party cannot contest later will in probate court on that ground or insist on probate of earlier will, but is remitted to an independent action at law or in equity to enforce whatever rights he may have.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Lizzie Ferris and others presented the will of Dr. F. G. Carpentier, also known as Franklin George Carpentier, also known as Dr. G. Still, also known as Dr. F. O. Reitenprac, also known as Dr. Williams, deceased, to the court for probate, and Hazel-Wood Winter filed a contest. The court sustained a demurrer to the contest and admitted the will to probate, and the contestant appeals.

Affirmed.

Kington & Cunningham, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Raymond D. Williamson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

On February 28, 1919, the decedent, F. G. Carpentier, executed a document which is claimed by appellant to be both a will and a contract to leave by will certain property therein described to appellant. On April 17, 1927, the decedent executed a will expressly revoking all previous wills and making a different disposition of such property. Respondents presented the later will to the court for probate, and appellant filed a contest based solely on the document of February 28, 1919, and the contract alleged to be evidenced thereby. Appellant also proposed said document for probate. The probate court sustained a demurrer to the contest, admitted the will of April 17, 1927, to probate, and denied probate to the document of February 28, 1919.

The court's action was correct. A will, though it may be irrevocable as a contract, is none the less revocable as a will, and in case such a will is revoked, the injured party cannot contest the later will in the probate court on that ground or insist on the probate of the earlier will, but is remitted to an independent action at law or in equity to enforce whatever rights he may have. Estate of Rolls, 193 Cal. 594, 226 P. 608; Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 233 P. 330.

The decree and orders appealed from are affirmed.

Poisons ¶9—Evidence held to sustain conviction of possessing poisons, though defendant's testimony as to innocently obtaining possession was uncontradicted and not improbable (State Poison Act).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of possessing poisons, in violation of State Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124, as amended), though defendant's testimony as to obtaining possession of drugs in innocent manner was uncontradicted and not improbable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Lile T. Jacks, Judge.

Angelo Turco was convicted of unlawful possession of poisons, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan and E. H. Lomasney, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J.

Appellant was charged by an information consisting of two counts, filed by the district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, with violations of the State Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124, as amended). The first count referred to the willful, unlawful, and felonious possession of a preparation of heroin. The second related to the willful, unlawful, and felonious possession of cocaine. Trial was had and he was found guilty on both counts. Motion for a new trial was made and denied, and appellant was sentenced to San Quentin for the period prescribed by law. This is an appeal from the judgment and order.

It is claimed that there is no evidence in the record to sustain the verdict. The material facts are without conflict. In the month of June, 1929, appellant was seated in an automobile at the intersection of Clay and Leavenworth streets, in this city and county, reading a paper. While so occupied a large automobile proceeding west on Clay street passed the car in which appellant was sitting. The driver blew his horn, and appellant left his car, carrying a package over his arm, when he was placed under arrest by an inspector of the state board of pharmacy. The package proved to contain nineteen bottles of cocaine and three large packages of heroin. Appellant was thereupon taken to the city prison and questioned concerning the narcotics, and he claimed that he did not know what the package contained; that it had been given to him by one Enrica to be delivered to an unknown party who would meet him in the particular locality of his arrest.

As ground for a reversal, it is claimed that as the prosecution failed to prove knowledge on the part of the appellant as to the contents of the package, his testimony relating to the manner in which he became possessed of the drugs should have been believed by the jury, as it was uncontradicted and not improbable. There is no merit in this claim. The circumstances surrounding the case were such as to reasonably justify an inference of guilt, and the jury was not bound to believe defendant's testimony. People v. Neary, 104 Cal. 373, 37 P. 943. If the rule were otherwise, few criminals would ever be convicted. People v. Hall, 87 Cal. App. 634, 262 P. 50.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SCOTT v. CLINE ELECTRIC MFG. CO.
Civ. 6346.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.
Feb. 18, 1930.

Contracts ¶10(4)—Agreement to push sale of manufacturer's motors wherein dealer did not agree to buy anything held void for lack of mutuality (Civ. Code, § 1550).

Contract whereby dealer agreed with manufacturer to push sale of manufacturer's motors, save where customer specified some other make, but wherein dealer did not agree to buy anything from manufacturer, held void for lack of mutuality, since promise to "push sale of motors" is too uncertain and indefinite to constitute enforceable consideration under Civ. Code, § 1550.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by H. W. Scott against the Cline Electric Manufacturing Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Joe Crail, Harold C. Morton, Claude A. Shutt, and Edward A. Penprase, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Neice & Packard and Wm. A. Conover, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ELLIOT CRAIG, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant rendered after the sustaining of an objection to the introduction of any evidence, at the commencement of the trial, on the ground that the second amended complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and after the sustaining of an objection to an offer of proof on the ground "that the offer does not prove or tend to prove the case in the pleadings set forth."

For the purposes of said rulings, the trial court had to consider as true all of the allegations of said second amended complaint and all of the facts stated in the offer of proof. We therefore state the facts as therein set forth, although the truth of a part thereof was in fact denied by the answer.

The second amended complaint alleges (in substance): That on or about May 11, 1922, plaintiff, an electrical contractor and merchant, in Los Angeles, Cal., entered into an agreement with defendant, a manufacturer, the portions of said agreement which are herein material being:

"If you are willing to push the sale of our motors in connection with your machines, save where the customer specifies some other make, your acceptance of one copy of this letter will constitute a motor manufacturer's agreement and will entitle you to contract discounts on all motors purchased by you from us.

"This agreement to remain in force for one year from date of acceptance and to continue in force from year to year unless cancelled by one of the parties hereto thirty days prior to the expiration of any yearly period, it being understood and agreed that the motor prices and discounts will be subject to variations that may be made by the Westinghouse Company and published in their regular price sheets. We shall be glad to fill your orders and give them the attention that will show our interest in your business."

This was signed by defendant. Plaintiff signed thereon: "This proposal is hereby accepted: H. W. Scott."

Said complaint further alleges that plaintiff complied with said agreement and performed all of the covenants and conditions as agreed by him to be performed, and that he did push the sale of defendant's motors in connection with his machines, and that said agreement was fully kept and performed by both parties from May 11, 1922, to June 25, 1925, on which latter date and continuously thereafter defendant refused to further perform under said contract. Plaintiff prayed for $20,000 as damages for said breach of contract.

The offer of proof supplements the said complaint, in part as follows: "That under the contract the plaintiff and defendant entered into a motor manufacturer's agreement and we, in support of the contract and for the purpose of showing what a motor manufacturers agreement is, we desire to show and intend to show that * * *" (stating length of time contract was performed and volume of business done thereunder) "and that plaintiff held himself out as the agent and representative of the defendant, with the consent and knowledge of the defendant; that he did purchase from the defendant articles reaching something like $42,000.00, probably more, that defendant gave discounts, * * *" etc.; "that the plaintiff did push the sales of the motors here in Los Angeles for the defendant, that he did advertise himself and created an enormous expense in doing said advertising; that he has been doing that from May 11, 1922, down to June 25, 1925"; that on June 25th defendant terminated the relation, and from that time defendant has refused to permit plaintiff to represent it as agent; and that defendant has established another agency in Los Angeles.

The trial court stated, in reference to the rulings complained of: "The contract as set forth in the complaint is what is known under the law as a unilateral contract, a one-sided contract where one party was not obliged to do anything and the other parties might, and one that is not binding under the statutes and the law as decided by the Supreme Court."

The alleged errors specified by appellant are:

"I. That the court erred in refusing [to permit] plaintiff to introduce evidence in support of the allegations set forth in his second amended complaint.

"II. That the decision of the court in refusing to permit plaintiff to introduce evidence in support of the allegations set forth in his second amended complaint was contrary to law.

"III. That the judgment entered in the aforesaid cause is contrary to law."

Separate discussions of these three specifications need not be made, for the reason that each is primarily dependent upon the sufficiency of the document set forth in the said complaint, aided, if at all, by the offer of proof, to constitute a contract binding upon defendant from and after June 25, 1925.

From a study of the document set forth in said complaint and of the offer of proof as made, it is apparent that plaintiff agreed only "to push the sale" of defendant's motors in connection with his machines, "save where the customer specifies some other make." He did not agree to buy anything of defendant. The dealings of the parties prior to June 25, 1925, were measured by said document, but from that date the agreement is wholly executory.

A sufficient cause or consideration is one of the essential elements of a contract. Section 1550, Civ. Code.

"A promise is a good consideration for a promise, provided always that it imposes some legal liability on the person making it. If it imposes none, then it cannot be a good consideration. A promise may be too vague and uncertain to amount to a consideration for a promise made by the other party." 13 Cor. Jur., p. 329.

"A purported contract between a cement manufacturer and a cement dealer, whereby the dealer, in consideration that he would give the manufacturer's brand the preference in his sales and 'push' the same, was to have a lower rate per barrel than other dealers, was void for lack of mutuality, since the dealer did not bind himself to make any sales of cement." Jackson v. Alpha Cement Co., 122 App. Div. 345, 106 N. Y. S. 1052.

In the case of Leach v. Kentucky Coal Co. (D. C.) 256 F. 686, the complaint alleged that plaintiff entered into a contract with defendant for the sale and distribution of defendant's products for five years. "Plaintiff was to introduce defendant's products in the territory in question, and to sell as much thereof as possible," and in consideration therefor defendant agreed to sell coal to plaintiff at a certain price. The court therein said, at page 688 of 256 F.: "There is no obligation whatever upon plaintiff to order any coal. If plaintiff had refused or neglected to order coal, defendant would not have had any cause of action against him. The case is not one where one party agrees to supply the requirements of another. * * * It is an agreement clearly lacking in mutuality."

The case of Bartlett Springs Co. v. Standard Box Co., 16 Cal. App. 671, 117 P. 934, shows the distinction between the case before us and that class of cases where the purchaser agrees to buy all the commodity agreed to be sold, which he will need in his business. Such a contract is held binding because it is held that the purchaser is bound to buy all his needs for the given period of the seller, and to purchase elsewhere would be a breach of the contract.

In the case of Schimmel v. Martin, 190 Cal. 429, 213 P. 33, 34, the Supreme Court had before it a contract between the owner of a pumping plant and an owner of adjoining land for water to be furnished for said land. The court therein said: "The contract is lacking in mutuality. Considered as a contract for the sale of personal property, as the parties to the action treated and considered it, and as the trial court in effect found it to be, there is clearly no mutuality in the absence of an agreement by the plaintiffs to buy the water offered for sale by the contract. The cases cited in the brief by counsel for respondents in support of the contention that the contract is mutual were all cases wherein the purchaser agreed in effect to purchase so much of the commodity as he should need in his business during the time specified in the contract. As a matter of course, under the circumstances narrated in those cases, the purchaser was legally bound to accept and pay for so much of the commodity as he should need. But in the instant case we are unable to find in the contract any obligation or promise * * * to take or purchase any water at all."

Assuming the full truth of the allegations of the said complaint and of the statements of fact in the offer of proof, and giving to plaintiff the benefit of any possible uncertainty in the construction of said agreement, we conclude that the said complaint, even aided by the offer of proof as to technical meaning of terms used in this contract, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, for the reason that said agreement lacks mutuality. The agreement, therefore, is unilateral as to all executory provisions. It is not a unilateral contract of the kind which may be enforced, such as an option founded on consideration, or where the party not bound has fully performed his part of the contract.

The promise to "push the sale" of motors is too uncertain and indefinite to constitute an enforceable consideration, and, there being no other promise or other consideration on the part of the plaintiff, the rulings of the trial court were correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 92.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 7, 1930.

1. Contracts $\S$ 316(4)—If offer to perform obligation be defective, offeree must object therefor, or defect is waived.

If an offer of performance of an obligation be defective, the offeree must object on that ground or the defect is waived, and he cannot be heard to urge that objection in a subsequent suit.

2. Mines and minerals $\S$ 73—Lessee preparing documents is chargeable with ambiguities therein (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1649, 1654; Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1864).

Lessee preparing and presenting to lessors oil lease, letter to himself, and agreement between himself and lessors, must be charged with any ambiguity in documents which he prepared, as any uncertainties existing in agreement are to be interpreted most strongly against one who prepared instrument and caused uncertainty to be present, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1649 and 1654, and Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1864.

3. Mines and minerals $\hookrightarrow$ 79(1)—Lessee assuming duty to secure owner's consent to lease, and not objecting to form thereof, cannot escape payment of amount owing lessor because owner's consent was defective (Civ. Code, § 1501).

Where lessee of oil lease from lessors purchasing property from owner under executory contract of sale had duly executed oil lease in his possession with letter addressed to him, signed by lessor, containing written authority to owner to consent in writing to execution of lease and order on lessee to pay stated amount to landowner, lessee assumed duty of securing consent of landowner, and cannot escape payment of money on ground form of consent given by owner in letter to lessee showing his intention to consent was not in proper form, where lessee failed to object to it or ask for another in more definite form, as required by Civ. Code, § 1501.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County;
Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Action by G. W. McClintick against R. T. Leonards. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals, and subsequently Marianna R. Leonards, as executrix of the estate of Reuben T. Leonards, deceased, also known as R. T. Leonards, was substituted as defendant and appellant.

Affirmed.

V. L. Ferguson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Siemon & Garber, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

Respondent commenced this action against R. T. Leonards to recover thirteen hundred dollars alleged to be due under the terms of a written contract. Judgment was rendered in favor of respondent, and, after the appeal had been taken, Leonards died and appellant was substituted herein.

The action grew out of an oil lease on real property situated in Kern county, Cal., the record title to which stood in the name of Alex Kirkpatrick, trustee. Respondent and H. A. McClintick, his mother, were purchasing the property under an executory contract of sale.

On January 30, 1926, Leonards himself prepared and presented to respondent three documents, consisting of an oil lease in triplicate, a letter to himself, and an agreement between himself and respondent. On the same day the three copies of the oil lease were signed by G. W. McClintick and Catherine McClintick, his wife, and H. A. McClintick, by G. W. McClintick, her attorney in fact, as lessors, and R. T. Leonards as lessee. One copy was kept by Leonards and another sent to Alex Kirkpatrick, who received the same.

The letter and agreement are important to the case and are set forth in full in words and figures as follows:

"Delano, California, January 30th, 1926.

"Mr. R. T. Leonards, 728 South Spring Street.
Los Angeles, California.

"Dear Sir: I am handing you herewith Oil and Gas lease in triplicate conveying to you or your order the right to explore certain lands for oil or gas.

"These lease is more fully described as to detail as being situate in Section twenty seven Township twenty seven S. R. 24 E. M. D. B. & M. Kern County.

"The present title to these lands is vested in Alex Kirkpatrick or Alex Kirkpatrick Trustee, of Los Angeles, California.

"The described lands as set forth in said lease dated January 30th, 1926, is being purchased by the undersigned, G. W. McClintick and H. A. McClintick, a widow of Denver, Colorado, each of the above named parties having a joint one half undivided interest in said purchase contract with Alex Kirkpatrick or Alex Kirkpatrick Trustee.

"Mr. Alex Kirkpatrick individually or as trustee is authorized to consent to the signing of an agreement, should he see fit to do so, wherein all legal requirements may be complied with in order to fully validate the terms of the within mentioned lease as to each separate detail.

"You are authorized to pay Mr. Kirkpatrick on account of the purchase contract upon said lands the sum of One Thousand Dollars upon receipt of such written consent and payment of One Hundred Dollars on the first day of March, 1926, and each thirty days thereafter until the total sum of Thirteen Hundred Dollars shall have been paid to said Alex Kirkpatrick.

"It is understood that I am to furnish you with necessary quit claims covering lands described in lease referred to. It is further understood that monies to be paid in accordance with this letter and the terms of the lease are to cover rentals on the said leased lands for a period of one year from January 30th, 1926.

"I further agree to furnish you with a true and correct copy of power of attorney from H. A. McClintick, wherein I am vested with due power and authority to execute the documents or leases herein mentioned.

"[Signed.] G. W. McClintick,

"Catherine McClintick.

"Delano, California, January 30th, 1926.

"Received of R. T. Leonards the sum of Two Hundred Dollars ($200.00) said Money is acknowledged as consideration towards the payment of one years land rental covering a certain Oil and Gas lease as of this date executed by H. A. McClintick by G. W. McClintick, her attorney in fact, Catherine E. McClintick, and G. W. McClintick. Accompanied with said lease is a certain letter authorizing Alex Kirkpatrick to consent to said lease account of a certain purchase contract covering said lands by lessees. It is understood that R. T. Leonards shall pay to said Alex Kirkpatrick the sum of money stipulated in said letter and agreements referred to within ten days after the delivery by me of quit claims and power of attorney referred to in said agreements. In the event or failure on the part of R. T. Leonards to Comply with the terms of payment then in that event the said Two Hundred Dollars shall be retained by me and forfeited as liquidated damages.

"[Signed.] G. W. McClintick
"Accepted: R. T. Leonards."

The parties agree that respondent furnished the quitclaim deeds, power of attorney, and other documents mentioned in the letter, excepting the written consent of Alex Kirkpatrick to the execution of the lease. Whether or not this consent was given is in dispute and presents the sole question to be decided on this appeal. The trial court found that it had been given, and found for the respondent and rendered judgment in his favor for thirteen hundred dollars. The evidence shows that during the latter part of February, 1926, Kirkpatrick saw Leonards and gave his verbal consent to the execution and delivery of the oil lease in question, and at that time Leonards promised to pay the thirteen hundred dollars to him. On March 8, 1926, Kirkpatrick wrote Leonards as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., Mar. 8th, 1926.

"Mr. R. T. Leonards, 728 So. Spring St., Los Angeles, Calif.

"Dear Sir: I herewith advise you that I now hold lease in my possession from Mr. G. W. McClintick on the following described property:

"The S-W $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S-W $\frac{1}{4}$, and the S-E $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S-W $\frac{1}{4}$; and the S $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N-W $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S-W $\frac{1}{4}$; and the S $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N-E $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S-W $\frac{1}{4}$; Section 27, Township 27 S., Range 24 E., Mt. Diablo Base and Meridian—comprising 100 acres.

"I have been instructed to turn this lease over to you upon the payment of $1,000 and the further three months rental of $100 per month.

"However, I understand that there are certain matters pertaining to former lease granted on this property which you are desirous of having cleared, before making initial payment, and for your protection I hereby guarantee that I will deliver the aforesaid lease at any time within 30 days, allowing sufficient time for you to work this matter out.

"Yours very truly."

This letter was signed by Kirkpatrick, mailed to Leonards and received at his office in Los Angeles. The copy introduced in evidence was furnished to respondent by one of Leonards' clerks.

It must be borne in mind that the agreement and the letter signed by respondent were prepared by Leonards, and that the letter was addressed to Leonards. In so far as the paragraph of the letter of importance here is concerned, it constituted an order on Leonards to pay the one thousand dollars of the thirteen hundred to Kirkpatrick when he (Kirkpatrick) had given a written consent to the execution of the lease. It does not provide who shall obtain this consent; certainly the burden is not placed upon respondent. The agreement contains the direct statement that Leonards will pay Kirkpatrick this money within ten days after the delivery of the quitclaim deeds and power of attorney by respondent, which Leonards received shortly after February 8, 1926. A reading of the two instruments leaves the impression that the parties intended to place the duty of securing the consent from Kirkpatrick upon Leonards. There is nothing in the record to throw any light upon the intention of the parties other than the language of the instruments themselves.

[1] While the letter from Kirkpatrick to Leonards under date of March 8, 1926, does not make the definite and explicit statement that he consented to the execution of the lease, still it clearly shows that it was his intention to do so. This is especially true in view of Kirkpatrick's verbal statement to Leonards that he consented to the lease, and Leonards' oral promise to pay the money according to the terms of the written agreement. Clearly, the letter was intended as a written consent, and, if Leonards objected to its form, he should have promptly communicated his objections to the other parties or be subject to the conclusion that he had waived them. Section 1501, Civ. Code. The parties evidently regarded the latter as a consent, for we find that, on March 11, 1926, three days after it was mailed in Los Angeles to Leonards in Los Angeles, they were still proceeding with the transaction. In the due course of business the letter should have been received in Leonards' office not later than March 9, 1926, if not on the day it was mailed.

[2] If an offer of performance of an obligation be defective, the offeree must object on that ground or the defect is waived, and he cannot be heard to urge such objection in a subsequent suit. Lockhart v. J. H. McDougall Co., 190 Cal. 308, 212 P. 1. Had the letter contained the direct statement over Kirkpatrick's signature, "I consent to the execution of the lease between McClintick and yourself," Leonards would have been in no better position to enforce his rights had he proceeded with the transaction than he would have been with the letter in the form submitted to him, for Kirkpatrick would have been in no position to maintain that the letter was not a consent to the execution of the lease.

[3] As we have mentioned before, the written instruments did not place any express duty on respondent to secure the written consent of Kirkpatrick to the execution of the lease, nor was a like duty expressly placed upon Leonards, who must be charged with any ambiguity in the documents which he prepared. "Any uncertainties existing in an agreement are to be interpreted most strongly against the one who prepared the instrument and caused the uncertainties to be present. Section 1654 of the Civil Code declares: 'In cases of uncertainty not removed by the preceding rules, the language of a contract should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. The promisor is presumed to be such party.' Such presumption is furthered where it appears that the promisor drew the contract. Thus, any uncertainty or ambiguity in an insurance contract is to be construed most strongly against the insurer. He frames it, and is supposed to make it as potent as possible in his own favor. Where the language of one party may be understood in more senses than one, it is to be interpreted in the sense in which he had reason to suppose it was understood by the other party. This is the rule stated in section 1649 of the Civil Code, and in section 1864 of the Code of Civil Procedure." Section 185, 6 Cal. Jur. 307. In view of the fact that Leonards left respondent on January 30, 1926, with the duly executed oil lease in his possession, together with the letter addressed to him signed by McClintick, which contained written authority to Kirkpatrick to consent in writing to the execution of the lease and an order on Leonards to pay the thirteen hundred dollars to Kirkpatrick, and that no express act was required of respondent to complete the transaction except the furnishing of the quitclaim deeds and power of attorney, which he did, we conclude that Leonards assumed the duty of securing the consent from Kirkpatrick. He cannot escape payment of the money on the ground that the form of the consent given was not to his liking, it appearing that he failed to object to it and failed to ask for another in a more definite form.

Judgment affirmed.

NOURSE, Acting P. J.

This is an appeal from an order of the superior court directing the commissioner appointed by the court to execute a deed to the purchaser of certain real property at a sale under a decree of foreclosure of two mortgages. The appeal is presented on a typewritten transcript.

The appellant joined with her husband in the execution of a mortgage on the property on April 11, 1913. The defendants Otto and Minna Pachmayr on April 11, 1921, executed a second mortgage on the same property in favor of Thomas W. Miller, the alien property custodian. On January 22, 1926, this mortgage was duly assigned by the custodian to Walter E. Mingramm. In this suit for foreclosure of the first mortgage, Walter E. Mingramm was joined as a party defendant and then came forward as a cross-plaintiff seeking foreclosure of the mortgage thus assigned to him. Issue being joined, the trial court made its decree ordering the foreclosure of both mortgages in favor of these respective plaintiffs. A commissioner was duly appointed, who made the sale to the respondent Hooper, to whom certificate of sale was duly issued.

Before the expiration of one year from the date of the sale an attorney claiming to represent Mrs. Mingramm paid to the commissioner an amount sufficient to redeem the property from execution sale. This sum the commissioner tendered to the purchaser at the sale, who refused to accept it. After the expiration of the year the court directed the commissioner to execute a deed to the purchaser, and such deed was executed and delivered. It is from this order that the appeal is taken on behalf of Mrs. Mingramm.

The respondent, the purchaser at the commissioner's sale, urges in support of the order that appellant is not a party entitled to redeem. He also has moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the appellant is not a "party" aggrieved by the order and also on the ground that the order having been fully executed the questions raised are moot.

The appellant was joined as a party defendant, but the cause was dismissed as to her and she was not thereafter a party to the proceeding. The attorney appearing for her on this appeal filed an affidavit in the court below stating that he appeared for her, but the court, after a hearing upon oral and documentary evidence, recited in its order that this attorney appeared for the court commissioner. The appellant is a resident of Holland and has not in person or by letter of any character made any appearance in the proceedings except as may have been done in the manner above noted.

[1, 2] The right of appeal is limited to a "party aggrieved." Section 938, Code Civ. Proc. One who has not been made a party to a cause may make himself a party by moving to set aside the judgment or order complained of, or by otherwise submitting himself to the jurisdiction of the court. Elliott v. Superior Court, 144 Cal. 501, 506, 77 P.

If we are bound by the recitals in the order of the trial court, it must be apparent that the appellant has not submitted to the jurisdiction of the court in any manner and that she is not therefore a party entitled to appeal from the order. It would also seem that the entire controversy over the order is moot because the deed has been executed and delivered and the order is now functus officio. But the record is in such condition that we do not deem it proper to grant the motion to dismiss on either ground.

[3-5] On the merits the issue is plainly stated by both parties to be whether the appellant is a party entitled to redeem under the provisions of section 2903, Civil Code. This section reads in part: "Every person, having an interest in property subject to a lien, has the right to redeem it from the lien, at any time after the claim is due, and before his right of redemption is foreclosed. * * * Manifestly, any one claiming the benefits of this section must, at the very outset, show that he is a "person having an interest in the property." If any such showing was made it does not appear in the record. The trial court found that no redemption was made during the legal period. This finding was made after a hearing upon both oral and documentary evidence, and what this evidence tended to prove we have no method of knowing except through the recitals of the order. The record is designated as the clerk's transcript of papers on file in his office. Among these papers are certain affidavits. If they were read or used at the hearing the record does not so disclose. At the end of this record appears the certification of the trial judge that the record is true and correct. This is what is required of the trial judge in the settlement of the reporter's transcript under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. But, if we were to treat the record as being both a clerk's and a reporter's transcript within the meaning of that section, we cannot escape the conclusion that the appellant has failed to show error. We must presume, in support of the order, that the trial court had before it sufficient evidence to sustain its finding, and that this may have included positive evidence showing that appellant had no interest. On the other hand, if no evidence was taken, the result is the same. The burden was on appellant to show that she was a person entitled to redeem. If she failed to make the showing she cannot now claim error. If she made the showing she should have it in the record.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

The order is affirmed.

WOODY et al. v. SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK et al.

Civ. 231.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Feb. 14, 1930.

1. Exceptions, bill of $\S$ 53(1)—Evidence held not to show clearly that defendants were in default in presenting and having certified proper bill of exceptions (Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 649, 650).

On motion to be relieved of default in filing of bill of exceptions, evidence held not to show default clearly, as is required in order to justify refusal to certify bill of exceptions on ground of default in strictly complying with terms of statute, Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 649, 650, in view of showing as to submission of bill to judge.

2. Exceptions, bill of $\S$ 42—Plaintiffs held to have waived any default of defendants in filing bill of exceptions by failing to make prompt objection and by correspondence and conduct.

On motion of defendants to be relieved of default in filing of bill of exceptions, record held to show that if defendants were in default plaintiffs had waived such default by failing to make prompt objection, even when matter was set for hearing, and by correspondence and conduct.

3. Common law $\S$ 9—Party seeking to avail himself of technicality must himself be held to prompt, consistent, exact assertion of such technical right.

Party or attorney who seeks to avail himself of technicality not affecting substantial right must himself be held to prompt, consistent, and exact assertion of such technical right.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 708—Reviewing court cannot review question, where trial court's refusal to settle first bill of exceptions left no record relating to such question (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473).

Question whether court erred in denying relief to defendants under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473, for original default in failing to appear in action within 30 days after service of summons, cannot be reviewed, where refusal of trial court to settle first bill of exceptions left no record before reviewing court relating to such question, notwithstanding that bill of exceptions set forth copy of prior proposed bill of exceptions, since reviewing court in absence of settlement by trial judge does not know whether they were full and complete.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by S. A. Woody and others against the Security Trust & Savings Bank and another. From orders denying a motion to relieve of default in filing of bill of exceptions and refusing to settle same, defendants appeal.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

BARNARD, J.

The plaintiffs on May 4, 1926, filed an action in the superior court of Kern county against Security Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, and fictitious defendants, for the purpose of quieting title to certain land in that county. The summons in said action was served on the bank in the county of Los Angeles on May 6, 1926. The bank having failed to appear in the action its default was entered on June 7, 1926. On June 24, 1926, the said bank and C. H. Barlow, sued in the action as John Doe, filed a notice of motion to vacate and set aside the default and decree, together with supporting affidavits, and a proposed answer. This motion was heard and submitted on July 12, 1926, and on March 24, 1927, an order was entered denying the same. Notice of this order was served on April 15, 1927. On May 2, 1927, defendants served and filed notice of appeal from the order denying the motion referred to, and on the same day the attorneys entered into a written stipulation giving the defendants until May 20, 1927, in which to prepare and file a proposed bill of exceptions. On May 17, 1927, defendants mailed the original and a copy of their proposed bill of exceptions to the attorneys for plaintiffs, with the request that they stipulate to its correctness, and have it presented to the judge. With this they inclosed a stipulation giving the plaintiffs twenty days' additional time in which to prepare amendments to the proposed bill of exceptions. On June 7, 1927, plaintiffs' attorneys mailed a copy of their proposed amendments to defendants' attorney, stating that the original thereof and the original bill of exceptions had been submitted to the judge, and requesting a stipulation, if the amendments were consented to, so that the exceptions and amendments might be engrossed. On July 8, 1927, the county clerk wrote to defendants' attorney as follows: "Judge Owen has directed us to advise you that he will sign the proposed bill of exceptions in the above entitled case, when the proposed amendments are engrossed in said bill of exceptions."

On August 11, 1927, defendants' attorney wrote to the attorneys for plaintiffs, suggesting that they had inadvertently left out of their proposed amendments a certain affidavit, and inquiring if they desired to include the same in their amendments. On August 15, 1927, plaintiffs' attorneys replied as follows: "We were advised by the County Clerk some time ago, and he said he would write to you asking you to engross the bill of exceptions, if the amendments had been allowed, and I presumed that this had been done. Judge Owen is now away and will not return for some time. I will take it up with him at the first opportunity and go over the matter with him, and advise you accordingly." On September 17, 1927, defendants' attorney again wrote to plaintiffs' attorneys, as follows: "I have not heard from you relative to inserting in your proposed amendments to the bill of exceptions in the above case, the affidavit of S. A. Woody. Please advise me if you desire this affidavit in your proposed amendments so we may have the bill of exceptions engrossed and presented to the judge for final settlement. I will appreciate hearing from you." On September 19th plaintiffs' attorneys replied that they saw no necessity for adding the affidavit in question, and closed with this sentence: "Consequently, we suggest that you go ahead and have the bill engrossed so that the matter will get on its way." To this defendants' attorney replied on September 26, 1927, as follows: "I have your letter of September 19th in reply to mine asking if you cared to have the Woody affidavit incorporated in the proposed amendments to proposed bill of exceptions in the above entitled case. In accordance with your letter, I have amended the proposed bill of exceptions and enclose it herewith, in order that you may sign the stipulation as to its correctness. Will you then please file the same with the clerk, in order that the same may be settled and allowed at an early date."

On October 7, 1927, defendants' attorney again wrote plaintiffs' attorneys, inquiring whether the engrossed bill of exceptions had been delivered to the clerk, and whether or not the judge had approved the same. On the same day plaintiffs' attorneys wrote to defendants' attorney as follows:

"We do not feel as though we wanted to sign the stipulation as to the bill of exceptions in the above matter, as one of the parties to the action, George Parker, is an attorney, and he feels we are under no obligation to sign the stipulation for the reason that if there are any particular advantages to be taken by reason of the fact that the bill of exceptions is not engrossed and filed within time, that we should take advantage of the same; and he therefore objects to me signing or making the stipulation requested.

"I therefore wish you would take the matter up directly with the court and have it taken care of in that manner so that I will not have to sign the stipulation in connection with the matter at all."

On October 8, 1927, defendants' attorney wrote to Judge Owen, stating he was inclosing the engrossed bill of exceptions; that plaintiffs' attorneys had stated they did not care to stipulate to the same, for the reason that advantage might be taken for failure to present within the time allowed by law, and closing: "In the event Mr. Brittan objects to the settlement of the bill of exceptions by you, I would appreciate it, if you would advise me as I wish to be heard." On October 10, 1927, the county clerk wrote defendants' attorney as follows: "Judge Erwin W. Owen has directed that you be notified that the proposed engrossed bill of exceptions in the above entitled case will be heard Monday, October 17, 1927, at 2 o'clock p. m., in Department No. 2."

The hearing on said proposed bill of exceptions was continued from October 17, 1927, to October 31, 1927, and again continued to November 28, 1927, at which time it was continued until December 5, 1927. In the meantime, on November 7, 1927, plaintiffs' attorneys served an "objection to settlement, or allowance, or engrossment, or certification of bill of exceptions by plaintiffs." This was based on the claim that the same had not been presented, or engrossed, or certified, as provided in sections 649, 650, of the Code of Civil Procedure; that the defendants had not shown due diligence or excusable neglect in relation to the same; and that the court was without jurisdiction to allow or certify said proposed bill of exceptions.

On December 5, 1927, a motion of the defendants to be relieved of their default by reason of inadvertence and excusable neglect, as set forth in an affidavit appearing in the bill of exceptions, was heard and denied by the court, and at the same time the court refused to settle, or order engrossed, or certify the proposed bill of exceptions. The defendants have appealed from these last two orders and have presented a bill of exceptions setting forth the prior proposed bill of exceptions, submitted on May 17, 1927, with plaintiffs' amendments thereto, submitted on June 7, 1927, together with letters, documents and affidavits showing the state of facts above set forth.

The only question presented by this appeal is that raised by defendants' first and second specifications of error, as to whether or not the trial court erred in its order made on December 5, 1927, refusing defendants relief from their default, if any, in presenting and getting certified the first bill of exceptions, and in further refusing to settle, allow and certify the proposed bill of exceptions.

[1] In the first place, it does not clearly appear that the defendants were in default in the matter of presenting and having certified a proper bill of exceptions. In order to justify a refusal to certify a bill of exceptions, the effect of which may be to deprive a party of his right to his day in court, upon the ground of the default of such party in strictly complying with the terms of the statute, it must be made to clearly appear that such default actually existed. Section 649 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a bill of exceptions may be presented to the court, or judge, "and after having been settled must be signed by the judge and filed with the clerk." Section 650 of the same Code provides that the proposed bill and proposed amendments must, within ten days after the serving of the proposed amendments, be presented by the party seeking the settlement of the bill, to the trial judge, upon five days' notice to the adverse party, or be delivered to the clerk of the court for the judge. When delivered to the judge, this section makes no provision for the time within which it must be engrossed, after approval by the judge, and re-presented to him for certification; but the section does provide that when it is delivered to the clerk, he must immediately deliver it to the judge, and that the judge must then designate the time at which he will settle the bill, and the clerk must immediately notify the parties of such designation, at which time the judge must settle the bill, and that thereupon the bill must be engrossed and presented to the judge for certification, by the party presenting it, within ten days.

In the instant case plaintiffs' attorneys wrote to defendants' attorney on June 7, 1927, as follows: "We are enclosing herewith, copy of proposed amendments to proposed bill of exceptions, the original of which, together with the original bill of exceptions, has been submitted to the judge."

It does not appear from this whether it had been submitted to the judge by the attorneys for the plaintiffs' or whether they had delivered it to the clerk, and it had been by the clerk submitted to the judge. If it was handed directly to the judge, the statute provides no time within which it must have been engrossed. And there appears nowhere in the record any minute order, or any order of any character, purporting to settle the proposed bill of exceptions, or allowing any or all of the amendments proposed. If it were delivered to the judge by plaintiffs' attorneys, the adverse party had, not only five days' notice, as provided in the statute, but immediate notice, having delivered it themselves. On the other hand, if the proposed bill was delivered to the clerk, and by him delivered to the judge, under the terms of the statute it became the duty of the judge to designate the time at which he would settle the bill, and of the clerk to notify the defendants' attorney of such time. The first notice of this kind appearing in the record, is that of October 10, 1927, when the clerk wrote to the defendants' attorney, informing him that the trial judge had directed that he be notified that the proposed engrossed bill of exceptions would be heard on October 17, 1927. The fact that this time was fixed by the judge, and notice given by the clerk, would indicate that the proposed bill had been handed to the clerk, and by him delivered to the judge. The notice having been given by direction of the court, and apparently in conformance to the provisions of the statute, if it be assumed that the acts of the court are regular and legally done, the record would indicate the bill had been submitted by the clerk. In either event, a default does not clearly appear.

[2, 3] It further appears from the record that, even if the defendants were in default in the respect complained of, the plaintiffs themselves had waived such default, and had failed to make prompt objection thereto, even when the matter was set for hearing. In Hicks v. Masten, 101 Cal. 651, 36 P. 130, 131, the court uses this language: "The party or attorney who seeks to avail himself of a technicality not affecting a substantial right must himself be held to a prompt, consistent, and exact assertion of such technical right." See, also, Bollinger v. Bollinger, 153 Cal. 190, 94 P. 770; Houghton v. Superior Court, 128 Cal. 352, 60 P. 972; Silverman v. Thompson, 196 Cal. 585, 238 P. 684.

No objection of any kind was filed by plaintiffs' attorneys, prior to the time set for hearing the matter on October 17, 1927, nor at that time, nor up to the time of the next continuance thereof, October 31, 1927. The first objection filed or served, so far as the record shows, was on November 7, 1927.

In addition to this more technical waiver, the correspondence and conduct of the parties, especially in view of the somewhat irregular manner in which the matter was being handled, must be held to constitute a waiver. In their letter of June 7, 1927, plaintiffs' attorneys asked defendants' attorney for a stipulation, as to their amendments, so that the bill of exceptions and amendments might be engrossed. Without a reply to this, on August 11th, defendants' attorney wrote them in regard to a matter he thought they had inadvertently left out. Without replying to this suggestion, plaintiffs' attorneys answered to the effect that the judge was away, would not return for some time, and that they would take it up with him at the first opportunity, go over the matter with him, and advise defendants' attorney accordingly. On September 17th, defendants' attorney again wrote to the attorneys for the plaintiffs, in regard to the suggested inadvertent omission, to which these attorneys replied to the effect that they did not desire the correction suggested, and closed by saying, "Consequently, we suggest that you go ahead and have the bill engrossed so that the matter will get on its way." Within six days after that letter could have been received, defendants' attorney mailed the proposed bill of exceptions to plaintiffs' attorneys, with the request that it be filed with the clerk. No objection was then made, and it was not until two weeks later that the first intimation of an objection appeared, and this was to the effect that it was preferred that it be left to the court, rather than be approved by stipulation. It is a not unusual practice for attorneys located in distant cities, to ask opposing counsel, located at the seat of the court, to deliver or file papers, the delivery or filing of which is more incumbent upon the other party. That they have no right to so request, may be conceded. It may also be conceded that for a time after July 8, 1927, the attorney for the defendants, if not technically in default, was at least negligent. But under the circumstances, especially as they appear after that time, and with such acquiescence as is shown by the record here, we feel that plaintiffs' attorneys have, more than in a mere technical sense, waived any default in the matter complained of, if such default there was.

[4] The second point raised and argued in the briefs of both parties is whether or not the court erred in its order of March 24, 1927, denying relief to the defendants, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for their original default in failing to appear in the action within thirty days after the service of summons. Unfortunately, we are not in position to pass upon this point, for the reason that the refusal of the trial court to settle the first bill of exceptions leaves no record before us, relating to that question. While it is true that the bill of exceptions upon this appeal sets forth a copy of the prior proposed bill of exceptions, and the proposed amendments thereto, in the absence of settlement by the trial judge, we do not know whether or not they are full and complete, or whether or not they contain assertions not in accord with the facts.

The orders appealed from are reversed, with instructions to the trial court to settle and certify the bill of exceptions.

In action for money by assignee of indebtedness, variance, if any, between corporate assignor's name appearing upon its stationery and signature upon purported transfer of account, held not prejudicial under evidence showing assignor was generally recognized and understood in business transactions and in present suit under its full name as well as company name, as one and the same.

2. Corporations $\S$ 411—Local agent of corporation having general direction and control of affairs in district held to have authority to assign account for collection.

Local agent of foreign corporation having general direction and control of its affairs in district where local business was transacted, and having full charge of all sales and collections for corporation, held to have authority to assign account for collection.

Samuel D. Weil, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ben Rosenthal and Avery M. Blount, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

The respondent instituted an action in the superior court for recovery of an indebtedness alleged to have been assigned to him by the Lee Tire & Rubber Company, a foreign corporation. Of the technical defenses interposed at the trial, appellant at this time only questions the sufficiency of the assignment.

[1] The corporate name appearing upon stationery of the company was Lee Tire & Rubber Company of New York, Inc., and the signature upon the purported transfer of the account was written: "Lee Tire & Rubber Co., By George Belles, Gen. Mgr. L. A. Branch." It is contended that there was a fatal variance as to identity of the corporation, and that an assignment of a nonresident corporation by one not its California general manager is insufficient to vest title to a demand in the plaintiff for the purposes of maintaining suit thereon.

It was testified by George Belles that the executive offices of his principal were in New York, that it had branches on the Pacific Coast, and had complied with the laws of this state by filing its articles of incorporation here; that he was general manager of the Los Angeles branch, which was maintained for the purpose of making sales throughout Southern California; that the defendant purchased merchandise at said branch, for which he was rendered monthly statements, and given credit for payments on account. It also appears that the business in Southern California of the concern alternately mentioned throughout the record by both names, including the defendant's account was under the supervision and control of Belles.

The defendant testified that he received at Belles' place of business a statement of his account upon the stationery of Lee Tire & Rubber Company of New York, Inc., and that he there made payments to the Lee Tire & Rubber Company, for which he was given receipts by Belles on account of purchases made from time to time. It appears that the plaintiff merely signed his name to the assignment, and that his counsel wrote beneath it the corporate name in the abbreviated form. There is no evidence that appellant did business with any other merchant of a similar name, that Belles represented any other concern, or that his assignor had any other place of business in California. Since the defendant's creditor was generally recognized and understood in business transactions and in this suit, under its full name as well as the company name, as one and the same, the variance, if any, was of no prejudicial consequence to appellant.

[2] Nor do we consider the agent's authority to assign the account for collection doubtful. It is not questioned that he had general direction and control of the affairs of the corporation in the district where both parties apparently transacted all of their California business, and that he had full charge of all sales and collections for his superior, with whom appellant dealt and to whom he was found to have owed the obligation in controversy. Under the evidence before us we cannot say that appellant was misled or that the rendition of judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the subject-matter of the suit could legally be held without prejudice to future litigation upon the same cause of action. Commercial Security Co. v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 184 P. 964; Simpson v. Malter, 43 Cal. App. 662, 185 P. 675.

1. Guardian and ward ⇨22—Jurisdiction in guardianship proceeding after ward's death was limited to settlement of guardian's account and adjustment as to property in guardian's possession.

Jurisdiction of superior court in guardianship proceeding at time when guardian's account was presented after death of ward was limited to matter of settlement of account of guardian and adjustment of rights and obligations with respect to property which had come into her possession or control, and for which she was legally obligated to make an accounting.

2. Guardian and ward ⇨22—Superior court, after death of ward, had power to subject to charge and lien for guardian's security only property within guardian's possession.

Superior court had power, in guardianship proceeding after death of ward, to subject to charge and lien given for guardian's security only that property of ward's estate which was actually or constructively within possession and control of guardian and accounted for by her, and court, in attempting to extend lien to property under control of superior court of another county administering ward's estate, exceeded its jurisdiction.

CONREY, P. J.

[1, 2] The jurisdiction of the superior court of Monterey county in the guardianship proceeding at the time when the guardian's account was presented to it after the death of the ward was limited to the matter of settlement of the account of the guardian and the adjustment of the rights and obligations of the guardian with respect to the property which had come into her possession or control, and for which she was legally obligated to make an accounting. The court had power to subject to the charge and lien given for the guardian's security only that property of the ward's estate which was actually or constructively within the possession and control of the guardian and accounted for by her. This did not include personal property of which the guardian had not obtained possession. It follows that, in attempting to extend the lien to other property then under the control of the superior court of Los Angeles county in the matter of the administration of the ward's estate after the ward's death, the superior court of Monterey county exceeded its jurisdiction. This being so, the superior court of Los Angeles county erred in making the order from which this appeal is taken. The error consisted in accepting said order of the superior court of Monterey county as the basis and authority for the imposition of the guardian's claim as a lien upon all the property of the decedent's estate. If the guardian desired to assert the right claimed by her to payment out of the general assets of the decedent's estate, she should have presented her claim within the time and in the manner required for the presentation of creditors' claims against decedents' estates.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Mandamus (C187(7))—In proceeding to compel city to raise amount of judgment by tax levy representing services performed by plaintiff in supervising street improvement, judgment for defendant must be affirmed, absent contract from record (Improvement Act 1911, § 17; Const. art. 11, § 18).

In proceeding for writ of mandate to compel city to raise amount of judgment by tax levy representing reasonable value of services performed by plaintiff in supervising construction of certain street improvements based on Improvement Act 1911, § 17 (St. 1911, p. 737), providing that, where work is abandoned by city, incidental expenses incurred previous thereto shall be paid from city treasury, judgment for defendant must be affirmed where contract between parties was not contained in record, since, in absence thereof, it would be presumed to be such as to warrant judgment as by containing a direct promise to pay for services in event of abandonment of work, thereby establishing a contractual obligation to make such payment in violation of Const. art. 11, § 18, in that indebtedness incurred exceeded city's revenue for the year, and was incurred without assent of two-thirds of qualified electors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Application for a writ of mandate by C. C. Kennedy to compel the City of Gustine and its officers to raise the amount of a judgment by a tax levy. Judgment for defendants, and petitioner appeals.

Affirmed.

Nathan B. McVay, of Modesto, for appellant.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J.

The defendant city of Gustine, which will be referred to herein as the defendant and respondent, is a municipal corporation of the sixth class. In the year 1920 it employed the plaintiff to perform the engineering work and supervise the construction of certain street improvements under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730). After the plaintiff had performed part of the services for which he was employed, and after the defendant had adopted a resolution of intention to make the improvements, it abandoned the proceedings and terminated the plaintiff's employment.

In an action against the defendant, the plaintiff recovered judgment for the reasonable value of the services he had performed. The judgment was affirmed on appeal. Kennedy v. City of Gustine, 199 Cal. 251, 248 P. 910. Thereafter the plaintiff instituted this proceeding for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant and its officers to raise the amount of the judgment by a tax levy. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed.

It was stipulated at the trial that the defendant's indebtedness to the plaintiff "exceeded the income and revenue of said City of Gustine from all sources provided for the year in which said indebtedness and liability was incurred, and that said indebtedness and liability was so incurred without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors of said City of Gustine voting at an election for that purpose." The only question to be determined is whether the indebtedness was incurred in violation of section 18, art. 11, of the Constitution, which provides: "No * * * city * * * shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose."

It is conceded that, if the liability in question is contractual, the judgment must be affirmed. Arthur v. City of Petaluma, 175 Cal. 216, 165 P. 698. On the other hand, it is conceded that, if such liability is one created by statute, the judgment must be reversed. The judgment which the plaintiff recovered against the defendant is based on the provisions of section 17 of the Improvement Act of 1911, which reads as follows:

"Before being entitled to a contract, the bidder to whom the award was made, or the owners who have elected to take the contract, must advance to the superintendent of streets, for payment by him, the cost of publication of the notices, resolutions, orders and matters required under the proceedings prescribed in this act, and of such other notices as may be deemed requisite by the city council, together with all other incidental expenses [incurred up to the time of entering into the contract]. And in case the work is abandoned by the city * * * the incidental expenses incurred previous to such abandonment shall be paid out of the city treasury."

The contract between the plaintiff and the defendant is not contained in the record. In the absence thereof, it may be presumed to be such as to warrant the judgment. It may be presumed to contain the terms set forth in Kennedy v. City of Gustine, 199 Cal. 254, 248 P. 910, 911, one of which reads as follows: "In the event that any of said improvements are rescinded or postponed by the city, the party of the first part shall pay to the party of the second part as compensation the proper pro rata in accordance with the preceding schedule."

This language constitutes a direct promise to pay the plaintiff for his services in the event of the abandonment of the work by the defendant, and establishes a contractual obligation to make such payment. In the absence of any such provision in the contract, section 17 of the Improvement Act became a part thereof, and is binding upon the defendant as one of the terms thereof. "All applicable laws in existence when an agreement is made necessarily enter into it and form a part of it as fully as if they were expressly referred to and incorporated in its terms." 6 Cal. Jur. 310.

The judgment is affirmed.

Feb. 21, 1930.

1. Pleading ☞121(3)—Garnishee sued on account of judgment rendered against debtor could in answer deny on information and belief that there was any unpaid balance on judgment.

In action against garnishee to recover on account of judgment entered against debtor, it was permissible for defendant to deny on information and belief the existence of an unpaid balance on the judgment, where the complaint set up no privity between him and the judgment debtor.

2. Garnishment ☞7, 88—Debtor's nonpayment of all or portion of judgment is prerequisite to garnishee's liability to creditor, and must be alleged.

Nonpayment of all or portion of judgment against debtor is prerequisite to liability of garnishee in action by creditor to enforce payment by the garnishee, and such fact must be alleged by plaintiff to state a cause of action.

3. Garnishment ☞88—Judgment creditor's complaint against garnishee, merely alleging that sheriff after levies returned judgment against debtor unsatisfied, held insufficient for want of direct averment of nonpayment.

In action by judgment creditor against garnishee to recover on account of judgment entered against the debtor, complaint, which merely alleged collection of $200 by levy, and that sheriff "had returned the judgment unsatisfied as to the unpaid balance thereof," and that subsequent to the levy third party levy was made by the sheriff on the defendant and returned unsatisfied, held insufficient for want of direct averment that the judgment had not been paid.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem.

This appeal is from a judgment on the pleadings in an action against a garnishee. The following facts alleged in the complaint are not traversed by the answer: That on June 24, 1925, the plaintiff commenced an action against one Kathryn Hilliker for the recovery of $1,100 and garnished all moneys in the hands of the defendant herein due from him to said Kathryn Hilliker; that on August 28, 1925, appellant answered the garnishment by stating that he was indebted to Kathryn Hilliker in the sum of $5,800; that on March 19, 1926, "upon stipulation and by order of the court all moneys over and above the sum of $1,500 was [sic] released from said attachment, and the said sum of $1,500 remained in the hands of said defendant subject to said attachment"; that on October 15, 1926, a judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and against Kathryn Hilliker in the aggregate sum of $1,130.70; and that thereafter $200 was collected by the sheriff on a levy and applied to the partial satisfaction of the judgment. It is next alleged that the sheriff "has returned the judgment unsatisfied as to the unpaid balance thereof, to-wit, the sum of $930.70," and that subsequent to the levy above referred to "a third party levy" was made by the sheriff "and demand duly made upon the said defendant to pay the said judgment pursuant to his return of said attachment," that the defendant has failed and refused to pay the same, and that "the same was so returned by the sheriff * * * as wholly unsatisfied." There follows an allegation that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $930.70, none of which has been paid. The answer denies on information and belief "that there is an unpaid balance upon said judgment in the sum of $930.70 or in any sum at all," and denies the alleged indebtedness.

The only point discussed in the briefs of the respective parties is the sufficiency of the denial of the existence of an unpaid balance on the judgment. As to this it is argued by appellant that whether or not the judgment was unpaid was a material issue, the facts of which were not presumably within his knowledge; he not being a party to the original action, and that the payment or nonpayment was not a matter of public record, and hence that he could properly base his denial on a want of information or belief.

[1] Assuming that the complaint sufficiently alleged that the judgment was not paid, and that there was a balance due thereon of the amount involved in the action, we are of opinion that appellant's contention is correct. The complaint sets up no privity as between the appellant and the judgment debtor, and it might well be that he had, as he alleges, no information or belief as to whether or not, at the time he filed his answer, the full amount of the judgment had been received by the plaintiff. The fact of the sheriff's return would only apprise him of the failure of the efforts of that officer to collect.

[2, 3] The complaint, however, does not allege that there existed an unpaid balance on the original judgment. The sheriff's return on the first levy amounted to his statement that he had been able to collect but $200 and that, so far as his efforts were concerned, the balance remained unpaid. The allegation as to the sheriff's return unsatisfied of the "judgment"—probably "execution" was meant—is not tantamount to an allegation that the judgment had not been paid at all. The allegation as to the "third party levy" made by the sheriff on the defendant and the latter's refusal to pay thereon and the sheriff's return of "the same" unsatisfied is again but a statement of the failure of the effort of the sheriff to collect from the defendant. This allegation, like the former, does not aver as a fact that the judgment had not been paid. Setting up the failure of the plaintiff to secure payment through the process of an execution levy does not negative the payment of the judgment by the judgment debtor directly to the plaintiff or in some other manner. The nonpayment of all or a portion of the judgment was of course a prerequisite to the liability of the garnishee in an action to enforce payment by him. It was a material fact which it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege in order to state a cause of action. An allegation that the plaintiff has not been able to secure the payment of the judgment after efforts along a certain line, to wit, by means of the service of process by the sheriff, will not take the place of a direct averment that the judgment remains unpaid, by any one, in whole or in part.

As the complaint thus failed to state one of the facts material to a cause of action, judgment on the pleadings should not have been granted on the plaintiff's motion.

Judgment reversed.

SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v.
CANFIELD.

Civ. 6642.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 20, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 12, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 21, 1930.

Wills 684(3)—Profits from sale of part of bonds and stocks resulting solely from increased market value held part of corpus of testamentary trust.

Under will creating trust in certain bonds and corporate stock, profits realized by trustee on sale of part of bonds and stocks resulting solely from increased market value of property held to remain part of corpus of trust estate, and not accumulation of income to be distributed to beneficiaries.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Proceedings by the Security Trust & Savings Bank, trustee under the will of Charles A. Canfield, deceased, opposed by Charles O. Canfield, for settlement of trustee's account. From portion of order rendered, settling account, the trustee appeals.

Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

CONREY, P. J.

Appellant is a trustee appointed pursuant to the terms of the will of Charles A. Canfield, deceased. The appeal is from that portion of an order settling an account, which determined that a certain sum of money, being a part of the proceeds of the sale of certain bonds and shares of stock, is not corpus of the estate, but constitutes an accumulation of income in the hands of the trustee and should be credited to income and distributed to the life beneficiaries in accordance with the terms of the trust. The notice of appeal covers certain other details of the order, which items need not here be set forth at length.

In course of the administration of the decedent's estate a decree of partial distribution was made whereby, in accordance with the provisions of the will, certain bonds and corporate stocks of the appraised value of $900,000 were distributed to the trustee to be held upon certain trusts which, in accordance with the terms of the will, were set forth in said decree. The trustee was authorized to receive the rents, issues, dividends, profits, and income of the trust estate, invest and reinvest the principal, and after paying taxes and lawful charges and expenses of the trust, pay the net income, under certain stated limitations and conditions to Charles O. Canfield, a son of the decedent, and for the support, maintenance, and education of two children of said Charles O. Canfield. Further provisions were made for continuance of the trust during the lifetime of Charles O. Canfield and of his said children, and for the ultimate distribution of the principal of the trust to certain described beneficiaries.

The aforesaid decree of partial distribution was entered on the 7th day of April, 1914. The trustee entered upon the administration of the trust and thereafter filed a first account and several subsequent accounts of and concerning the trust estate. The present controversy arises out of the seventh account current and the order of settlement thereof. In the first account current, which was approved by the court, it was shown that the trustee had made sale of certain bonds and stocks, whereby the trustee had realized a net gain in the aggregate sum of $111,809.57 over and above the values at which said properties had been received into the trust estate, and that the amount so gained together with the original principal amount or value of said stocks and bonds had been reinvested as part of the principal funds of the trust estate. There was also received in evidence each of the subsequent accounts, whereby it appeared that said sum gained by said sale of said stocks and bonds had been carried forward as part of the principal of the trust estate down to and including the filing of the present account. After the said seventh account had been filed, the said Charles O. Canfield duly filed his objections thereto, in which he contended that the said sum of $111,809.57 was accumulation of income of the estate, which the trustee should be required to credit to the income account and distribute and pay to said objecting beneficiary. The facts are substantially undisputed, and the appeal simply presents certain questions of law to which our attention must be addressed.

On behalf of appellant it is contended: First, that in this proceeding for the settlement of one of a series of accounts the court was without jurisdiction to inquire into or determine the nature or character of the fund not received by the trustee during the period of the account, but which had been received and accounted for in a previous account, which account had been theretofore settled and allowed; second, that the issue raised by the objections to the account had been determined by the order settling the trustee's first current account, and that the question is therefore res judicata; and, third, that the provisions of the trust are not such as to justify the conclusion that the excess amount so received by the trustee from the sale of the corporate securities, was income.

In view of the opinion which we entertain concerning the third question, we shall assume, without close investigation of the law on the subject, that in the proceeding now under review the court acted within its jurisdiction and was not concluded by the order settling the trustee's first account.

The trust estate was distributed to the trustee in accordance with the provisions of a will which gave and bequeathed to the trustee "$1,000,000.00 worth of securities or cash, less $100,000.00 in either cash or securities." It was explained in the will that said sum of $100,000 was deducted from the sum of $1,000,000, which otherwise would have been given, for certain reasons which need not be discussed at this time.

It is now contended by respondent that the will "definitely fixed the trust at the sum of $900,000.00; and that any rents, issues, dividends, profits, income or increase belongs to the beneficiary Charles O. Canfield." We shall assume, as counsel have done in their briefs, that with regard to this contention we are called upon to determine only the question as to whether said sum of $111,809.57 should be rated as income of the trust estate, or whether, on the other hand, said profit, upon its realization, remained a part of the principal.

In view of the decision rendered by the Supreme Court of California in Estate of Gartenlaub, 198 Cal. 204, 244 P. 348, 48 A. L. R. 677, it seems to be settled beyond further doubt that in an instance like that now before us, where the increase in assets realized upon a sale of stocks or bonds of the trust estate did not include any accumulation of income and resulted solely from increased market value of the property, a gain so realized remains a part of the corpus of the trust estate. While the particular application of this rule in the Gartenlaub Case was not identical with that presented in the case at bar, the views expressed by our Supreme Court fully cover the subject. In commenting upon the decision in the Estate of Gartenlaub, supra, counsel for respondent have referred to the citation there made of the case entitled Matter of Graham's Estate, 198 Pa. 216, 47 A. 1108, and suggest that said decision in the Matter of Graham's Estate is not in accord with several other Pennsylvania decisions. It does appear that in that state there are two lines of decision bearing on this question. It further appears, however, that in two recent decisions the rule declared in the Matter of Graham's Estate has been definitely reaffirmed. In re Nirdlinger's Estate, 290 Pa. 457, 139 A. 200, 208, 56 A. L. R. 1303; In re Packer's Estate, 291 Pa. 194, 139 A. 867.

That part of the order of the superior court settling the seventh account current of the trust entered in the above-entitled matter, which finds, adjudges, and determines that the sum of $111,809.57, being a part of the proceeds of the sale of certain bonds and shares of stock, is not corpus of the trust estate, but constitutes an accumulation of income in the hands of the trustee and should be by said trustee credited to income and distributed to the life beneficiaries in accordance with the terms of the trust, is reversed.

That portion of said order which sustains the objections of Charles O. Canfield with respect to said sum of $111,809.57, and which disallows the said seventh account current in so far as it shows the said item of $111,809.57 to be a part of the corpus of the trust estate, and which orders the trustee to credit said sum to income of said trust estate, is reversed.

In respect to all other matters included in this appeal the order is affirmed.

We concur: HOUSER, J.; YORK, J.

INGRAM et al. v. ADAMS et al.

Civ. 7039.

District of Appeal, Second District, Division 2,
California.

Feb. 10, 1930.

4. Wills Ⓒ671—Will authorizing appointment of trustee and requiring monthly payments of bequests held, as respected jurisdiction to appoint trustee, to create valid trust (Civ. Code, § 2221).

Will providing for appointment of trustee and for monthly payments of certain bequests during life of devisees, and for distribution of remainder after liquidation of obligations and bequests, held, as respected jurisdiction to appoint a trustee, to create a valid trust within Civ. Code, § 2221.

2. Trusts Ⓒ25(1)—Intention to create trust, though indispensable, need not be manifested by express terms.

While a disclosed intention to create a trust is indispensable, it is not essential that such intention be manifested by express terms, and it is immaterial that language used is inartificial, ungrammatical, and devoid of technical terms, provided intention is evident from reasonable construction of document.

3. Wills Ⓒ672(3)—Trust will be implied from express authorization to executor to pay certain annuities.

A trust will be implied from an express authorization to executor to pay certain annuities, as this would be impossible unless executor has trust estate in property, and same result follows from a provision giving directions to manage, dispose of, or distribute property for benefit of others.

4. Perpetuities Ⓒ9(2)—Will providing certain bequests and distributing remainder of estate and income to heirs and charitable purposes did not provide for unlawful accumulation of income (Civ. Code, §§ 723, 724).

Will providing for payment of bequests by monthly installments and disposing of remainder of estate and income to legal heirs and charitable purposes held not to have provided for accumulation of income in violation of Civ. Code, §§ 723, 724; it being reasonably apparent that testator intended segregation of income from corpus of estate and payment thereof to objects of his bounty.

5. Wills Ⓒ446—Will, if possible, should receive construction rendering it valid and enforceable.

Will should receive such construction as will render it valid and enforceable, if such construction is possible.

6. Trusts Ⓒ160(2)—Court determining that will created trust had duty, irrespective of request by interested parties, to appoint trustee (Code Civ. Proc. § 1664).

Where court after petition under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, for determination of rights of heirs, had determined that will created a trust and hence that interests of certain of heirs were those of beneficiaries thereunder, it became its duty, irrespective of any request by interested parties, to appoint a trustee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter J. Desmond, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Charles B. Ingram, deceased. From a judgment determining heirship and directing distribution pursuant to complaint by certain heirs, Esau A. Ingram and others appeal, opposed by George W. Adams, trustee, and another.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem.

Charles B. Ingram died about July 24, 1924, leaving an olographic will which was admitted to probate September 19, 1924. While the word "executor" did not appear in the will, the instrument did contain the following language: "I hereby appoint George W. Adams of the firm of Adams, Adams and Binford my attorney for the purpose of seeing that my desires, requests and bequests are fully carried out, and that the court in consultation with my attorney appoint a competent Trustee to hold Title and distribute my estate as hereinafter set out, and for such other purposes as shall be necessary in carrying the intentions of my last will." Construing this as equivalent to the nomination of an executor, the court appointed Mr. Adams as such. Thereafter a petition was filed by one of the heirs under the provisions of section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "praying the court to ascertain and determine the rights of all persons to said estate and all interests therein, and to whom distribution thereof should be made," and following the entry of the decree establishing proof of the service of notice to all interested persons as by that section provided, certain of the heirs filed a pleading entitled "Complaint under section 1664, C. C. P." Upon the issues raised by this complaint and the various answers thereto, the court made its findings and caused to be entered the judgment and order from which this appeal is taken.

Appellants' first point is that the court had no jurisdiction to order distribution of the estate under proceedings had pursuant to the Code section referred to. Inasmuch as the distribution of the estate was the only relief prayed for in the complaint (and consented to by the heirs who filed answers), this point cannot be said to be urged with very good grace. However, it is disposed of by the statement that the court did not, by the judgment appealed from, attempt to order a distribution, but, on the contrary, distinctly refused to do so. One of the findings is "that no settlement of the final account of the executor has been made, and the estate of said decedent is not now ready for distribution," and the language of this finding is repeated in the judgment, immediately preceding the last paragraph, which reads: "The petition for distribution is denied. The stipulation for distribution is dismissed. * * *

[1] It is urged by appellants that no valid trust was created by the terms of the will and that the court had no jurisdiction to appoint a trustee. Omitting the first paragraph as irrelevant to the subject under discussion and the second as having already been quoted ante, the will is as follows:

"That no distribution of my estate be made (except as hereinafter set out) for a period of Twenty years.

"Said Trustee is hereby directed and instructed to sell and dispose of my home and furnishings located at 1601 Fletcher Avenue South Pasadena California (except the bedding, clothing, china of all kinds useful or ornamental, pictures, oil paintings, fancy work, hand needlework, jewelry and silverware) said exceptions to be disposed of as hereinafter directed, that the proceeds therefrom, together with the proceeds from life insurance, and if necessary from the sale of stock now held in the Central Manchester Realty Company, a corporation a first mortgage note of Fifteen Hundred Dollars and a Trust Deed note of seventeen hundred dollars, both signed by M. Nannar a first mortgage note of Twelve Thousand Dollars signed by the Homeland In-Vestment Company, a Corporation and the proceeds to be used to liquidate any and all legal and outstanding indebtedness due or to become due or arising from time to time by or through the carrying out my last will and any cash bequests, and by cash bequests I mean there shall be paid to my brother Joseph M. Ingram, One hundred dollars monthly each and every month during his natural life until such time as the income from my Estate or his interest therein shall be sufficient to make such an amount, to John S. and Florence C. Boster the sum of Five Thousand Dollars each, to George H. Briggs the sum of Five Thousand Dollars in installments of One Hundred dollars monthly until said amount be paid in full unless death ensues prior to or during said period then said payments to cease.

"After the liquidation of my obligations, bequests, I desire that the remainder of my estate and the income therefrom be distributed as follows, Seventy-five per cent to my legal heirs and Twenty-five per cent to charitable purposes as hereinafter set out and directed.

"My legal heirs I mean Joseph M. Ingram and the heirs of the body of his late wife Ida B. Ingram but does not in any event include his daughter Arra A sands or heirs of her body. The heirs of Sister Sarah Ann Boster, my sister Mary E. Thrasher during her natural life and then to the heirs of her body. To Esau A. Ingram during his natural life and then to my natural heirs as herein set forth. And to the natural heirs of my sister Deborah M. Boster being the heirs of her body.

"In recognition of the many, many virtues and the high esteem in which I held my late wife, May B. Ingram and her faithfulness during life to every trust and her desire to aid the poor and needy, and after the payment to all my legal obligations and cash bequests, I desire and do hereby direct that Twenty-five per cent of all my income and finally of the residue of my estate be directed to charitable purposes such as Childrens homes, childrens orphanages or hospitals and homes for the aged and shall be distributed under the direction of the Oneonta Chapter of the daughters of the American Revolution of south Pasadena California or their authorized board of trustees and that said organization or governing board be the sole judge as to how the distribution shall be make and the only report to be made to the court or trustee shall be to show that the money has been by them properly distributed by the Society or governing board in accordance with my direction.

"I desire and direct the personal property referred to in the exception clause as to bedding, clothing, china, pictures, paintings, fancy work, silverware and jewelry be turned over by the Court to John S. and Florence C. Boster as their separate, and exclusive property and that no accounting therefore shall be required.

"I further direct that should any of my heirs objecting too or commencing any action against the carrying out of my last Will and Testament shall be disinherited and shall receive no share of the income or residue of my estate and such portion or portions shall be distributed to the then remaining loyal heirs."

The essentials for the creation of a trust are thus set forth in section 2221 of the Civil Code: "Subject to the provisions of section eight hundred fifty-two, a voluntary trust is created, as to the trustor and beneficiary, by any words or acts of the trustor, indicating with reasonable certainty: (1) An intention on the part of the trustor to create a trust; and (2) the subject, purpose, and beneficiary of the trust." This statutory provision is but a restatement of the rule that to constitute a trust there must be a concurrence of: First, words sufficient to create it; second, a certain subject; and, third, a definite object, by which is meant "sufficient language to sever the legal from the equitable estate, to clearly identify the beneficiaries and the property out of which the trust is to take effect." Thompson on Wills, § 336; Dingwell v. Seymour, 91 Cal. App. 483, 508, 267 P. 327. "An express trust may be created in a will by any form of words which shows the testator's intention to give the legal interest in the property devised to one, and the equitable interest in the same property to another." 2 Page on Wills, § 1040; Meek v. Briggs, 87 Iowa, 610, 54 N. W. 456, 43 Am. St. Rep. 410.

[2] Tested by these rules, Mr. Ingram's will clearly indicates an intention to create a trust. This is manifest by his request for the appointment of a trustee, by the provision that no distribution (with certain exceptions) be had for twenty years, by the direction to the trustee who should be appointed to sell the home and its furnishings (again with certain reservations) and to use the proceeds of such sale, together with those from the testator's life insurance, and, if necessary those from the sale of certain securities for the liquidation of "any and all legal and outstanding indebtedness due or to become due or arising from time to time by or through the carrying out my last will and any cash bequests," by the direction for the payment of certain legacies in monthly payments during the life of the legatees and by the provision for direction of twenty-five per cent. of the income of the estate "and finally of the residue" thereof to charitable purposes. (Italics ours.) The subject of the trust is of course the property left by the testator at his death, and the beneficiaries are those whom he names as his heirs, together with all of those persons coming within the class designated as "heirs of the bodies" of certain named beneficiaries and including as well those charities which should be designated by the board of trustees of the Oneonta Park Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution. It is true that the testator did not always make use of the terminology which a lawyer would have employed in drafting a will. For example, he uses the word "distributed" in the third of the paragraphs last above quoted where "apportioned" or "devised" would have better expressed his apparent meaning, but while a disclosed intention to create a trust is indispensable it is not essential that such intention be manifested by express terms. 25 Cal. Jur. 280, 286; Estate of Haines, 150 Cal. 640, 89 P. 606; In re Shaw's Estate, 198 Cal. 352, 246 P. 48. It is immaterial that the language used is inartificial, ungrammatical, and devoid of technical terms (Id., and see, also, Estate of Dunphy, 147 Cal. 95, 81 P. 315), provided the intention is evident from a reasonable construction of the document as a whole (Estate of Heywood, 148 Cal. 184, 82 P. 755, 757).

[3] If Mr. Ingram did not contemplate the creation of a trust, why the request for the appointment of a trustee "to hold title"? (Italics ours.) "Without doubt a valid and effectual trust is created where property is conveyed by an instrument which expressly discloses that the grantee shall hold title for the benefit of another." 25 Cal. Jur. 284. Again, the provision for payment to Joseph M. Ingram of "one hundred dollars monthly during his natural life," and for the payment to George H. Briggs of "the sum of five thousand dollars in installments of one hundred dollars monthly until said amount be paid in full unless death ensues prior to or during said period then said payments to cease," brings the will within the rule that: "A trust will be implied from an express authorization to the executor to pay certain annuities, as this would be impossible unless the executor has a trust estate in the property. The same result will follow from a provision giving directions to manage, dispose of or distribute property for the benefit of others." Thompson on Wills, § 341.

[4, 5] On this branch of the argument appellants devote most of their brief to an attempt to show that no trust at all was created by the will; they do not, with one exception, attack the validity of the trust as such. The exception referred to is the argument that if the decedent intended to create a trust he also intended to provide therein that there should be an accumulation of income in violation of section 723 and 724 of the Civil Code. In this connection it is to be noted that they do not claim that the court below so construed the will as to impute to the testator an illegal attempt to provide for accumulation of income or that by its decree it provided for such accumulation. The language of the will does not require the construction which appellants place upon it. In at least three instances it is reasonably apparent that the testator intended a segregation of the income from the corpus of his estate and the payment thereof to the objects of his bounty. We refer to the provision for the monthly payments to his brother Joseph "during his natural life until such time as the income from my estate or his interest therein shall be sufficient to make such an amount," to the direction that twenty-five per cent. "of all my income" be devoted to charitable purposes and to the clause depriving any heir who should contest the will of his share "of the income or residue of my estate." It is a well-settled rule of law that a will should receive such construction as will render it valid and enforceable if such construction is possible. In the case of Toland v. Toland, 123 Cal. 140, 55 P. 681, it is said: "In the will of Mrs. Toland there are no terms which forbid a sale or place the land beyond the power of those having interests therein to unite and convey an absolute interest in possession. The testatrix does not give any such direction, and the language used by her is susceptible of a different construction; and it is one of the cardinal rules of interpreting an instrument to give it such construction as will make it effective, rather than void." Again, in Estate of Heywood, supra, the court says: "The intent of the testator is the matter for primary consideration, and it is immaterial what method of expression is employed, as long as that intention can be ascertained. As said in Hill on Trustees, p. 101, 'It is one of the fixed rules of equitable construction that there is no magic in particular words;' and this court has said that: 'Of course, it is a fundamental principle that a construction of a will favorable to testacy will always obtain when the language used reasonably admits of such construction, and that it will not be held to contain a void trust, unless the invalidity of the trust is beyond question * * * and cannot be reasonably construed otherwise.' Estate of Dunphy, 147 Cal. 95, 81 P. 315." See, also, Estate of Wellings, 197 Cal. 189, 240 P. 21.

[6] The contention that the court was without jurisdiction to appoint a trustee is based in part upon the premise that the matter of such appointment was not within the issues. Appellants urge that "neither at the time of the filing of the petition under section 1664, nor at the time of the hearing thereon on the 17th day of February, 1928, was it considered by either the heirs or their attorneys that the question of the jurisdiction or right of the court to declare a trust or appoint a trustee, in any event, would be before the court as an issue. * * *". Apart from the fact that the answer of one of the defendants, Oneonta Park Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, specifically presented this point by requesting the appointment of a trustee, the provisions of section 1664 required the court, in a proceeding brought thereunder, to "determine the heirship to said deceased, the ownership of his estate, and the interest of each respective claimant thereto or therein, and persons entitled to distribution thereof." As said in Whalen v. Smith, 163 Cal. 360, 125 P. 904, 905, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1319, referring to a proceeding under this section of the code: "It is a determination, first of the persons entitled as heirs, devisees, or legatees, or as their successors, if any have died; and, second, the interest of each one in the estate of the decedent." To the same effect is Estate of Ross, 180 Cal. 643, 182 P. 755. The court having determined that the will created a trust and hence that the interests of certain of the heirs were those of beneficiaries thereunder, it became its duty, irrespective of any request by the interested parties or any of them, to appoint a trustee. "The superior court, while sitting in matters of probate, is the same as it is while sitting in cases in equity, in cases at law, or in special proceedings; and, when it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a case falling within either of these classes, it has power to hear and determine, in the mode provided by law, all questions of law and fact, the determination of which is ancillary to a proper judgment in such case." In re Burton, 93 Cal. 459, 29 P. 36, 37. "Where a trust has been created by will, the validity of the trust is necessarily involved in the question of distribution; for, if invalid, the bequest fails. Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 660, 41 P. 772 [49 Am. St. Rep. 97]. Hence, as necessary to distribution, "it is within the province of the probate court to define the rights of all who have legally or equitably any interest in the property of the estate derived from the will." More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 65 P. 1044, 1046, 66 P. 76. As held in Estate of Crooks, Myrick's Probate Reports, 247: "If a trust is attempted to be created, this court must determine how far the attempt is successful, what is the trust, who is the trustee, and who are the beneficiaries. * * *" When a trust is created but no trustee has been appointed or when there exists a vacancy in the trusteeship, it is the duty of the superior court to make such appointment. Civ. Code, §§ 2288, 2289. This the court did in the case before us.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAUTINO v. SUTTER HOSPITAL ASS'N.★
Civ. 4016.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Feb. 15, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing March 17,
1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 14, 1930.

1. Hospitals ⇨7—Private nurse working in hospital in employ of patient therein was invitee of hospital when injured.

Private nurse engaged in work in hospital in employ of patient, but not in employ of hospital itself, was an invitee of the hospital, as regards liability of hospital association for injuries sustained by nurse slipping on floor.

2. Hospitals ⇨7—If hospital was negligent in permitting floors to remain in slippery condition, private nurse, employed by patient, who continued to use floors with full knowledge of such condition, was guilty of contributory negligence.

If hospital was negligent in maintaining floor covered with battleship linoleum in slippery condition, and private nurse employed by patient continued to use floors with knowledge of such condition, nurse was herself guilty of negligence contributing to injury from fall.

3. Negligence ⇨32(1)—Invitee cannot recover from owner of premises for injuries resulting from dangers which are obvious or as well known to invitee as to owner.

Owner of premises is not an insurer of persons whom he invites to enter, but true ground of owner's liability is his superior knowledge of perilous instrumentality or condition unknown to the invitee, and invitee cannot recover from owner of premises for injuries from dangers which are obvious, or equally well known to the person injured.

4. Trial ⇨191(7)—Instruction that private nurse in hospital was not negligent in working there was erroneous as assuming slippery condition of floor.

In action by private nurse against hospital association for injuries sustained in slipping on floor, instruction that plaintiff continuing to work in hospital after having knowledge of slippery condition of floor was not negligent was erroneous as assuming slippery condition of floor as well as incorrectly stating law.

5. Negligence ⇨32(1)—Owner of premises merely owes invitee duty to exercise reasonable care to keep premises in safe condition.

Owner of premises is not under absolute duty to keep premises in reasonably safe condition for safety of person whom he invites to come on the premises, but is only required to exercise reasonable care to keep them safe.

6. Negligence ⇨119(6) — Defense of contributory negligence was available without being pleaded, where contributory negligence was disclosed by plaintiff's own testimony.

Where evidence introduced by plaintiff in action for injuries showed plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, defense could be availed of by defendant, even though not set up in defendant's answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento
County; J. R. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Ruth Mautino against the Sutter Hospital Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Evan J. Hughes and J. W. S. Butler, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Charles L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff when she fell on the floor of one of the rooms in defendant's hospital in which she was employed as a private nurse by the patient occupying the room. The verdict of the jury was in favor of the plaintiff for damages in the sum of $10,000. This amount was reduced by the trial court, with plaintiff's consent, to $6,235, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for that sum. The defendant has appealed from the judgment.

The floors of all the rooms in the hospital are covered with battleship linoleum. Whenever a room is vacated and before another patient is placed therein "a thin coat of paste wax is applied over the surface of the dusted floor, and a large revolving motor with a brush attached to it is used for polishing or rubbing that wax into the surface."

The evidence shows without conflict that battleship linoleum is the standard floor covering in general use in hospitals, and that the above-described treatment of the same is in accordance with usual and approved methods. The linoleum in the room in question had been so treated shortly before the patient was placed therein. The plaintiff is a graduate nurse with several years' experience. She had been employed frequently as a private nurse by patients in the defendant's hospital and was familiar with the floor coverings therein and the condition in which they were maintained. She was not in the employ of the defendant at the time of the accident, but in that of the patient who occupied the room. No witness but the plaintiff testified directly as to the manner in which the accident occurred. Other witnesses gave testimony tending to discredit that of the plaintiff, but it may be presumed in support of the judgment that her testimony is all true. She testified on direct examination as follows:

"I went to duty at noon September 28th and was relieved at 7 o'clock that night by the night nurse." The next morning "I came on duty at 7 o'clock and relieved the night nurse." About 9 o'clock "I slipped and fell. * * * I had taken care of the patient, * * * and I thought the man would sleep, so I sat in the chair by him in the corner, * * * I got up to go * * * outside of the room, and when I got just past the foot of his bed going toward the door, before I knew what had happened or anything, I was on the floor. I had slipped in some way, * * * and I couldn't get up. * * * September 28th, when I went to duty, I told the nurse that the floor was so slippery, * * * the head nurse on that floor. * * * It was slick, and I couldn't keep my feet, the day of September the 28th. It was equally as bad on September the 29th, if not worse. * * * It was highly polished and I couldn't really keep my feet, it was so slick. * * * I told them I would slip and fall—the head nurse."

On cross-examination she testified that she noticed that the floors "were slick * * * from the time" she "first went into the room" and continued to notice it "throughout the day"; that on account thereof "I walked flat footed"; that the floor was as slick on the morning of the 29th as on the previous day, "maybe a little more so."

Other witnesses testified that immediately after the accident the plaintiff said that something had been "spilled on the floor in the room, that she had slipped on it and fallen and hurt herself," but the plaintiff denied that she had made such statement. One of the witnesses for the defendant testified that, about an hour after the accident she "saw white spots on the floor where something had spilled on the wax" at about the place where the plaintiff fell. The plaintiff testified that the "white spot * * * on the floor was part of the dressing that came off my shoes" at the time of the fall.

[1-3] The court properly instructed the jury, at the plaintiff's request, that at the time of the accident she was "an invitee of the defendant." It is clear from the plaintiff's testimony that she had full knowledge of the condition of the floor during all the afternoon of September 28th and for two hours in the forenoon of the next day. It does not appear that the defendant's knowledge thereof was superior to that of the plaintiff. If it was negligence for the defendant to maintain the floor in the condition described by the plaintiff, there appears to be no escape from the conclusion that it was negligence for the plaintiff, with full knowledge of such condition, to continue in the use thereof.

"The authorities are entirely agreed upon the proposition that an owner or occupant of lands or buildings who directly or by implication invites or induces others to go thereon or therein owes to such persons a duty to have his premises in a reasonably safe condition and to give warning of latent or concealed perils. In the language of a recent opinion: 'The law is well settled that an owner or occupant of land who by invitation, express or implied, induces or leads others to go upon premises for any lawful purpose is liable for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition of the land or its approaches, if such condition was known to him and not to them.' * * * The owner is not an insurer of such persons, even when he has invited them to enter. Nor is there any presumption of negligence on the part of an owner or occupier merely upon a showing that an injury has been sustained by one while rightfully upon the premises. The true ground of liability is the proprietor's superior knowledge of the perilous instrumentality and the danger therefrom to persons going upon the property. It is when the perilous instrumentality is known to the owner or occupant and not to the person injured that a recovery is permitted. * * * There is no liability for injuries from dangers that are obvious, or as well known to the person injured as to the owner or occupant." 20 R. C. L., pp. 55-57; Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 211, 201 P. 462; Shanley v. American Olive Co., 185 Cal. 552, 555, 197 P. 793.

Some of the instructions were in conflict with the foregoing statement of the law among them the following:

"The court instructs you that the plaintiff's continuing to work in the room at defendant's hospital after having had knowledge of the slippery condition of the floor was not an act of negligence on her part, nor was she guilty of negligence by reason of continuing her work as a nurse in the room where the patient was confined, even after she had knowledge of the slippery condition of the floor. * * *

"If you find that the floor was so slippery that a prudent and reasonable person, complying with the regulations of the defendant, would, under the same circumstances, slip and fall to the floor, then the defendant would be negligent and your verdict must be for the plaintiff."

[4] The first of these instructions incorrectly states the law and assumes as a fact that the floor was slippery. The second would require a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, regardless of contributory negligence on her part, if the floor was in such condition that a prudent and reasonable person would slip and fall on it. Even if the plaintiff were free from contributory negligence, "not every accident that occurs gives rise to a cause of action upon which the party injured may recover damages from some one. Thousands of accidents occur every day for which no one is liable in damages, and often no one is to blame, not even the ones who are injured." S. S. Kresge Co. v. Fader, 116 Ohio St. 718, 158 N. E. 174, 175, 58 A. L. R. 132.

[5] The court instructed the jury that "it was the duty of the defendant to provide a reasonably safe place for her (plaintiff) to work and discharge her duties." While this instruction may not have misled the jury, it is not an accurate statement of the law. It is not the duty of an owner in such a case to keep his premises absolutely in a reasonably safe condition, but only to exercise reasonable care to keep them in a safe condition. "The responsibility of such owner for the safety of such person in such a case is not absolute; he is only required to use ordinary care for the safety of the persons he invites to come upon the premises." Shanley v. American Olive Co., 185 Cal. 552, 555, 197 P. 793, 794. "The owner of premises is not an insurer of the safety of an invitee, but he owes him the duty to exercise ordinary care in seeing that the premises are in a safe condition." Dobbie v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. (Cal. App.) 273 P. 630, 633.

In respondent's brief it is said that the plaintiff occupied "a status enabling her to claim the same degree of protection as an employee in her place of employment," and that "the employer is bound to provide a reasonably safe place for his employee to work in." It clearly appears that the plaintiff's status was that of invitee, as the court instructed the jury at her request, and that she was in no sense an employee of the defendant.

[6] Respondent urges that the defendant did not plead contributory negligence. The answer alleges that plaintiff's injuries "were entirely and solely caused by negligence of the plaintiff herself and not by any negligence on the part of the defendant." It is not necessary to decide whether that allegation sufficiently avers contributory negligence, because, "where the evidence introduced by the plaintiff shows that he has been guilty of contributory negligence, 'the defense may be availed of, even though not set up by defendant.'" Hoy v. Tornich, 199 Cal. 545, 551, 250 P. 565, 568.

The judgment is reversed.

Civ. 7273.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.
Feb. 13, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 15, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Conflict in evidence was for trial court.

Conflict in evidence presented a question for determination of trial court.

2. Corporations ⇨83—Offer to restore corporate stock was unnecessary before claiming rescission of contract for purchase in case stock was never delivered.

An offer to restore corporate stock was unnecessary in order to claim rescission of contract for purchase thereof in case corporate stock was never delivered, so that there was nothing to restore.

3. Bills and notes ⇨530—Executory agreement to surrender note for stock did not prevent recovery of interest after agreement until date of rescission.

Executory agreement to surrender note in exchange for stock did not prevent recovery of interest on note during period intervening between execution of agreement and time of rescission thereof.

4. Parties $\S$ 75(8)—Defendant, failing to interpose demurrer or plead facts in answer, waived point relative to action being brought in name of copartnership.

Where defendant, claiming that action should have been brought in name of copartnership, interposed no demurrer, and did not plead any such facts as defense in answer, the point was waived.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 761—Point made on appeal will not be considered, where no authorities are cited and no part of record quoted.

STURTEVANT, J.

From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for moneys due, the defendants have appealed, and have brought up a typewritten record. The names of the defendants are but different names for one entity which will hereinafter be designated as the defendant.

Commencing in 1920, F. W. and C. N. Jonas, copartners, were the agents, on this coast, of the defendant. The latter is a corporation, and was engaged in manufacturing at Milwaukee, Wis. Acting on the request of the copartners, the defendant commenced the manufacture of wrenches. The copartners represented the defendant on this coast in the sale of wrenches and other products manufactured by the defendant. As early as 1920, for the purpose of protecting itself against damage suits in the manufacture of wrenches, the defendant caused certain covenants to be inserted in one of its contracts with the copartners. Toward the end of the year 1924, the relations between the parties were terminated by the defendant. Thereupon C. N. Jonas entered into a contract of employment with the defendant, but F. W. Jonas completely severed his relations with the defendant, dissolved the partnership, and commenced to liquidate its affairs. Later he commenced this action.

The plaintiff claimed the amount due on a promissory note which was given for the principal sum of $12,000, and he claimed a balance due on an account for commissions earned. The defendant controverted those items, and claimed there was owing to it $12,000, the purchase price of 120 shares of its corporate stock alleged to have been sold and delivered. It also claimed a sum slightly less than $12,000 alleged to be due under a covenant of the contract of agency.

[1] One of the claims set forth by the defendant in this litigation was for costs and expenses of litigation. The plaintiff replies that the litigation in question was not for the infringement of a patent, and therefore that it did not come within the purview of the plaintiff's contract. He further contends that the original contract of 1920 was superseded by a contract entered into in 1924. In this connection the plaintiff sets forth a certain covenant on the part of the copartners to pay a part of the costs of the litigation, but that said payments were to be deducted from commissions earned by the copartners. Continuing, the plaintiff contends that the defendant waived its right to deduct the payment from the commissions which were earned during the life of the contract and furthermore, that the defendant discharged the copartners as agents, and rendered it impossible for the payments to be made out of commissions thereafter to be earned. The trial court made findings in favor of the copartners on these matters, and there is evidence in the record supporting the findings. The very most that can be said is that there is a conflict in the evidence, but it was for the trial court to determine conflicts.

At one time during the transactions entered into by the parties the copartners agreed to buy from the defendant seventy shares of the defendant's capital stock, and agreed to pay therefor $12,000. The plaintiff contends that the copartners demanded delivery of the stock, but that it was never delivered. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that the stock was delivered to C. N. Jonas. The plaintiff replies that, at the time of the purported delivery to C. N. Jonas, the latter had ceased to be a partner of the plaintiff, that he was not the plaintiff's agent, and that his act was wholly unauthorized. Going further, the plaintiff sets forth that at the time of the purported delivery to C. N. Jonas the latter was one of the employees of the defendant. In this same connection it is clear that at the time of the alleged purchase by the copartners of stock in the defendant corporation the copartners held the promissory note of the defendant corporation in the sum of $12,000. The stock was to be taken in liquidation of that note. There was a side agreement that the corporation would, on demand, within a stated time, take back seventy shares and pay the copartners $7,000. The plaintiff quotes the record, showing that the copartners made a demand on the defendant to comply with these provisions of its contract and that the defendant neglected to do so. The trial court made findings against the defendant on all of these contentions, and there is an abundance of evidence in the record to support each finding. If the defendant was making a claim in good faith that it had sold the copartners stock in the sum of $12,000, we would expect they would have tendered the certificates at least at the time of the trial. But we find nothing in the nature of a tender by the defendant at that time or at any other time.

[2] Addressing itself to the facts last mentioned, the defendant claims that in effect the plaintiff is claiming a rescission by the copartners, and that the facts do not constitute a rescission, because the copartners did not act promptly, and they did not offer to restore. In reply, the plaintiff asserts that under the facts the corporate stock was never delivered, and that no offer to restore was necessary, as there was nothing to restore. San Diego Const. Co. v. Mannix, 175 Cal. 548, 558, 166 P. 325. The reply is entirely sufficient. As stated above, the defendant claimed the certificates of capital stock were delivered to the plaintiff by handing them to C. N. Jonas, but the plaintiff claimed that at the time of the purported delivery C. N. Jonas was no longer a partner, because the partnership had been dissolved. In this connection the defendant asserts that, if the copartnership was dissolved, the defendant had no notice thereof. This statement of the defendant the plaintiff controverts, and, furthermore, he claims that finding No. 10 finds the facts in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. In its reply brief the defendant claimed that there was no evidence on the subject. In this behalf we think that the defendant's claim is overstated. One cannot read the exhibits and the testimony of F. W. Jonas without reaching the conclusion that there was evidence before the trial court which justified it in making the finding.

The defendant asserts that the liquidation of the copartnership was never committed by the consent of the two partners to this plaintiff. In this connection it quotes the testimony of C. N. Jonas as contained in his deposition. The statements of that witness are silent on the subject. If we turn to the testimony given by F. W. Jonas, the matter is entirely cleared up, and there is nothing in the point.

On the 18th day of November, 1924, the contract between the parties was canceled by mutual consent, the said cancellation to take effect as of October 11, 1924. Immediately thereafter C. N. Jonas became, and continued to be, an employee of the defendant. From the 18th day of November, 1924, the plaintiff commenced to act, and did act, in liquidation of the partnership affairs. Nevertheless, on the 16th day of February, 1926, C. N. Jonas assumed to act in behalf of C. N. and F. W. Jonas, and entered into an accord and satisfaction with the defendant. The defendant pleaded the act as a defense. The trial court found the facts against the defendant. The evidence supports those findings, and it is not even conflicting.

In presenting its case, the defendant took the position that it owed the plaintiff nothing, and that the plaintiff owed the defendant $11,620.42, one-half of the costs of the litigation hereinabove mentioned and referred to, and which litigation was brought against the defendant by the Walden-Worcester Company of Worcester, Mass. This claim as an entity is not supported by any evidence. Under the clear terms of the written instruments, the copartners covenanted to pay out of commissions not more than $500 per month on that claim. Those payments were to commence with the month of May, 1924. The contract was terminated October 11, 1924. Six installments only ever matured; that is, $3,000. From the latter sum $100 must be deducted as paid. The maximum amount of the claim of the defendant on this item was therefore $2,900, and no more. It was this amount which the court held the defendant waived.

[3] The promissory note hereinabove mentioned was dated June 3, 1923. By its terms, it carried interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. The trial court ordered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for interest at 7 per cent. per annum from the 7th day of January, 1924. The defendant calls attention to an executory agreement of February 2, 1924, that the note was to be surrendered in exchange for stock, and that said executory agreement was not terminated until the notice of rescission, which was given February 18, 1926, and thereupon the defendant bases the assertion that it should not have been charged with interest from February 2, 1924, the date the executory agreement was made, until the date of the rescission. It does not favor us with any authorities supporting such a contention. We know of none.

[4] The defendant claims that the action should have been brought in the name of the copartnership. No demurrer was interposed. In its answer the defendant did not plead any such facts as a defense; therefore the point has been waived. Williams v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 110 Cal. 457, 42 P. 974.

[5] Other points are made by the defendant, but no authorities are cited. Moreover, no part of the record is quoted. Under these circumstances, we do not feel ourselves called upon to go into the record any further.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. STIBBENS, County Tax Collector.*
Civ. 48.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District.
California.

Feb. 3, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 24, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 31, 1930.

1. Levees and flood control ☞25—Assessments for local improvements were not void merely because county assessor made new assessment roll each year (Storm Water District Act 1909, as added to by St. 1917, pp. 218, 220).

Under Storm Water District Act 1909 (St. 1909, p. 339), as added to by St. 1917, pp. 218, 220, requiring district board of trustees to make annual estimates of money needed, and send their report to county board of supervisors, who shall cause assessments to be levied, entered upon assessment rolls, and collected like state and county taxes, assessments were not invalid merely because assessor made new assessment roll each year, although better practice might have been to prepare permanent record when original report of board of trustees was submitted.

2. Constitutional law ☞48—Every presumption in favor of constitutionality of statute should be indulged with view to giving it full effect.

It is duty of court in construing statute to view it in light of every presumption favorable to its constitutionality, regard being had to Civ. Code § 3541.

3. Levees and flood control ☞23—Assessor had implied authority under statute to levy local assessments on interstate railway right of way, though exempt from general county taxes (Storm Water District Act 1909, § 11).

Storm Water District Act 1909, § 11 (St. 1909, p. 343), authorized local improvement assessments upon all land in district, including railroad property, to be collected, under section 26e, as added by St. 1917, p. 220, § 11, by machinery provided for collection of county taxes. Held, in action by intercounty and interstate railroad to enjoin sale of right of way for unpaid assessments, assessor had implied authority to enter on county tax rolls the assessments upon right of way, notwithstanding it was exempt from general county taxes, in view of fact that Const. art. 13, § 14, has not exempted operative property of public service corporations from taxation.

4. Officers ☞110—Public officer's duties, besides those directly given, include those essential to fulfill purpose of office when they aid in law enforcement.

Duties of public officer include those necessary to accomplishment of purpose of his office, even though merely incidental to express duties, when they promote execution of statutory mandate.

5. Constitutional law ☞70(3)—Courts do not create public policy, although they may declare it as indicated by Constitution and laws.

Public policy is not created by judiciary, and can be ascertained only by reference to Constitution and statutes.

6. Levees and flood control ☞28—Sale of interstate railroad right of way for delinquent local assessments levied under express statutory authority was not contrary to public policy (Storm Water District Act 1909, § 11).

Public policy of California, as determined by Legislature, did not forbid dismemberment of interstate railroad by sale of right of way for delinquent assessments lawfully levied under Storm Water District Act 1909, § 11 (St. 1909, p. 343), expressly authorizing assessment of railroad property; only way to collect unpaid assessments being by sale of land.

7. Levees and flood control ☞25—Assessment apparently only on land used for railroad right of way could not be construed to include franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock.

Assessment appearing to be merely on land used by railroad for right of way could not be construed, as contended by railroad, to be assessment on franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock.

8. Levees and flood control ☞29—Decision of county board that railroad's land was benefited by local assessments was not open to collateral attack in action to enjoin sale of land for delinquent assessments.

Where county board of supervisors had duly determined benefit to land assessed by local improvement district for protection against storm waters, their decision could not be collaterally attacked by railroad in action to enjoin sale of right of way for delinquent assessments.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against C. R. Stibbens, County Tax Collector, to enjoin sale of plaintiff's right of way for unpaid local improvement assessment. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, and H. W. Hobbs, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Albert Ford, of Riverside, and Thomas C. Yager, of Indio, for respondent.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and W. Sumner Holbrook, Jr., Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

MARKS, J.

The appellant is a railway corporation owning a right of way over which it operates freight and passenger trains as a common carrier from the city of Los Angeles easterly through portions of Los Angeles, Riverside, and Imperial counties in the state of California to Yuma, in the state of Arizona, and points east. Respondent is county tax collector of Riverside county, and, as such, took steps to sell the land composing 45.626 miles of appellant's main line roadbed, one hundred sixty-five feet in width, in Riverside county, because of an unpaid assessment levied for the benefit of the Coachella Valley storm water district. The assessment here involved was levied in the year 1921 in the amount of $3,193.68. Subsequent assessments, with charges, penalties, and interest brought the total levy against appellant's right of way to the sum of $20,924.32 on April 30, 1927, no part of which has been paid. After the lapse of a period of five years respondent was proceeding to publish notice and offer for sale to the highest bidder the lands assessed. Appellant secured a temporary restraining order against the proposed sale. At the trial of the action judgment was rendered in favor of respondent and this appeal was taken.

The Coachella Valley storm water district is a storm water protection district duly organized and existing under the Storm Water District Act of 1909, being act of March 13, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 339), as amended. The district lies within the county of Riverside and is crossed by the land composing the right of way of appellant. This district was organized some time prior to 1921, and at that time had issued, sold, and had outstanding bonds to the amount of $300,000, which sum was to be used in the construction of various works for the protection of lands, within the boundaries of the district, from the storm waters of the Whitewater river, an unnavigable stream, and from the storm waters from numerous canyons and washes, all within the boundaries of the district.

This case was originally appealed to the Supreme Court and has been transferred to this court for decision. The Supreme Court permitted the county counsel of Los Angeles county and his deputy to appear and file a brief herein as amici curiæ on behalf of several local improvement districts in that county which will be directly affected by the decision in this case, there being over eight hundred miles of land used as rights of way by various railroads assessed in these districts.

The case has been ably and clearly briefed by the various counsel appearing herein, and in the last analysis the controlling issues have been reduced to two. Appellant maintains that the judgment cannot be affirmed because: First, the general revenue laws of California do not confer upon the county assessor of Riverside county the authority to assess and value the land composing the right of way of an intercounty railroad assessed by the state board of equalization, neither do the provisions of the Storm Water District Act confer such authority, and, therefore, that this attempted exercise of such power is without effect, and is invalid; and, second, that public policy forbids the dismemberment of railroads in enforcement of local improvement assessments. To the first contention of appellant may be added his secondary contention that, as the land used as its right of way did not appear upon the regular assessment roll of the county, the assessor had neither the authority to enter this land upon the assessment roll nor the authority to place any value upon it, nor the authority to perform any other duty under the act; and that, therefore, the assessment levied could not become a lien upon the land in question here, but only upon lands within the district regularly upon the assessment rolls of the county placed there by the assessor in the performance of his usual duties. However, it does not appear from the record that the assessor did place any value upon the land of appellant, speaking now in terms of the common usage of valuing land for assessment purposes.

We have been cited to no case construing the Storm Water District Act of 1909, so we will have to look to decisions upon somewhat similar acts to assist us in our conclusions in this case. Appellant admits that the assessment levied in this case was not a tax, and that it was properly levied and constituted a legal lien upon its operative lands other than the land used as its right of way in question. It is admitted by the respondent that the land assessed and involved in this action was assessed by the state board of equalization for the purposes of state taxation, and was not assessed by the county assessor of Riverside county for the purposes of general taxation for county purposes, and should not have appeared upon such assessment roll for the purpose of local assessment of the district unless the assessor was authorized to place it there under authority of the Storm Water District Act of 1909 and of section 3650 of the Political Code.

We will consider the two grounds upon which appellant seeks a reversal of the judgment of the court below in the order in which we have stated them, namely, first, the authority of the assessor of Riverside county to place the property involved, together with the assessment against it, on the assessment roll, and, second, the question of public policy involved in the sale of a portion of the land used by a railroad company doing an intercounty and an interstate business.

Respondent and amici curiæ rest their case in reply to appellant's first argument upon two grounds, namely, first, that while section 3628 of the Political Code requires the assessor each year to assess and place on the assessment roll all taxable property within his county "except such as is required to be assessed by the State Board of Equalization," still the broad provisions of section 3650 of the Political Code were sufficient to enable him to place upon the assessment roll a description of the property in question with the amount assessed against it, and, second, that, if a tax or special assessment is imposed by statute, the necessary machinery for its collection is implied.

While respondent urges with great force the argument that section 3650 of the Political Code directs the assessor to assess all taxable property within the county and place such assessment on his rolls, we do not desire to adopt this theory as the basis of this decision. The fact remains that, under the provisions of section 3628 of the Political Code, the land in question here comes within the exception contained in that section which we have heretofore quoted, and is assessed by the state board of equalization, together with other operative property of railroad companies. The two sections of the code must be construed together, and we think amply justify the methods of assessment of this class of property, in use for many years, to raise revenue for state purposes, and to retire bonds issued by counties, cities and other public agencies.

There is much more force in the argument of respondent and amici curiæ that, if a tax or special assessment is imposed by statute, the necessary machinery for its collection is implied, though we think that this statement is entirely too broad to be a correct statement of the law, and is not required by the facts of this case. They cite and rely upon the cases of State v. Poulterer, 16 Cal. 514; Koontz v. Burgess, etc., of Hancock, 64 Md. 134, 20 A. 1039, and State ex rel. Southern Railway Co. v. Talley et al., 50 S. C. 374, 27 S. E. 803. These cases, to an extent, seem to support the contention of counsel citing them. However, we seriously doubt the power to collect a tax imposed upon land without any machinery whatsoever being provided by law for its assessment and collection, but, under the facts of this case, such a condition is not presented. In this case we have all of the machinery provided by law for the collection of county taxes adopted by section 26e of the Storm Water District Act of 1909 as added (St. 1917, p. 220, § 11) for the collection of its assessments. The only question presented under this phase of the case is the right of the county assessor to place on the assessment roll of the county the description of appellant's property involved, together with the amount assessed against it to pay its proportion of the cost of the improvements constructed by the district. If he had such authority, either express or implied, the assessment must be upheld, if not, it must fail. The machinery for making an assessment of lands in his county is elaborately set forth in the Political Code, so the question is not lack of machinery to make the assessment or to collect the same, but the right of the assessor to use a small portion of this machinery and put it in motion in this particular case. The authority is not directly given, so, if it exists, it must be implied.

The Storm Water District Act of 1909, as originally enacted, provided for the organization of the district, the election of a board of trustees to govern its affairs, and the appointment of employees to carry on the protection work. After organization, the board of trustees is empowered to have a survey of the district made in order to determine what improvements shall be constructed, and shall have prepared plans and specifications of the improvements proposed. The board of trustees must appoint three commissioners to estimate the total cost of making these improvements, including all incidental expenses, and to assess the benefits and damages arising therefrom. The assessment, which is composed of the cost of the improvements, including any damages that may be awarded, "shall be made upon the lands in said district in proportion to the benefits to be derived by such lands from said improvements, including in said assessment the property of any railroad company within said district, if such there be." Section 11, Storm Water District Act of 1909. The word "property," as used in this quotation, must be held to refer to, and include only, "land," as it is clear from the act that no property other than land is to be assessed under its terms. The commissioners must file their detailed report with the board of trustees. The act provides for a notice of hearing of the report, objections, and a hearing of the same, if any, the rejection or correction of the report or assessment, and the confirmation of the same, or of an amended or corrected report. After the adoption of the report the board of trustees may, if the assessment be too great to be paid in one year, extend the payments in equal installments over a period of years not exceeding ten. Certified copies of the necessary portions of the proceedings are then to be filed with the county tax collector and the assessments spread upon the tax rolls of the county, after which they become liens upon the land assessed and are to be collected by the tax collector. Provision was also made for an annual assessment to provide money for the current year for defraying the ordinary expenses of the district and maintaining and repairing the works and improvements thereof. The levy of an assessment for these purposes does not seem to be involved in this case. In 1917 the Legislature added to the act provisions authorizing the district to issue bonds to pay the costs of the improvements. Stats. 1917, p. 218. This formed an alternative method for the raising of money to pay the cost of improvements within the district. The deferred assessment plan we have outlined was left in full force and effect. It will be observed that the bonds, if the bond plan be adopted, are in lieu of the plan of spreading the payment and collection of the assessments over a period of years, and do not affect the prior proceedings. Under the bond plan the board of trustees of the district is required annually to estimate the amount of money necessary to pay the principal and interest on the bonds accruing each year and certify such amount to the board of supervisors of the county, who shall levy an assessment on the lands in the district sufficient to raise the money. "Said tax, when levied, shall be entered upon the assessment roll and collected in the same manner as the state and county taxes." Stats. 1917, p. 220. In the case before us the estimate was made by the board of trustees and submitted to the board of supervisors, which levied a tax of $1.40 on each $100 valuation on the land assessed within the district. The county assessor entered the assessment on the roll for the year 1921-1922 and succeeding years, during which the same proceedings were seemingly taken. The agreed statement of facts in the record and the findings of fact of the trial court contain the following recital in this connection: "That in the year 1921, the county assessor of Riverside County entered upon the operative rolls the following assessments of the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company," followed by a description of the various parcels of the land assessed with the charges against them. The board of supervisors fixed the rate to be paid on the assessment upon the lands within the district, and the county auditor computed the amounts of the several collections to be made for the year.

[1] The amounts of the assessments, and the fairness of the amounts charged against its lands, are not questioned by appellant, but only the fact that the entries were made by the assessor. It must be admitted that it might have been better practice to have had prepared at the time the original report was submitted by the board of trustees of the district to the board of supervisors, under section 16 of the Storm Water District Act of 1909, a permanent record in which the descriptions of the lands to be assessed, together with the amounts of the assessments, might be entered with extensions for the entry of the various annual installments during the life of the bonds, which would have left nothing to be entered except the annual computations of the installments to become due. Because this was not done, and because the assessor seemingly made up a new assessment roll each year, must the assessments fail? The transcription of the roll was only a manual act, and we cannot see why the writing up of a new roll each year should give appellant cause for complaint if the assessor had the implied authority to do this work. It would seem to us to make no difference in principle whether the assessments were entered in one continuous roll, or were separately entered. This is a question of form and not of substance affecting the rights of the landowners.

[2] It is very evident from the terms of the Storm Water District Act of 1909, both in its original form and as amended, that the Legislature intended to place the burdens of the cost of the improvements upon the lands within the district that were benefited by them. That none of the lands benefited should escape is very evident, and especial mention is made of lands belonging to railroad companies. In construing a statute it is a duty of the courts to construe it and to view it "in the light of every presumption and intendment favorable to its constitutionality" (Los Angeles County Flood Control District v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 169 P. 1028, 1030), so that it may be vitalized and given life and full force and effect (section 3541, Civ. Code; Kydd v. City and County of San Francisco, 37 Cal. App. 598, 174 P. 88; Hunt v. Manning, 24 Cal. App. 44, 140 P. 39; Glassell Development Co. v. Citizens' National Bank, 191 Cal. 375, 216 P. 1012, 28 A. L. R. 1427). If we should hold that some officer did not have the authority, either express or implied, to enter upon an assessment roll the lands of appellant with the amounts assessed so that they would thereby escape the payment of their share of the cost of the improvements made in the district, grave doubts would immediately arise as to the constitutionality of the entire act, and others under which similar modes of assessment were adopted. Such a construction might furnish the avenue of escape from the assessment of large tracts of land benefited by the improvements. This is a result that should be avoided if it can be done without doing violence to the established principles of law in this state.

[3] Under the broad provisions of the law of California the assessor of a county is given the duty, and upon him rests the burden, of assessing all taxable property within his county, with certain definite exceptions, for the purpose of the levy and collection of taxes for county purposes. The right is given him to assess all taxable property, but this right, together with the duty following, is suspended by other sections of the Political Code, where the assessment is made by certain officials of the state. Operative property of public service corporations has not been exempted from taxation by the terms of the Constitution (Const. of Cal., art. 13, § 14), but rather a substituted form of assessment and collection of taxes was adopted. In the case of McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 18 S. Ct. 242, 250, 42 L. Ed. 614, in discussing similar methods of levy and collection of taxes for state purposes to those adopted by the constitutional amendment, the following apt language was used: "When it is said, as it is in this act, that the tax collected by this method shall be in lieu of all other taxes whatever, it would seem that it might be claimed with great plausibility that a tax levied under such circumstances and by such methods was not in reality a tax upon the gross earnings, but was a tax upon the lands and other property of the company, and that the method adopted of arriving at the sum which the company should pay as taxes upon its property was by taking a percentage of its gross earnings." San Francisco v. Pac. Tel. & Tel. Co., 166 Cal. 244, 135 P. 971; Pac. Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 420, 143 P. 700; Southern Pacific Co. v. Levee District No. 1, 172 Cal. 345, 156 P. 502. In fact, instead of exempting operative property from taxation, it affirmatively appears from the Constitution that the Legislature might, under proper circumstances, resort to an ad valorem tax upon this and other property to furnish revenue for state purposes. Const. of Cal., art. 13, § 14, subd. e. It must also be borne in mind that in the case before us we are not dealing with a tax, but with a local benefit assessment to pay the cost of local improvements within the district organized under the Storm Water District Act of 1909.

Bearing in mind that an assessor is given the broad duty of assessing the property within his county subject to taxation for county purposes, and that it is clear that the Legislature intended that the property of appellant involved in this action be assessed to pay its just share of the costs of the improvements within the district, and bearing in mind further that the amendments of 1917 to the Storm Water District Act of 1909 contain no direct mandate to enter the description of this property, together with the assessment upon it, on the tax rolls of Riverside county, we must proceed to the question of whether or not the respondent had the implied power to make the entries that he did in his records. While we have not been referred to, nor have we found a case directly in point, there are, however, many cases construing the implied powers granted to officers and boards within the state that furnish us with the general principles to be applied here. In the case of Laurelle v. Bush, 17 Cal. App. 409, 119 P. 953, 956, the following language was used: "It is a well-recognized rule of statutory construction that a general grant of power, unaccompanied by specific directions as to the manner in which the power is to be exercised, implies the right and duty to adopt and employ such means and methods as may be reasonably necessary to a proper exercise of the power." 2 Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 508; Du Page County v. Jenks, 65 Ill. 275; Ex parte McManus, 151 Cal. 331, 90 P. 702." In the case of Watt v. Smith, 89 Cal. 602, 26 P. 1071, 1072, the Supreme Court spoke as follows: "Authorities may be found to the effect that all public officers have an implied power to take all legal measures in their official character which may be requisite to enable them to execute the trust or discharge the duty imposed upon them by law, where there is no statute prescribing the means by which such trust shall be executed; and therefore, if to accomplish their official duty, or to discharge their trust, it is necessary to sue, power to do so is implied. Cornell v. Town of Guilford, 1 Denio [N. Y.] 510, and authorities cited. This seems a rational conclusion, and logically follows from the fact of the trust or duty imposed, which can be performed in no other way." Again, in the case of Lewis v. Colgan, 115 Cal. 529, 47 P. 357, 358, in discussing implied power from a different angle, the following language was used: "The principle recognized in that case, and applied in the decision, is stated in Throop, Pub. Off. § 542, as follows: 'The rule respecting such powers is that, in addition to the powers expressly given by statute to an officer or a board of officers, he or it has, by implication, such additional powers as are necessary for the due and efficient exercise of the powers expressly granted, or as may be fairly implied from the statute granting the powers.' This statement of the doctrine is abundantly sustained by the decided cases everywhere, and is so universal and undisputed that we deem it unnecessary to cite authorities." The cases of Willmon v. Powell, 91 Cal. App. 1, 266 P. 1029; Skidmore v. West, 186 Cal. 212, 199 P. 497; Haley & Co. v. McVay, 70 Cal. App. 438, 233 P. 409; Harter v. Barkley, 158 Cal. 742, 112 P. 556; City of Woodland v. Leech, 20 Cal. App. 15, 127 P. 1040, and the numerous cases cited in these decisions furnish other apt illustrations of rulings on the question of implied powers.

The act of the Legislature creating the Los Angeles county flood control district (Stats. 1915, p. 1502) contains many provisions as to the assessment of the lands of the district similar to the Storm Water District Act of 1909. The same questions which we are considering under the Storm Water District Act of 1909 were considered and passed upon under the Los Angeles Flood Control District Act in the case of Los Angeles Railway Corporation v. Los Angeles County Flood Control District, 78 Cal. App. 173, 248 P. 532, 535. With the similar provisions of the two acts in mind the opinion of Mr. Justice Nourse in this case is particularly helpful. In passing upon the point we are considering it was held as follows: "It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the rule that when a statute is general in its terms any exemption or exception from its operation must be specific. Thus, when the Legislature declared that the tax should be levied upon all the taxable real property in the district it included every class of real property in the district which was not by the Constitution or statutes expressly exempted from that character of taxation. Now the operative real property of the public utilities within the district, though exempt under section 14 of article 13 from general taxation by the district, but not being expressly exempted from local assessments, comes within the general classification of 'taxable real property,' and as such is subject to the assessments for the purposes of the act. This conclusion follows all the more naturally because it is a matter of common knowledge that the purposes of the act were to protect from damage the public highways and other property in the district, and that the demand for its enactment resulted from the great loss to property from destructive floods which had, for a long period of years, interrupted traffic within the district, washed away railroad bridges, and damaged railroad tracks and rights of way and had caused enormous damage to the property owned by the various public utilities operating in the district. Counsel for the Los Angeles Gas and Electric Corporation, a public utility owning operative property in the flood control district, have filed a brief as 'amici curiae,' in which they advance the point that such property is not subject to taxation under the act because the only machinery provided in the act for the levy and collection of a tax is that provided for the levy and collection of the 'general tax levied for county purposes' from which the operative property of these utilities is exempted by section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution. The argument is that, as this operative property is exempted from county general taxes, the fact that the Flood Control Act adopted the county tax machinery as the only method of levying and collecting the 'tax' for flood control purposes discloses an intention on the part of the Legislature to exempt such operative property from the burdens of the act. The answer to the point raised is a simple one, and is found in the comprehensive opinion written by Mr. Justice Sloss in the Hamilton Case, 177 Cal. 119, 128, 129, 169 P. 1028. In that case it was held that, though the word 'tax' was used throughout the act, the Legislature in fact meant an assessment, and that, accordingly, all the 'taxing' provisions of the act were to be read as authorizing the imposition of a special assessment on the basis of benefits to the real property of the district. Reading the act in the light of this decision, we find that the power was conferred upon the supervisors to impose a special assessment upon all the real property in the district to pay the interest and principal on the bonds of the district, and, to a limited extent, to raise a special fund for the general purposes of the district. This power to assess goes to all the real property in the district. No real property in the district is expressly exempted, and we have seen that the operative real property of public utilities is not exempted from special assessment for benefits by reason of section 14 of article 13 or any other provision of the Constitution. This, in fact, is conceded by the appellant, as indeed it must under the decisions. Southern Pac. Co. v. Levee Dist. No. 1, 172 Cal. 345, 349, 156 P. 502; Los Angeles Co. F. C. Dist. v. Hamilton, supra."

[4] As far as the particular entry on the assessment roll by the assessor of Riverside county of the lands of appellant goes, much the same situation arose in so far as the assessor was concerned, as when property in a new form comes into existence and must be assessed. Not so many years ago there were no motor vehicles to be assessed. Later the radio, the airplane, and other new forms of personal property came into being, and all were assessed. When the inventive mind of man has produced property in a new form, no one could question, not only the right, but the duty of the assessor to enter it upon the assessment roll so that it may bear its just portion of the cost of government. When the inventive mind of the Legislature finds a new class of property upon which it directs shall rest a portion of the burden of a public improvement, we do not believe that the implied power of the assessor to so complete his assessment rolls that this property shall not escape an assessment to pay its just proportion of the benefit it receives should be questioned. No other means of collecting the assessment is provided by law (Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. Reclamation District No. 404, 173 Cal. 91, 159 P. 430), and therefore we hold that the assessor had the implied power and authority to enter upon the rolls of Riverside county the assessment complained of by appellant in this case. The duties of a public officer include, not only those which lie within the direct definition of the statute, but also those which are necessary to the accomplishment of the purpose of his office, even though they may be an incident of his main duties, where they promote the execution of a mandate of law.

[5] What is, or what is not, against public policy is a question upon which courts in various jurisdictions do not always agree. "Some courts, speaking upon this subject, have said that the immediate representatives of the people, in legislature assembled, would seem to be the fairest exponents of what public policy requires, as being most familiar with the habits and fashions of the day, and with the actual condition of commerce and trade, their consequent wants and weaknesses, and what legislation is least objectionable, because it operates prospectively, as a guide in future negotiations, and does not, like a judgment of the court, annul a contract already concluded. There can be no doubt that primarily it is the prerogative of the legislature to declare what contracts and acts are contrary to public policy, and to forbid them; hence public policy is what a statute enacts. Therefore it is the duty of the judiciary to refuse to sustain that which is against the public policy of the state, when such public policy is manifested by the legislation or fundamental law of the state. Nor can courts declare contracts or acts authorized by statute to be contrary to public policy; but in the absence of a statute they may declare void, as against public policy, contracts which are clearly injurious to the interests of the public." 6 R. C. L. p. 709. This rule seems to have been adopted in California in the case of Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 P. 919, 10 P. 674, 702, in which it was held as follows: "The policy of the state is not created by the judicial department, although the judicial department may be called upon at times to declare it. It can be ascertained only by reference to the constitution and laws passed under it, or (which is the same thing) to the principles underlying and recognized by the constitution and laws." The recent case of Maryland Casualty Co. v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 71 Cal. App. 492, 236 P. 210, 212, has enlarged upon but not departed from this rule. In this case the court said: "An exact definition of public policy would be difficult to formulate. One that has been frequently approved is that adopted by Lord Brougham, namely, that no one can lawfully do anything which has a tendency to be injurious to the public welfare. The application of the principle to a given state of facts is not always easy, though it admits of some degree of latitude. Public policy often changes as the law changes. It is manifest, therefore, that there can be no single or fixed standard governing it. The question, what is public policy in a given case, is as broad as the question of what is fraud. It is primarily the prerogative of the Legislature to declare what contracts and acts shall be unlawful; but courts, following the spirit and genius of the law, written and unwritten, of a state, may declare void as against public policy contracts, which, though not in terms specifically forbidden by legislation, are clearly injurious to the interests of society. When the fact is called to the attention of a court that a contract sought to be enforced is illegal, it will refuse the plaintiff any relief, and will generally leave the parties where it finds them. In determining what is public policy in a given jurisdiction, recourse may be had, not only to enacted law, but also to the decisions of the courts of last resort. In considering this question, many courts have cautioned against recklessness in condemning contracts as being against public policy. Thus, it has been said by an English judge that public policy is an unruly horse astride of which one may be carried into unknown paths. A similar caution is one to the effect that, before a court refuses to recognize a contract which is made in good faith, and which stipulates for nothing which is malum in se or malum prohibitum, it should be satisfied that the advantage to accrue to the public from its holding is certain and substantial, not theoretical or problematical, and based upon certain economic or sociological problems. The power to invalidate agreements on the ground of public policy is so far reaching and so easily abused that it should be called into action only in case where the dangerous tendency clearly and unequivocally appears from the contract itself. Courts are reluctant, therefore, to declare a contract void as against public policy, and will refuse to do so, if by any reasonable construction it may be upheld." Again: "As said by Chase, C. J., in the License Tax Cases, 5 Wall. 469 [18 L. Ed. 497]: 'This court can know nothing of public policy except from the constitution and the laws, and the course of administration and decision.' The policy of the state 'can be ascertained only by reference to the constitution and laws passed under it, or, which is the same thing, to the principles underlying and recognized by the constitution and laws.'" Alpers v. Hunt, 86 Cal. 78, 24 P. 846, 848, 9 L. R. A. 483, 21 Am. St. Rep. 17.

In the cases cited by appellant in support of its contention that public policy in California would not permit the dismemberment of a railroad doing an intercounty or an interstate business, the question of the declaration by the Legislature upon such policy was not involved. The cases of Southern California Railway Co. v. Workman, 146 Cal. 80, 79 P. 586, 82 P. 79, 2 Ann. Cas. 583; Fox v. Workman, 155 Cal. 201, 100 P. 246, and Schaffer v. Smith, 169 Cal. 764, 147 P. 976, were decided under the terms of the Vrooman Act. The case of San Pedro, etc., Railroad Co. v. Pillsbury, 23 Cal. App. 675, 139 P. 669, 671, involved proceedings under the Local Improvement Act of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 34). The case of Wilson v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 176 Cal. 248, 168 P. 128, involved a proceeding under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), arising prior to the amendment of the street laws expressly authorizing the assessment of rights of way of railway companies. None of these cases involved a direction by the Legislature to assess lands used by a railroad as part of its right of way to pay the cost of the improvement. In the case of Wilson v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., supra, the court was particular to call attention to the fact that the assessment involved was levied prior to such an amendment to the street laws authorizing the assessment of such rights of way.

Section 16 of the Street Opening Act of 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 376) provided that the cost of an improvement must be assessed "upon and against the lands, including the property of any railroad, within said assessment district." In the case of the Los Angeles Pacific Co. v. Hubbard, 17 Cal. App. 646, 121 P. 306, 309, in construing this act, the court said that: "We perceive no constitutional objection to an act of the Legislature providing for the assessment of all or a part of the right of way, whether owned in fee by the railroad, or consisting merely of an easement, to cover benefits received as a result of the widening of a street; and, since the words inserted in the act constitute express authority and direction to the street superintendent to assess the property of railroads or street railroads within the district, and inasmuch as all land other than rights of way in the district owned by a railroad is clearly subject to assessment under the general language used, it must have been the intent of the Legislature to provide for the assessing of such rights of way, whether the same consisted of an easement or title in fee, where the property would be benefited by the widening of the street. We are therefore of the opinion that the right of plaintiff to the use of the street for the purposes specified in the grant of its franchise constituted a piece or parcel of land within the meaning of the term as used in the street-opening act of 1903, and that such property was subject to assessment for benefits accruing to it by reason of the opening of the street." In the case of Los Angeles Railway Corporation v. Los Angeles County Flood Control District, supra, the question of public policy was presented in connection with the assessment of the land used as a right of way by a street railroad operating within the district and within Los Angeles county. The court held that, inasmuch as the Legislature had directed the assessment of all land within the district, it had declared the public policy of the state to be to permit such assessments, as the word "land" certainly included railroad land used as a right of way. The Los Angeles Flood Control Act contained no specific direction to assess the lands of railroad companies.

[6] In the case before us, section 11 of the Storm Water District Act of 1909 contains an explicit direction that with the lands to be assessed to pay the costs of the improvements shall be included "the property of any railroad company within said district." We believe that, when the Legislature directed the assessment of any land belonging to a railroad company within the district, it intended that the assessment should be paid or collected according to law. In this case the only way to collect a delinquent assessment is by sale of the lands. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. Reclamation Dist. No. 404, supra. We believe the Legislature did not intend to direct the making of a useless assessment and that it has determined the public policy of California to be that lands used as a railroad right of way may be sold to pay a delinquent assessment lawfully levied under the provisions of the Storm Water District Act of 1909.

[7] Appellant further complains of the assessment levied because it insists that it includes the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of the company. We do not so read the assessment in the record before us. The assessment is copied in full and shows only a strip of land 165 feet wide through various sections described, with an amount in money following each of the several parcels described. We cannot construe this to be an assessment on anything more than it shows. From all that appears in the records, the amounts entered are the benefits charged against the lands described in the report of the commissioners and approved by the trustees of the district.

[8] Appellant further complains of a ruling of the trial court refusing to strike out a portion of an agreed statement of facts used at the trial, to the effect that the railroad right of way was benefited by the protection works of the district. This ruling cannot be complained of by appellant in this action. The question of what property was benefited by the improvements was submitted to the board of supervisors of Riverside county during the proceedings leading up to the organization of the district. The findings and decision of the board of supervisors on this question cannot be collaterally attacked in this proceeding. The other questions presented by appellant are not material to the conclusions we have reached and do not need to be separately discussed in this opinion as we have assumed without deciding that its position on these exceptions and assignments of error was correct.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Appellate court cannot interfere with finding supported by conflicting testimony.

Appellate court was powerless to interfere with a finding of trial court supported by conflicting testimony.

2. Evidence ⇨591—Party introducing books of account containing entry shown to have been made without authorization and knowledge of corporate officers was not bound by recitals.

Party introducing books of account was not bound by recitals therein, particularly where it was shown that adverse party, after ceasing to be stockholder in and officer of corporation, had caused entry to be made in books without authorization or knowledge of any one then an officer or stockholder of company, since very fact that entry was made without knowledge and authority of qualified representatives of corporation was material.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wilber F. Downs, Judge.

Separate actions by the Long Beach Brick Company against Rudecinda F. S. de Dodson and others and against J. H. Dodson, Jr., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal; the cases being argued and presented together by stipulation of parties.

Affirmed.

R. P. Stewart and V. P. Lucas, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Knight & Goddard and P. H. Goddard, all of Long Beach, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

These are companion cases and by stipulation of the parties have been argued and presented together. Defendant and appellant in No. 7266, Rudecinda F. S. de Dodson, is the mother of defendant, and appellant in No. 7267, J. H. Dodson, Jr. Prior to May 13, 1924, J. H. Dodson, Jr., was a stockholder in Triangle Construction Company, a corporation. While he was such stockholder that corporation became indebted to respondent Long Beach Brick Company. On May 13, 1924, Dodson, Jr., sold and transferred all of his stock in the Triangle Company, and on May 31, 1924, his resignation as secretary and treasurer was accepted by the directors of that company, effective June 1, 1924.

Prior to November 13, 1923, Dodson, Jr., was the owner of one-third of the subscribed capital stock of the Triangle Company, and between that date and May 13, 1924, he was the owner of two-thirds of such stock. On June 2, 1924, Dodson, Jr., gave a check for $16,000, drawn upon an account carried jointly by his mother and himself, to respondent Long Beach Brick Company. To this check he signed his mother's name and his own. At the same time he received a receipt from respondent acknowledging receipt from James H. Dodson, Jr., of this check for $16,000, "being in full to date for all of his proportion of the obligation of indebtedness of the Triangle Construction Company to the Long Beach Brick Company."

Subsequently, on May 12, 1926, respondent Brick Company recovered judgment against the Triangle Construction Company in the aggregate sum of $8,958.46 principal, interest, and costs. Execution having been returned unsatisfied, these suits were brought to reach and apply claimed indebtednesses of appellants to the Triangle Construction Company in satisfaction of respondent's judgment. Judgment followed against Rudecinda F. S. de Dodson for $5,216.43 and against J. H. Dodson, Jr., for $4,578.16. These are the judgments here appealed from.

In both cases the issue between the parties was a narrow one. It was admitted by Rudecinda F. S. de Dodson that prior to June 2, 1924, she was indebted to the Triangle Construction Company in the sum of $5,216.43, but it was claimed that as a part of the transaction by which the $16,000 check was given to respondent on June 2, 1924, it was agreed that that check should be applied to the extent of $5,216.43 to extinguish her indebtedness to the Triangle Company and that the balance after deducting that amount was received in full payment of J. H. Dodson, Jr.'s, proportion of the stockholder's liability to respondent. This was flatly contradicted by two witnesses for respondent Armstrong, who was the agent for the Brick Company in the transaction, and Weldon, president and general manager of the Triangle Company. According to their testimony, on June 2, 1924, the Triangle Company was found to be indebted to the Brick Company in the total sum of $24,623.47. At that time the Triangle Company paid $623.47 to the Brick Company to reduce its indebtedness to an even $24,000 and the check for $16,000 was given as full payment of Dodson, Jr.'s, proportion of the stockholder's liability. Both witnesses testified that it was never suggested that Rudecinda de Dodson's debt to the Triangle Company should be canceled as a part of this transaction.

[1, 2] In this state of the evidence we have the familiar case of a conflict in the testimony which has been resolved by the trial court in favor of respondent. With a finding so supported this court is powerless to interfere. Appellants claim, however, that because respondent introduced a part of the journal of the Triangle Company which contained an entry giving Rudecinda de Dodson a credit of $5,216.43, thus balancing her account, it made such journal entry its evidence and could not contradict this entry by other evidence. In this connection appellants argue that while books of account are ordinarily only prima facie evidence of the facts recited therein, and may be contradicted by other evidence, nevertheless when they are introduced by a party as a part of his case he is bound by their recitals and cannot contradict them. Appellants cite in support of this contention only one case claimed to be in point, Cummins v. Hull, 35 Iowa, 253, and admit that they can find no others. If the case of Cummins v. Hull goes to the extent that appellants claim, we do not feel bound by it.

[3] Taking the evidence most favorable to respondent, as we are obliged to do, it appears that after Dodson, Jr., had ceased to be a stockholder in and officer of the Triangle Company he caused this entry to be made in the books without the authorization or knowledge of anyone then an officer or stockholder of the company. It would be strange under such circumstances if respondent by proving the entry would thereby be deprived of the right to show how and by whom it was made. The very fact that the entry was made without the knowledge and authority of the qualified representatives of the corporation was material for respondent to prove. Yet how could it be proved without proving the entry itself? We are content on this phase of the case to point out that in Bank of British Columbia v. Frese, 116 Cal. 9, 47 P. 783, the defendant after putting into evidence books of account was permitted to contradict certain of the entries therein by other testimony. It may be remarked also that the journal in this case was not introduced to prove the item in question, but only to prove that it was entered long after June 2, the date when appellants claim the credit was given.

[4] Appellants argue further that the entry binds the Triangle Company and hence respondent, because, as they claim, Dodson, Jr., was an officer de facto on June 2, 1924. It is a sufficient answer to this contention that he had ceased to be a stockholder and officer de jure before that date and there is no showing of any facts sufficient to constitute him an officer de facto. The fact that he signed a check for the corporation after that date is fully explained by a resolution of the board of directors providing that funds received for work done prior to June 1, 1924, should be placed in a special account to be paid on the indebtedness of the corporation incurred prior to that date subject to checks signed by Dodson, Jr., and countersigned by Weldon. After June 1, 1924, this is the extent of the authority of Dodson, Jr., to act for the company as shown by the evidence.

Appellants' claims of estoppel and laches depend on their construction of the evidence, but under the facts testified to by respondent's witnesses and found by the court there is no substance to such claims.

[5, 6] On behalf of appellant Dodson, Jr., it is argued that a $16,000 credit which appears on the books as of June 2, 1924, balanced his account with the Triangle Company. This represents the check for $16,000 given to respondent on that date. Counsel for appellants do not dispute that a stockholder paying his stockholder's liability is not entitled to reimbursement from the corporation (6 Cal. Jur. pp. 1036, 1037, § 413; Trindade v. Atwater Canning Company [Cal. App.] 128 P. 756, and cases therein cited), but they insist that since prior to November 13, 1923, Dodson, Jr., owned only one-third of the subscribed stock of the Triangle Company, and since the evidence does not affirmatively show when the indebtedness to respondent accrued, it cannot be said that Dodson, Jr., owed the entire $16,000 as his share of the liability as a stockholder. This conduct on June 2, 1924, as related by Armstrong and Weldon, was an admission that $16,000 was his proportion of the stockholder's liability sufficient to support a finding of that fact.

[7] The denial of the motion for nonsuit at the close of respondent's case need not be considered because the question of whether or not the court erred in denying a nonsuit becomes of no consequence if, upon the conclusion of the whole case, there is evidence sufficient to support a judgment. Peters v. S. P. Co., 160 Cal. 48, 52, 53, 116 P. 400; Cosby v. Cline, 186 Cal. 698, 702, 200 P. 801; County of Los Angeles v. Rindge Co., 53 Cal. App. 166, 175, 200 P. 27; Raddant v. Watson, 89 Cal. App. 103, 106, 264 P. 589. What has been said disposes of the alleged error in denying a nonsuit at the close of all the evidence.

Judgments affirmed.

The practical construction placed on a contract by the parties thereto is strong evidence of their intention.

2. Partnership §328(3)—Evidence held to support trial court's conclusion that amounts drawn by partner were chargeable to expense of conducting business, whether profitable or not.

In action for dissolution of partnership and accounting, evidence held sufficient to support trial court's conclusion that amounts drawn by plaintiff pursuant to contract were properly chargeable to expense of conducting business, whether it showed a profit or loss.

3. Partnership §83—Agreement to compensate partner for services to partnership may be made by partners or implied (Civ. Code, § 2413, see Civ. Code 1929, § 2412(f)).

While a partner generally is not entitled to any compensation for services rendered to partnership, under Civ. Code, § 2413 (see Civ. Code 1929, § 2412(f)), partners may agree that one of them shall receive compensation or such agreement may be implied.

4. Partnership §329—Existence of contract to compensate partner for services to partnership is for court to determine from facts and circumstances.

Existence or nonexistence of partners' contract to pay compensation to one of them for services to partnership is a question for court to determine from facts and circumstances of case.

5. Appeal and error §996—Fact inferences supporting trial court's conclusions as to existence of contract to pay partner for services rendered to partnership will not be disturbed on appeal.

Inferences of fact supporting trial court's conclusions as to existence or nonexistence of partners' contract to pay one of them compensation for services rendered to partnership will not be disturbed on appeal, though court might have found the other way with equal propriety.

6. Partnership §328(3)—Evidence held to warrant court's implied conclusion that parties to action for partnership accounting understood that defendants were to receive compensation for their services to partnership.

In action for dissolution of partnership and accounting, evidence held sufficient to warrant trial court's implied conclusion that parties understood that defendants were to receive compensation for their services to partnership.

PER CURIAM.

The defendants for some time previous to January 29, 1923, were copartners doing business under the firm name and style of William J. Forster Company. On that date they entered into an agreement in writing with the plaintiff, who was named therein as the party of the second part, whereby he became a special partner in the business for the purpose of sharing the profits, it being stipulated that any loss should be borne by the defendants. The agreement provided that each partner should take an active part in the business, one of the defendants being the business manager, the other the general superintendent of work, and the plaintiff to have charge of the men employed. It was also agreed that plaintiff should have a drawing account of not more than $50 a week and ten per cent. of the net profits "minus the amount advanced on the drawing account, and in the event there should be no profits at the end of each calendar year then the party of the second part shall be entitled to said fifty dollars per week as a salary and not obligated to return same to said copartnership." This action was brought for dissolution of the copartnership and an accounting.

An accounting was had, and it appeared that no profits were earned by the concern during the years 1924 and 1925. During the year 1923, however, the net profits shown by the books amounted to $14,106.21. According to the findings of the court plaintiff was entitled to 10 per cent. thereof in addition to the amounts received by him on his drawing account, to which the court found he was entitled as a salary, and entered judgment in his favor for $1,410.62, with interest thereon from December 31, 1923, a total of $1,847.60.

Defendants have appealed therefrom, contending that the amounts drawn by plaintiff during the year should have been deducted from his percentage of the profits. The accounting also showed that defendants withdrew certain amounts as salaries, and that the plaintiff failed to withdraw the full amount from his drawing account which the contract permitted. The plaintiff—who also appeals from the judgment—claims that the sums drawn by the defendants were improperly allowed as salaries, and that he is entitled to the difference between the total amount of his drawing account and that received by him.

According to the testimony of the plaintiff it was not the understanding of the parties that the amounts drawn by him should be deducted from his share of the profits, if any, but that the same should be charged to general operating expense; that when the contract was drawn he protested against its wording, but was assured by defendants' attorney that it expressed plaintiff's understanding of the agreement. It also appears without dispute that at the end of the year 1923 defendants informed plaintiff that the business for the year showed a profit of $12,952.70, his percentage being $1,295.27, requesting him, however, not to withdraw the same as the concern was in need of money, to which he agreed.

[1, 2] The practical construction placed upon the contract by the parties is strong evidence of their intention (6 Cal. Jur., Contracts, § 184, p. 304), and the foregoing testimony sufficiently supported the conclusion of the trial court that the amounts drawn by plaintiff pursuant to the contract were properly chargeable to the expense of conducting the business, whether the same showed a profit or otherwise.

[3-5] As a general rule a partner is not entitled to any compensation for services rendered by him to the partnership. Civ. Code, § 2413 (see Code 1929, § 2412(f)). It has been frequently decided, however, that the partners may agree that a partner shall receive compensation, or such an agreement may be implied, and the existence or nonexistence of such a contract is a question for the court to determine from the facts and circumstances of the case, and its inferences of fact which support its conclusions will not be disturbed on appeal, though it might with equal propriety have found the other way. Nevills v. Moore Mining Co., 135 Cal. 561, 67 P. 1054.

[6] The evidence was that in 1923 one of the defendants drew sums from the partnership, these amounts being entered, according to the statement filed by the accountant employed by the referee, as wages drawn, and each year thereafter both of the defendants followed the same course, entering the amounts received on the books as wages and salaries drawn. According to the plaintiff a statement of the profits was made for the year 1923, and it may be inferred from his testimony that it was shown to him. Moreover, he does not claim to have been denied access to the books, or that he was not aware of the receipt of salaries or wages by the defendants, and the point does not appear to have been raised at the trial. The circumstances shown were sufficient to warrant the implied conclusion of the trial court that the parties understood that the defendants were to receive compensation for their services, and no contention is made that the amounts were excessive.

[7] Under the contract plaintiff was permitted to draw $2,600 each year, or $7,800 for the three-year period. During that time he drew a total of $7,503.25, and claimed the difference of $296.75. It has been held that a contract providing for a drawing account in a certain sum per week as against commissions is an agreement to pay that amount absolutely and not on condition (Schnabel v. American Educational Alliance, 79 Misc. Rep. 624, 140 N. Y. S. 369; North Western Life Ins. Co. v. Mooney, 108 N. Y. 118, 15 N. E. 303; Handy v. Van Cortlandt Realty Co., 156 App. Div. 110, 140 N. Y. S. 1081), and, in view of the finding that the advances were intended as a salary, plaintiff's claim to the balance must be sustained. While an action therefor could not have been maintained previous to an accounting and settlement of the partnership affairs (Ferem v. Olson & Mahony, 176 Cal. 652, 169 P. 386; Dukes v. Kellogg, 127 Cal. 563, 60 P. 44; Murphy v. Community, etc., Bureau [Sup.] 190 N. Y. S. 849), the amount should have been allowed in the accounting.

[8] As stated, the trial court allowed plaintiff interest on his percentage of the proceeds earned during the year 1923 at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from December 31st of that year. The latter testified that at the request of his partners he allowed this amount to remain in the business. This was in effect a loan to the partnership, and, there being no agreement to pay interest thereon, it is the rule in such cases that interest cannot be recovered. Carpenter v. Hathaway, 87 Cal. 434, 25 P. 549; Clement v. Duncan, 191 Cal. 209, 215 P. 1025.

[9] The same rule should apply to the balance remaining in the drawing account. So far as appears there was nothing to prevent the plaintiff from drawing each week the full amount allowed by the contract. No demand for or refusal to pay the balance was shown, and there was no express agreement to pay interest thereon. It is the general rule that the payment of interest must be the subject of an agreement, express or implied (Young v. Canfield, 33 Cal. App. 343, 164 P. 1134), and here it was manifestly not the intention of the parties that the drawing account should bear interest. For the foregoing reasons the amount allowed by the court as interest, namely, $436.98, should be deducted from the judgment, and the balance of the drawing account amounting to $296.75 added thereto.

The judgment is accordingly modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $140.23, the difference between the above amounts, and, as so modified, is affirmed. It is further ordered that each party pay his own costs of appeal.

In prosecution for grand theft, refusal of instruction that mere proof that defendant had opportunity to commit crime was insufficient to warrant conviction, but prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that defendant actually did commit crime, held not error, in view of other instructions given to effect that defendant's guilt must be established beyond reasonable doubt and that if jury entertained reasonable doubt defendant committed offense charged it was their duty to return verdict of not guilty.

8. Criminal law ⚡829(12)—Refusing instruction defendant could not be convicted of grand theft upon mere evidence of unlawful possession or sale of liquor held not error, in view of instructions given.

In prosecution for grand theft, refusal of instruction to effect that defendant could not be convicted of grand theft upon mere evidence of unlawful possession or sale of illicit liquor, and that such evidence did not even tend to prove crime with which he was charged, held not error, where jury were specifically instructed with respect to necessity of proving each of essential elements of particular offense with which defendant was charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Thomas H. Selvage, Judge.

Virgil Freer was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Blaine McGowan, of Eureka, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

The defendant was convicted of grand theft. It is contended the evidence fails to support the judgment and that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions to the jury.

The defendant's wife, who is named Dolores, but was called Del, was employed as an entertainer at the Frontier Cabaret in Eureka. She had apartments at the Redwood rooming house, which she used for assignment purposes. The defendant was a taxi driver. On the night of August 22, 1929, the prosecuting witness Vikan and a companion by the name of Brough visited the Frontier Cabaret, where they met Mrs. Freer and other entertainers. The cabaret closed at 2 o'clock in the morning. The group consisting of Mrs. Freer and Vikan, Brough, and two other dance girls named respectively Annabelle and Florence, were driven by the defendant in his taxicab to the Splendid Café, where they remained for an hour eating and drinking. The defendant was not a member of this party. The entire group then went to the Redwood rooming house, where for two hours they occupied together the bedroom of Mrs. Freer. The evidence would warrant the jury in assuming that by prearrangement between the defendant and his wife, Vikan was lured to this room for the purpose of plying him with liquor until he became sufficiently drunk to safely rob him. Mrs. Freer knew he had a purse containing a number of greenbacks. He had exhibited it at the restaurant when he paid the bill for refreshments. She saw him slip the purse under the pillow on his bed in her room. During the two hours the revelers occupied the room at the Redwood apartments, Mrs. Freer was actively engaged in procuring and dispensing whisky to them. Three times she left the room and returned each time with a bottle of liquor which she obtained from her husband, who was conveniently stationed with his taxicab in front of the Redwood rooming house. The last bottle of whisky was voluntarily contributed by Mrs. Freer without charge. Regarding the presence of the defendant at the rooming house, Florence Pedro, one of the occupants of the room testified:

"Q. Each time Del had to leave the room and go somewhere and get the liquor and return? A. Yes, but she didn't go so very far.

"Q. How long was she gone? A. Well, she just stepped out and (just) had time to come right back in.

"Q. Did she have it in the hall? A. Well, she had a taxicab there (it was) supposed to be her husband; he was waiting there.

"Q. You didn't see him, did you? A. Saw him once, yes. * * * When he came up with the first bottle, he was standing out in the hall. * * *

In a statement which was made by the defendant after his arrest, he admitted having furnished the liquor and that he twice left the Redwood rooming house, where he was stationed that night, to obtain liquor at the request of his wife. He said:

"Q. You did make two trips from the Redwood rooms that night? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. And you returned each time with a pint of whisky? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. What time was it that you arrived there the second trip? A. Four-fifteen. * * *

"Q. When you came back you were inside the building? A. Yes sir. * * * I went as far as the end of the hall * * * upstairs."

Florence Pedro also corroborates the evidence of his presence at the door of his wife's room about 4 o'clock, which was shortly before the time of the theft. She said she saw him in the hallway at the door.

"Q. It was then that she (Dolores Freer) took the purse? * * * A. Close to four o'clock in the morning."

It is the theory of the prosecution that the purse of Vikan containing $400 in greenbacks was stolen by Mrs. Freer from under the pillow and delivered to the defendant in the hallway immediately afterward. At the time the purse was taken the entire group were in the room. Vikan sat on the edge of his bed beside Annabelle Sonneland. Florence Pedro sat on the adjoining bed. Mrs. Freer stood near the head of Vikan's bed serving whisky. Suddenly she put the bottle down and, reaching under the pillow, she withdrew the purse and hurried out of the room into the hallway. Both Vikan and Florence Pedro saw her take the purse. The latter immediately arose and called to Annabelle that Dolores had stolen the purse, and directed her to follow the thief and assist in recovering the purse. Within a brief period of time, during which Florence Pedro was engaged in putting on a wrapper and slippers, she rushed in pursuit of Mrs. Freer into the hallway, where she found her alone. The defendant was not in sight. Seizing Dolores, Florence Pedro accused her of stealing the purse and demanded that she give it up. Whereupon Mrs. Freer slumped down upon the floor, pretending that she had been hurt, and said: "Oh, my husband hit me across the head and took it away from me." A quarrel ensued. Considerable commotion followed. Mrs. Freer was immediately searched by the girls, but neither the purse nor the money was found. The foregoing accusation against the defendant by his wife was hearsay evidence, but it was adduced without objection. Moreover, on cross-examination of Florence Pedro by counsel for the defendant the following controversy occurred: "Q. Oh, you asked her where the purse was? A. Yes. Q. And she said, 'I haven't it'? A. No. She said, 'my husband hit me over the head and took it.'" This statement of Mrs. Freer's was also corroborated by another witness.

After quarreling for some time among themselves about the disappearance of the purse, the police office was called about 5:25 o'clock in the morning and the theft was then reported. The officers immediately hastened to the Redwood rooming house and interviewed the members of the party. They then took the group to police headquarters, where a more particular examination was conducted. They then returned to the Redwood apartments once more, and after a careful search Officer Rutledge discovered the empty purse under the slop-hopper in the hallway where Mrs. Freer stood when she charged her husband with striking her and taking the purse. The officers then went to the home of the defendant, where they arrived at 6:35 o'clock in the morning. He was found in bed, but was immediately placed under arrest. He subsequently made the statement heretofore quoted.

[1-3] We are satisfied the evidence is sufficient to support the judgment of conviction. It is true that the testimony indicates that the defendant was either a principal in the commission of the crime according to the definition of that term which is found in section 31 of the Penal Code on the theory that he aided and abetted in its commission, or that Dolores Freer was an accomplice of the defendant and therefore under the provisions of section 1111 of the Penal Code he could not be convicted upon her charge of his guilt alone "unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." It is insisted that the evidence merely shows the defendant had the opportunity to steal the money, but that it utterly fails to prove that he actually did so. His wife, however, charged him directly with taking the purse. To be sure this charge was adduced by means of hearsay evidence. But it was introduced in the record without objection and was reiterated on cross-examination by the defendant's own counsel. Hearsay evidence which is adduced without objection is proper to be considered in support of a verdict of conviction. It will be observed that section 1111 of the Penal Code requires the testimony of an accomplice to be corroborated by facts or circumstances which tend only to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. The record contains ample evidence which tends to so connect him. He took the entire party in his taxicab from the cabaret to the restaurant. He knew his wife's occupation and must have been acquainted with her reputation. He did not take the group from the restaurant to the Redwood rooming house. He knew they were there, however, for his machine was parked out in front while his wife was plying the victim with liquor so as to get him in a suitable condition to safely rob him. The defendant supplied the liquor by means of which the job was accomplished. He delivered the last bottle to his wife in the hallway at about 4 o'clock, which is the exact time when Florence Pedro says the theft occurred. He was therefore present at the very time and place to have received the purse which his wife charged him with taking. He then disappeared from the scene of the theft and returned there no more. Evidently he knew there would be no further demand for liquor. Mrs. Freer was immediately seized after she stole the purse and was searched. She had neither the purse nor the money. The money was never recovered. It seems to have disappeared with the defendant. Soon afterward the empty purse was found under the slop-hopper where it was evidently hastily thrown or hidden.

The defendant admitted he was in the hallway to which his wife fled with the purse at 4:15 o'clock that morning. These facts certainly tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime and corroborate his wife's charge that he struck her and took the purse away. At least it is reasonable to infer from these circumstances that the defendant was in the hallway when his wife came from her room and either forcibly took the purse from her or received it when she voluntarily gave it to him and that he hastily extracted the greenbacks, threw the purse under the slop-hopper, and fled. The slight delay which followed Mrs. Freer's flight from the bedroom before she was overtaken in the hallway and the commotion which followed may reasonably account for the failure to hear the defendant as he went down the stairway or to hear him start his machine and drive away from the rooming house.

[4-6] The defendant contends that his statement which was offered in evidence by the prosecution furnishes a complete alibi and binds the state by his assertion that he was in bed at 4:30 o'clock the morning of the theft, which precludes the possibility of his guilt. The prosecution, however, is not bound by a self-serving declaration of an accused person which may be included in his statement merely because it is offered in evidence by the state. The jury had the exclusive right to pass upon the weight of the evidence and in doing so it was privileged to reject the entire statement or any part thereof which it believed to be false. Any other rule would render such statements valueless to the prosecution for it is a recognized tendency on the part of one who is accused of a crime to strenuously profess his innocence. Section 2049 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the party who produces a witness to "contradict him by other evidence" or show that "at other times (he made) statements inconsistent with his present testimony." Callahan v. Danziger, 32 Cal. App. 405, 408, 163 P. 65; Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) 1349, § 857. Moreover, the statement fails to furnish evidence of an alibi. The defense assumes that immediately after Dolores Freer was seized in the hallway and accused of the theft, the police department was called; that since this call did not actually occur until 5:25 o'clock in the morning, and the defendant was in bed at 4:30 o'clock, it therefore furnishes a complete alibi. While there may be some evidence to support this theory, the testimony of Florence Pedro, which is quoted above, is that the purse was taken "close to four o'clock in the morning." The defendant admitted he was in the hallway at the Redwood apartments at 4:15 o'clock. This would connect him closely enough with the theft of the purse at about 4 o'clock and still give him ample time to drive his taxicab from the Redwood rooming house and get in bed by about 4:30 o'clock. An alibi was therefore not satisfactorily established. It is unquestionably true that the police department was not called until 5:25 o'clock. This was a little over an hour after the theft occurred. It does not seem unreasonable to believe that the members of this group of revelers laboring under the influence of three pints of whisky, or more, may have consumed the intervening hour and a quarter quarreling and wrangling over the loss of the purse. Under such circumstances as this case presents, too accurate calculation of time may not be insisted upon in order to create an alibi upon which to discharge an accused who is surrounded with so many incriminating circumstances. It was the province of the jury to determine whether an alibi had been successfully established.

[7] The defendant complains of the court's refusal to give to the jury an instruction which was offered, to the effect that mere proof that the defendant had the opportunity to commit the crime with which he was charged was insufficient to warrant a conviction, but that the prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant actually did commit the crime. In view of other instructions which were given to the jury, the refusal to give this instruction was not error. The jury was instructed respecting the nature of the crime with which the defendant was charged in the precise language of the information. They were then repeatedly told that, "The defendant's guilt must be established beyond a reasonable doubt." Furthermore, the jury was instructed that: "You are here for the purpose of trying the issues of fact that are presented by the allegations of the information filed in this court," and " * * * If you entertain * * * a reasonable doubt * * * that the defendant committed the offense charged in the information, it is your duty to return a verdict of not guilty." Finally, the jury was instructed that the prosecution must prove to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt every essential element and circumstance necessary to establish the defendant's guilt of the crime with which he was charged, or he was entitled to an acquittal. In view of these instructions, it seems unreasonable to assume that the verdict could have been based upon evidence that the defendant merely had the opportunity to commit the offense with which he was charged rather than proof that he actually did commit the crime of grand theft.

[8] The defendant also charges the court with error in refusing to give to the jury an instruction to the effect that the defendant could not be convicted of grand theft upon mere evidence of the unlawful possession or sale of illicit liquor, and that such evidence did not even tend to prove the crime with which he was charged. This may have been a proper instruction in view of the prominence which was given to the subject of intoxicating liquor in the present case. However, we do not think it was error to refuse this charge, since the jury was so specifically instructed with respect to the necessity of proving each of the essential elements of the particular offense with which the defendant was charged.

We are of the opinion that the jury was fully and fairly instructed upon the law of the case and that there was no miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOLISH v. FEINSTEIN.
Civ. 6937.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.
Feb. 17, 1930.

Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 82(3)—Order after default judgment overruling plaintiff's objections to hearing by designated judge of any issue held appealable as "special order after final judgment" (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2).

Order, after default judgment overruling plaintiff's objections to hearing by designated judge of superior court of any issue of fact or law arising upon defendant's serving and filing several notices of intention to vacate default and ensuing judgment, to recall and stay execution, and to strike complaint and various paragraphs thereof, held "special order" made after final judgment from which an appeal may be taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Special Order.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by R. H. Golish against Bob Feinstein, doing business under the fictitious name and style of Bob Feinstein & Company. Default judgment for plaintiff, and from an order thereafter overruling plaintiff's objections to hearing by a designated judge of any issue of fact or law arising therein, plaintiff appeals.

Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

Frazier McIntosh, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Samuel A. Miller and Paul J. Ziegler, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order by which, following a default judgment in the action, plaintiff's objections to the hearing by a designated judge of the superior court (because of his alleged bias and prejudice) of any issue of fact or law arising therein were denied.

More particularly, the facts appear to be that, after the default judgment had been entered, defendant served and filed his several notices of intention to vacate both the default and the ensuing judgment, to recall the execution issued on the said judgment, to stay its execution, and to quash its execution; also, to strike the complaint and various specified paragraphs thereof. Thereafter, plaintiff filed with the clerk of the court objections to the hearing of any further issue of either fact or law by the judge presiding in the department of the superior court where the several matters were set for hearing, on the ground, primarily, that by reason of the bias or prejudice of said judge a fair and impartial hearing or trial could not be had before him. By order of the trial court, such objections were, and each of them was, overruled. Whereupon plaintiff gave notice of appeal from such order. The reason here urged for the dismissal of the appeal is that no appeal lies from an order of the character of that here in question.

In moving to dismiss the appeal reliance is placed in the general rule that, although under the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, an appeal may be taken "from any special order made after final judgment," before an order properly may be said to be "special," it must appear that in some manner it affects the judgment itself, or at least bears some relation to it, either as to its enforcement or as to the prevention or the staying of its execution. 2 Cal. Jur. 155; Griess v. State Inv. & Ins. Co., 93 Cal. 411, 28 P. 1041; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 675, 69 P. 497; Watson v. Pryor, 49 Cal. App. 554, 193 P. 797. But, however apparently unanimous in expression and however sound in reasoning the authorities may appear to be which deal abstractly in the discussion of a legal principle, nevertheless they must yield to a contrary view when expressed concretely and in relation to and in consideration of basic facts. In the case of Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset Road Oil Co., 173 Cal. 487, 160 P. 545, the question presented to the court for its consideration consisted of whether in the circumstances there present an order denying a motion to have a designated judge called to preside at the hearing of a motion for a new trial, on account of the alleged bias and prejudice of the judge whose place the designated judge was expected to occupy, was a "special" order within the meaning of the statute, and appealable as such. After giving consideration to the several expressions of opinion relating to the question, as announced in various adjudications by the Supreme Court of this state, the conclusion was reached that the situation presented was one which fell within that portion of the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides that a "special order made after final judgment" is appealable. It is there declared that the effect of a successful appeal from an order by which the right of the appellant to have a qualified judge sit in judgment at the hearing of a motion for a new trial was denied would be one, not reversing the subsequent order by which a new trial was granted, but which would "send the matter back for hearing before a qualified judge." So in the instant case, assuming that by order of the judge whose disqualification is alleged the default of the defendant should be vacated, the ensuing judgment set aside and, on final hearing of the action, judgment should be rendered in favor of the defendant—in an appeal by the plaintiff from such judgment, if the appellate tribunal should be of the opinion that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in overruling the several objections interposed by the plaintiff, which primarily were based upon the disqualification of the trial judge to impartially hear and determine the motions made by the defendant—to quote the pertinent language appearing in the cited authority: “The proper order to be made by this court would be one pronouncing void the order denying the motion to disqualify the judge. This would operate not to reverse the * * * [judgment], but to vacate it and send the matter back for a hearing before a qualified judge.” Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset Road Oil Co., 173 Cal. 487, 489, 160 P. 545, 546.

Assuming the correctness of the conclusion indicated in such authority, it would follow that the appeal herein is from a “special order made after final judgment,” and consequently, that the motion to dismiss the appeal is not well taken.

It is ordered that the motion to dismiss the appeal be, and it is, denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by John A. Richards and wife against Bert E. Sellers and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Guy Lewis, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an action to quiet title. The plaintiffs framed their complaint in the ordinary form of an action to quiet title. The defendants appeared and filed an answer in which they denied many of the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint and then they pleaded an affirmative defense. The substance of that defense is that the city of Los Angeles on March 24, 1925, caused to be issued a certificate of sale against the property involved. That certificate purported to have been issued pursuant to certain public improvements made under the Street Improvement Act, chapter 397, of the Statutes of 1911. The defendants allege that they made a tender of the amount due on December 30, 1926, that it was refused, and that they have been and are now willing and ready to pay all sums due. The trial court made findings in favor of the defendants, and among other things it recited certain facts showing that at the time the plaintiffs applied for a deed the only notice served on the owner was a certain notice served by posting on the property, and that thereafter the plaintiffs made an affidavit that the property was unoccupied. Continuing, the court found that at the time the notice was posted there was standing on the property a billboard 50 feet long and 10 feet high and attached to it was a small sign "Foster and Kleiser"; that the small sign was conspicuously displayed and that Foster & Kleiser had erected the billboard and maintained it under a lease from the owner of the real property. As conclusions of law the trial court found that the plaintiffs' deed to the property was invalid and that the defendants were entitled to have it canceled. It further held that the defendants were entitled to redeem upon paying the principal sum and interest represented in the certificate of sale.

[1-4] The plaintiffs contended the property was unoccupied, that the tax proceeding was regular on its face in all particulars, and that they are entitled to recover on the strength of the tax deed issued to them. The defendants claim the property was in truth occupied and that they were entitled to receive but did not receive personally any notice of the tax proceeding and that they are entitled to show the facts which actually existed and that the plaintiffs' deed was invalid. In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, neither a tax deed nor its recitals are evidence against the owner of the regularity of the tax proceeding. Jackson v. Shepard, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 88, 17 Am. Dec. 505; Norris v. Russell, 5 Cal. 250; Bucknall v. Story, 36 Cal. 67; Pierce v. Low, 51 Cal. 580. That rule has been modified by the Street Improvement Act (St. 1911, chap. 397, §§ 72-76). The deed is, by virtue of the provisions of the statute made "primary evidence * * * of all proceedings theretofore had" and "prima facie evidence of the regularity of all proceedings subsequent to the issue of the bond" (section 76). In the instant case the bond was issued, it was not paid, a sale was had, the plaintiffs became the purchasers, and, later, they gave notice by posting the notice that they intended to apply for a deed. After all the evidence was in the trial court made a finding that the property was occupied. We think it may not be said that said finding is not sustained by the evidence. The words "occupied" and "unoccupied" have many meanings. As contained in the statute, they will be construed in connection with the context. Our statute contains no words showing that it refers to only such property as is wholly occupied. Manifestly it was intended that there must be present some evidence of occupancy. How much? Each case must stand on its own facts. In the instant case when the plaintiff John A. Richards went to the property to post the notice, he saw the large signboard and the small signboard showing the names of Foster & Kleiser, the owners of the sign-board. They were the occupants of at least a part of the premises. Under the terms of the statute it then became the duty of the plaintiff to serve notice on Foster & Kleiser (section 75). He did not do so. If he had done so, doubtless he would have been told the name and address of the owner and it would then have become the plaintiff's duty to have served the owner also (section 75). Because the plaintiff did not serve the occupant and because the owner received no notice at all, the service was incomplete and the owner's title was not divested. In making findings against the plaintiffs the trial court did not hold that the plaintiffs had no rights. It merely held that the plaintiffs' deed was invalid. By the terms of section 72 of the statute the payments theretofore made by the plaintiffs together with interest thereon constituted a lien. That lien still exists and will continue to exist until a redemption is had or a valid deed is made. In no respect did the trial court hold to the contrary. We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

BULLOCK v. McKEON et al.

Civ. 103.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 14, 1930.

1. Escrows §8(1)—Deposit of instrument in escrow may constitute part of contract only if preceded by contract.

Where deposit of an instrument in escrow follows an agreement between parties, it may constitute part of a contract; but, where it is not preceded by a contract, it is at best a mere offer.

2. Contracts §19—Mere offer, though continuous in nature, may be withdrawn any time before acceptance, unless promise to hold it open is supported by sufficient consideration.

One making a mere offer to another may withdraw it any time before it has been accepted, and this applies though offer is continuous in nature and is to remain open for a specified time, unless promise to hold it open is supported by sufficient consideration.

3. Escrows §8(1)—Acceptance of offer in escrow instructions not having been communicated to defendant or escrow agent until after defendant withdrew deposit, escrow agent's authority closed (Civ. Code, §§ 1486, 1488, 1494, 1580).

Where offer contained in defendant's escrow instructions required deposit with escrow agent of assignment of portion of oil lease, and no acceptance of defendant's offer, either partial or complete, was ever communicated to him, and none to escrow agent until after defendant had withdrawn his deposit and closed his part of escrow, held, that defendant's acts revoked agency of escrow agent, and latter was not authorized thereafter to receive an offer of performance on part of plaintiff under Civ. Code, §§ 1494, 1486, 1488, 1580.

4. Contracts ⚡23—"Acceptance" to be binding must conform to offer and not impose new conditions, and if it does it is "counter offer" which must be accepted to be binding.

To make acceptance of offer binding, it must conform to terms of offer, and must not impose new conditions, since if it does so it is not an "acceptance," but constitutes a "counter offer" which must be accepted to become binding.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Acceptance.]

5. Escrows ⚡5, 9—Escrow instructions must be strictly construed, and no rights are acquired thereunder until terms so construed are complied with.

The terms of an escrow instruction are to be strictly construed, and until the other party has complied with such terms as so construed, he can gain no rights under them.

6. Mines and minerals ⚡74—Attempted acceptance of offer in escrow instructions relating to oil lease assignment held defective because not acceptance of offer (Civ. Code, §§ 1486, 1488, 1494, 1580).

Where defendant's offer in escrow instructions requiring deposit of assignment of oil lease provided that defendant was to pay no rent until certain date, and required plaintiff and another to pay cost of guaranty of title and escrow charges, plaintiff's attempted acceptance thereof by instructions tending to place on defendant half of cost of guaranty of title and escrow charges, and not complying with defendant's escrow instructions as to rent, held defective under Civ. Code, §§ 1486, 1488, 1494, 1580, as not constituting an unconditional acceptance of defendant's offer, and therefore not binding on defendant, even if he had not previously withdrawn his offer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by J. O. Bullock against R. B. McKeon and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Rohe & Freston, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Siemon & Garber, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

Respondent recovered judgment against appellant in the sum of one thousand dollars as liquidated damages based upon an alleged breach of contract.

Under date of June 9, 1926, respondent and his wife, Winnifred Mae Bullock, as lessees, secured an oil lease upon one hundred and sixty acres of land in Kern county, from Clarence T. Mills and Elsie J. Mills, the owners of the property. The lease provided that operations for the drilling of a well for oil or gas must be commenced by the lessees within three years from its date. An extension of the drilling requirements for one year could be obtained by the lessees paying to the lessors "Two Hundred Fifty ($350.00) Dollars" on or before the expiration of the three-year period. Two additional yearly extensions might be obtained by making the same payment on or before the end of each year.

Respondent secured the services of L. G. Helm and E. W. Bailey, two brokers, to secure an oil operator who would take over part of the leased land and perform the drilling requirements of the lease. They approached appellant who, on July 8, 1927, paid to the First National Bank of Bakersfield, Cal., which we will hereafter refer to as the bank, the sum of one thousand dollars, which payment was accompanied with the following letter of instructions: "July 8th, 1927. First National Bank, Bakersfield, California. Gentlemen: I hand you herewith One Thousand ($1,000.00) Dollars, with the following instructions: Leases to be deposited from Bullock to Helm and Bailey, and assignment from Bullock, Helm and Bailey to R. B. McKeon, covering North One-Half (N½) of Southwest (SW¼) Quarter, Section Twenty-four (24), Township Twenty-eight (T28), Range Twenty-eight (R28), Kern County, terms being one-sixth (1-6) royalty, and Standard drilling requirements. This to be a three (3) year paid up lease. In consideration of the above lease and assignment, I agree to pay the total sum of Twelve Thousand ($12,000.00) Dollars cash, as follows: One Thousand ($1,000.00) Dollars this day paid, and Eleven Thousand ($11,000.00) Dollars on or before 4 p. m., July 24th, 1927. In case I do not desire to go through with this deal, you are instructed to deliver the One Thousand ($1,000.00) Dollars to Helm and Bailey, as liquidating damages. When the Eleven Thousand ($11,000.00) Dollars is paid, I am to be furnished with a guarantee and certificate of title for Twelve Thousand ($12,000.00) Dollars, showing the property free and clear of all incumbrances, subject only to the above mentioned lease. I am also to deliver an agreement to pay an additional One Hundred ($100.00) Dollars, per acre in oil, out of Twenty-five (25%) per cent of net production. R. B. McKeon, 809 Great Republic Life Bldg."

On July 9, 1927, Helm and Bailey handed to the Kern County Abstract Company of Bakersfield a letter signed by E. W. Bailey, addressed to the abstract company, dated July 9, 1927; a letter to the abstract company, signed by respondent, dated in one place July 7, 1927, and in another place, July 8, 1927; an unsigned agreement between R. B. McKeon and E. W. Bailey, dated July 7, 1927; and an agreement between J. O. Bullock and Winnifred Mae Bullock and R. B. McKeon, in words and figures as follows: "This indenture, made this seventh day of July, 1927, by and between J. O. Bullock and Winnifred Mae Bullock, husband and wife, as first parties, and R. B. McKeon, as second party, Witnesseth: Whereas, the first parties are the owners of an oil and gas lease dated June 9, 1926, executed by Clarence T. Mills and Elsie I. Mills, his wife, as lessors, with first parties herein as lessees, and covering all of the southwest quarter (SW $\frac{1}{4}$), Section twenty-four (24), Township twenty-eight (28) south, Range twenty-eight (28) east M. D. B. & M., in the County of Kern, State of California, containing one hundred and sixty acres (160), more or less, and which said lease was recorded June 28, 1926, in book 132 of official records at page 212, records of Kern County, California. Now therefore, for and in consideration of the sum of ten dollars (\$10.00) to them in hand paid and other good and valuable consideration, first parties do hereby sell, assign, transfer, and set over to second party the said lease as above described, in so far as the same relates to and affects the north half (N $\frac{1}{2}$) of said southwest quarter (SW $\frac{1}{4}$) of said section twenty-four (24), the portion hereby assigned containing eighty acres (80), more or less; and, The second party in consideration of such assignment does promise and agree as follows, to-wit: First. That he will faithfully comply with each and every of the terms and conditions of said oil and gas lease, in so far as the said portion thereof hereby assigned to him is concerned, and will save and keep harmless the said parties from and on account of any obligation or liability whatsoever, in so far as such portion so assigned to him is concerned. Second. That he will on or before three years from date hereof, commence the actual drilling (spud in) of an oil and gas well upon said leased premises, and prosecute the drilling thereof with due diligence and dispatch until at least a depth of thirty-five hundred feet (3500 ft.) has been reached, unless oil or gas is found in paying quantities at a lesser depth; and continue such drilling operations thereafter in full conformity with the requirements of said lease. Third. That he will in event oil is produced from said premises pay to the said first parties an additional consideration for said assignment in the sum of Eight thousand dollars (\$8,000.00), same to be payable out of twenty-five per cent (25%) of the first oil or gas produced thereon. Fourth. And, further, that he will pay to the said first parties an over riding royalty in the amount of two per cent (2%) of all oil and gas produced and saved from said premises and at the times and in the manner provided for the payment of the base royalty in said lease. And it is mutually understood and agreed that the covenants and agreements herein contained shall inure to the benefit of, and shall be binding on the heirs, executors, administrators, successors, or assigns of the respective parties hereto. In Witness Whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands the day and year first above written. J. O. Bullock, Winnifred Mae Bullock, First Parties. R. B. McKeon, Second Party." This was acknowledged by the first parties July 8, 1927, and by McKeon on the next day.

The Bailey letter to the abstract company instructed it to examine the title to the leased property and to write its usual guarantee of title showing title in the lessors free and clear of all incumbrances, except current taxes, and the oil lease, with appellant as the assignee of the north one-half of the leased property; that one-half the escrow charges and cost of the guarantee be paid by appellant and one-half by Bailey; that the company close the escrow when it had received from appellant twelve thousand dollars and, in addition to the requirements of the instructions given by respondent, an agreement executed by appellant agreeing to pay Bailey a separate royalty of two and one-sixth per cent from said property. Of the twelve thousand dollars to be paid by appellant, eight thousand dollars was to be paid to respondent and four thousand dollars to Bailey. The letter of respondent to the abstract company transmitted two copies of the agreement between Bullock and wife and McKeon hereinbefore copied, and authorized the abstract company to deliver one copy thereof to Bailey and one to appellant when he had executed the same and paid to the abstract company eight thousand dollars. It further provided that respondent would be at no expense in connection with the title search and escrow fees and reserved the right to withdraw his papers from the escrow after fifteen days. The unexecuted agreement which we have referred to, provided that McKeon would pay to Bailey "an over riding royalty equal to two and one-sixth per cent of all oil or gas produced therefrom during the full term of said lease, and any renewal or renewals thereof."

Neither appellant nor respondent met during the negotiations which were carried on by Bailey and Helm on one side, and appellant on the other. Respondent and his agents knew that McKeon had placed his instructions and the thousand dollars with the bank, but appellant was not informed that respondent's papers were deposited with the abstract company. Bailey testified that prior to the papers being deposited in either place, he told McKeon that respondent's papers would be placed with the abstract company. The triplicate agreements between Bullock and wife and McKeon, which we have set forth at length, were taken by Bailey to the Bullocks, who signed the same and returned all copies to him. He then took them to McKeon, who signed the copies and returned them to Bailey, who then deposited two of them with the abstract company.

July 24, 1927, fell on Sunday. About noon on July 25, 1927, appellant called at the bank and asked whether or not the papers connected with the lease had been left with the bank and stated that he desired to look them over. There being nothing at the bank in connection with the transaction other than his letter and one thousand dollars, he asked for and was paid his money, and withdrew from the escrow. On the afternoon of the same day respondent with Bailey and Helm appeared at the bank with all the documents which we have mentioned as left with the abstract company. On the letters to the abstract company they crossed out the words "Kern County Abstract Company" and inserted the words "First National Bank of Bakersfield" in their stead and gave the documents to the cashier of the bank, together with a letter from the abstract company, dated July 15, 1927, addressed to R. B. McKeon, giving the condition of the title of the leased property. The contents of the letter had not been communicated to McKeon. The report showed various incumbrances on the property, among them appearing the following: A reservation to the United States of America, in its patent, of the rights of way for ditches and canals constructed by authority of the United States; right of way two hundred feet wide granted to the Southern California Edison Company across the leased property for its transmission lines; a deed of trust to secure a note for four hundred dollars and also additional loans not to exceed four hundred dollars; a grant of a right of way for road purposes. It was stipulated that the title remained in the same condition up to and including July 25, 1927. Bailey and Helm assigned to respondent all their interest in the claim against appellant before the action was filed.

In this case we have the appellant depositing his money and letter of instructions with the bank thereby constituting it his agent for the purpose of the transaction, while respondent placed his instructions and papers with the title company thereby making it his agent in the matter. Shreeves v. Pearson, 194 Cal. 699, 230 P. 448. Appellant contends that since there were separate agents acting for the parties, and the agents were not brought into communication, there was no contract resulting between the principals. While there might be force in this argument, we do not need to decide it in this case.

[1] Appellant's letter to the bank, accompanied by his deposit of one thousand dollars, was merely an offer to respondent to perform according to the terms he imposed. Where the deposit of an instrument in escrow follows an agreement between the parties it may constitute part of a contract, but where it is not preceded by a contract it is at best a mere offer. Holland v. McCarthy, 173 Cal. 597, 160 P. 1069. In this case we have no evidence of any prior agreement of the parties and therefore must look to the documents themselves as prepared by them for their respective actions and intentions in the transaction.

[2] The only consideration which appellant was to receive, under the terms of his offer, was performance by respondent and his assignors, and, until such performance he would receive no consideration for his offer. "The law as applied to the making of contracts permits one making a mere offer to another to withdraw it at any time before it has been accepted by the latter. 'A proposal may be revoked at any time before its acceptance is communicated to the proposer, but not afterwards.' This applies although the offer is continuing in nature and is to remain open for a specified time, unless the promise to hold it open is supported by sufficient consideration." 6 Cal. Jur. p. 51; Roth v. Moeller, 185 Cal. 415, 197 P. 62. Therefore, unless respondent had accepted appellant's offer prior to the withdrawal of his money on July 25, 1927, such withdrawal was authorized by law and respondent cannot complain because of it.

[3] The consent to a contract must be mutual (section 1580, Civ. Code). An offer of performance must be absolute and unqualified (section 1494, Civ. Code) and must be communicated to the other party or his agent (section 1488, Civ. Code). An offer of partial performance has no effect and cannot bind the other party unless accepted by him (section 1486, Civ. Code). In this case there was no acceptance of appellant's offer, either partial or complete, ever communicated to him, and none to the bank until after he had withdrawn his deposit and closed his part of the escrow. This act revoked the agency of the bank and it was not authorized thereafter to receive an offer of performance on the part of respondent.

[4-6] In order to make an acceptance of an offer binding, it must conform to the terms of the offer and must not propose new conditions. If it does so, it is not an acceptance, but constitutes a counter offer which in turn must be accepted to become binding on the parties. We find that the attempted offer of performance by respondent and his assignors differed from the offer of appellant in at least two particulars and attempted to impose added burdens upon him. Respondent and Bailley attempted to place upon appellant one-half of the cost of the guarantee of title and escrow charges of the abstract company, none of which he was to pay according to his offer. Appellant provided in his offer that he was to pay no rental upon the leased property until the year commencing July 8, 1930. Under the terms of the lease an annual installment of rental became due on June 9, 1929, and another on June 9, 1930. If such rentals were not paid a forfeiture of the lease might result. It was incumbent upon respondent and his assignors to make some provision for, or at least an offer to pay the rentals up to July 8, 1930, and not compel appellant to take the risk of either having to pay them himself or suffer a forfeiture of the lease. The terms of an escrow instruction are to be strictly construed, and until the other party has complied with such terms as so construed, he can gain no rights under them. Dyson v. Bradshaw, 23 Cal. 528; Los Angeles High School District v. Quinn, 195 Cal. 377, 234 P. 313; McCarthy & Meyer v. Bank of Italy, 68 Cal. App. 166, 228 P. 724. We believe that the attempted acceptance of appellant's offer by respondent and his assignors was defective in that it did not purport to be an absolute or unconditional acceptance of its terms, and if made before appellant withdrew his offer would not have bound him.

Civ. 235.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Rehearing Denied March 17, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 17, 1930.

Mines and minerals — Bond given prospecting permittee merely calling for derrick was not breached by failure to provide derrick of kind required by principal's contract.

Where bond given by assignee of contract to holder of oil prospecting permit merely required that the principal should on or before a given date "erect a derrick, install a rotary drilling outfit, and commence actual drilling of said well," and where the terms of the bond had been complied with, holder of permit could not recover in suit on the bond, though the contract, referred to in the introductory recitals of the bond, required standard oil well derrick with a standard or rotary drilling rig, and the derrick furnished was admittedly not a standard derrick.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by Fanny Higgins against the Julian Petroleum Corporation and the Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Company of New York. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Siemon & Garber, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

John M. Martin, of Los Angeles, for respondent Metropolitan Casualty Ins. Co. of New York.

Anderson & Anderson and A. G. Ritter, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Julian Petroleum Corporation.

SLOANE, P. J.

The undisputed facts on this appeal show that on and prior to June 15, 1926, the plaintiff, Fanny Higgins, was the holder of a United States prospecting permit for prospecting and drilling for oil and gas on a tract of land in Kern county, Cal. This permit provided that the holder thereof should, within six months of the date thereof, or within the period of specified extensions of time, install and prosecute certain development work, and within two years from date of the permit drill for oil or gas to a depth of not less than two thousand feet, unless valuable deposits of oil or gas should be discovered at a less depth.

On June 15, 1926, the plaintiff entered into a subcontract with one Grant, whereby the latter covenanted and agreed to furnish the necessary machinery, tools, and labor and construct on said land "a standard oil well derrick" and to drill a well to a depth of not less than three thousand feet, unless oil in paying quantities was struck at a less depth, and to begin the actual drilling of said well within 90 days from the above date. In case of failure to accomplish this, he agreed to deposit on said date $5,000 for an extension of time, the amount to be forfeited in the event actual drilling was not commenced and thereafter prosecuted to the required depth.

Thereafter the said Grant assigned his contract with plaintiff to the Julian Petroleum Corporation, of Los Angeles, which assumed and agreed to perform all the covenants and agreements contained in the contract between Grant and the plaintiff, including the following specific agreement:

"In addition to the requirements herein contained, the party of the second part, (The Julian Corporation) shall have constructed and install a first class rotary drilling outfit, and commence actual drilling of said first well on or before the First day of Sept., 1926, or in case of their failure so to do as provided by the terms of said contract, they will furnish the bond of $5,000 therein required on or before the first day of Sept., 1926, which shall entitle the party of the second part to a three months' extension only under the terms of said contract, to-wit, until the 15th day of December, 1926, in which to commence the actual drilling of said well."

The bond in question was thereafter executed by the Julian Company and defendant Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Company of New York, and is in words and figures as follows:

"Know all men by these presents:

"That Julian Petroleum Corporation, a corporation of the State of Delaware having an office in the City of Los Angeles, California, as Principal herein, and Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Co. of New York, a Corporation of the State of New York duly authorized to transact a general surety business in the State of California, as Surety herein, are held and firmly bound unto Fanny Higgins, of Kern County, California, in the full and just sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5000.00); for the payment whereof well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves, our successors and assigns, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents.

"The condition of the above obligation is such that:

"Whereas, under date of January 10th, 1921, Secretary of the Interior under and by virtue of Act of Congress approved February 25th, 1920, entitled 'An Act to Promote the Mining of Coal, Phosphate, Oil, Oil Shale, Gas and Sodium, on the Public Domain', granted unto Fanny Higgins of Kern County, California, an unmarried woman, oil and gas prospecting permit Serial #08890 California, through the United States Land Office at Visalia, California, covering the following described lands:

"Northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ of Section 28, Township 27 South, Range 27 East, M. D. M. 160 acres.

"Whereas, under date of April 30th, 1926, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, Washington, D. C., granted an extension of time until May 27th, 1927, for compliance with the requirements of said permit.

"Whereas, by agreement dated June 15th, 1926, said Fanny Higgins covenanted and agreed with J. C. Grant for the drilling of a well for oil upon said land, among other things; all as more fully set out in copy of said agreement hereto attached and made part of this bond.

"Whereas, said agreement provides that if the drilling of said well shall not have been commenced within a period of ninety days (90) from and after June 15th, 1926, then said J. C. Grant shall deposit a bond in the sum of Five thousand dollars ($5000.00) in favor of said Fanny Higgins conditioned for the commencement of said well during the four months following the expiration of said nine —(90) day period: whereupon he shall be entitled to such additional time in which to commence said well.

"Whereas, by agreement dated July 1st, 1926, said J. C. Grant sold, assigned, transferred and set over unto Julian Petroleum Corporation all his right, title, and interest in and to said agreement with said Fanny Higgins, subject to certain terms and conditions; all as more fully set out in copy of said agreement hereto attached and made a part of this bond.

"Whereas, one of the provisions of said assignment is to the effect that if Julian Petroleum Corporation shall fail to commence the drilling of a well on said land on or before September 1st, 1926, it shall be entitled to an extension of three months thereafter in which to commence said well, provided it shall on or before September 1st, 1926, file the bond of Five thousand dollars ($5000.00) required of J. C. Grant under the agreement dated June 15th, 1926, as aforesaid.

"Now therefore, the condition of this bond is that it shall be void and of no effect provided Julian Petroleum Corporation or J. C. Grant or either of them shall, on or before January 15th, 1927, erect a derrick, install a rotary drilling outfit, and commence actual drilling of said well, or shall so cause the commencement of said well: otherwise this bond shall remain in full force and virtue.

"Provided, however, that the Surety hereunder shall be entitled to the benefit of any of the provisions of said permit, extension of permit, agreement or assignment, and may require the performance of any of such provisions by any party to said documents liable to or privileged in the performance thereof, to the same extent as though said Surety were specifically named in said documents and so entitled thereby. Upon written notice by said Surety to said Fanny Higgins of its desire that any of said provisions of any of said documents be exercised or complied with, then as between the Surety herein and said Fanny Higgins such exercise or compliance shall be considered as having been accomplished as of the date of said notice, without further act or notice on the part of said Surety.

"In witness whereof, said Principal and said Surety herein have caused this bond to be executed on their parts respectively, at Los Angeles, California, this 31st day of August, 1926." Upon the alleged failure of the Julian Petroleum Corporation and the Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Company to fulfill the conditions of the bond, this suit was brought by plaintiff, resulting in the judgment for defendants, here appealed from.

The sole question is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of the trial court that defendants did not default in performing the conditions of the bond.

The evidence discloses, without conflict, that the defendants, within the time specified, installed on the premises what their witnesses describe and testify to as being, and the trial court finds to be, "a derrick and rotary drilling outfit, and commenced actual drilling of said well, and so caused the commencement of said well."

The contention here is as to whether this compliance with the actual expressed penal clause of the bond fulfilled the obligation of the defendants, or whether, as contended by appellant, defendants were bound to install, as covenanted in the Grant contract, which was accepted and assumed by the Julian Corporation, "a Standard oil well derrick with a standard or rotary drilling rig."

This action is not one to recover damages from the parties to the various drilling contracts, but is an action on the bond to collect the $5,000 penalty for its breach, as stipulated liquidated damages. No actual damages are alleged or proved. The plaintiff's right of recovery rests upon proof of a breach of the conditions of the bond, and the right to recover the $5,000 penalty as liquidated damages.

The trial court evidently construed the liability of defendants under the bond as being limited by its express terms, namely the erection and installation of "a derrick and rotary drilling outfit," and the commencement of drilling operations.

It is obvious that a compliance with this condition fulfilled the obligation of the bond, unless, as contended by appellant, there can be read into it an undertaking to carry out the provisions of the Grant and Julian Corporation contracts for installing a "Standard oil derrick" and a different drilling rig than the one actually supplied.

The evidence sufficiently shows that a rotary drilling rig was supplied with sufficient capacity to meet the drilling requirements of the contracts, and with an equipment which some of the witnesses identified as a derrick, though admittedly not a standard derrick.

It will be observed that the bond in question nowhere provides for any particular type of derrick, or for any particular type of rotary drilling rig, and only covenants for the "commencement" of actual drilling operations on or before January 15, 1927. The evidence supports the findings that the express conditions of the bond were complied with. These conditions contain no undertaking to continue the drilling to any specified depth, or to furnish any equipment other than a derrick and rotary drilling outfit sufficient in capacity to sink a well of the size and depth called for by the Grant and Julian Corporation contracts.

Appellants' case rests on the contention that the obligations of these contracts are incorporated in the bond by reference to such contracts as being attached to "and made part of this bond." This reference is made in the following introductory recitals of the bond: "Whereas by agreement dated June 15th, 1926, Fanny Higgins covenanted and agreed with J. C. Grant for the drilling of a well for oil upon said land, among other things; all as more fully set out in a copy of said agreement hereto attached and made a part of this bond." And: "Whereas by agreement dated July 1st, 1926, said J. C. Grant sold, assigned, transferred and set over unto Julian Petroleum Corporation, all his right, title and interest in and to said agreement with said Fanny Higgins, subject to certain terms and conditions; all as more fully set out in a copy of said agreement, hereto attached and made a part of this bond." There is also a preliminary recital that: "Whereas one of the provisions of said assignment is to the effect that if the Julian Petroleum Corporation shall fail to commence the drilling of a well on said land on or before Sept. 1st, 1926 * * * it shall file a bond of Five Thousand Dollars required of J. C. Grant under the agreement of date June 15, 1926, as aforesaid."

Of course, if the conditions for the operation of the penal obligation of the bond had been made to expressly guarantee the carrying out of the terms of these contracts, or if there had been a failure to expressly state the conditions under which the penalty of the bond would accrue, there would be some force to appellant's interpretation of the instrument.

But we think it is clear, in view of the explicit statement of the conditions under which the penalty of the undertaking was to become payable that the recitals in question, and the incorporation of the contracts in the bond were only intended, as respondent suggests, as an explanation of the circumstances under which a bond was contracted for. It may also be noted that in neither of the contracts referred to, providing for the furnishing of this bond, was it indicated what the terms should be, other than that it was to be a bond for $5,000, and was to entitle the parties to an extension "until the 15th day of December, 1926, in which to commence the actual drilling of said first well."

It is very apparent that the provisions of this bond were very inadequate to secure to the plaintiff the performance of the covenants of the Grant and Julian Petroleum contracts. The instrument as executed, was, however, accepted by plaintiff as a compliance with the agreement to furnish a bond, and the courts cannot extend its liability beyond the reasonable interpretation of its terms.

Respondent also disputes that this is a case for the application of the exceptional rules under which, in case of recovery, liquidated damages could be recovered. In view of our conclusions that no breach of the conditions of the bond has been shown, it is unnecessary to pass upon that point.

The judgment is affirmed.

KELLER v. CUSHMAN.

Civ. 3943.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Feb. 20, 1930.

1. Automobiles ☞245(24)—Evidence, in action for death of guest resulting from automobile collision, held insufficient to present question for jury on defendant's negligence.

In action for damages for death of guest resulting from automobile collision, evidence merely showing fact of collision, without disclosing where collision occurred at intersection nor which automobile entered intersection first or had right of way, nor showing that driver of either automobile was exceeding speed limit prescribed by California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended), held insufficient to present question for jury on defendant's negligence.

2. Automobiles ☞242(2)—Fact that testimony left cause of automobile collision uncertain held not to render applicable doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in favor of guest.

Fact that testimony, in action for damages for death of guest in defendant's automobile, left it uncertain as to which driver was responsible for collision and merely showed happening of collision, held not to render applicable doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in favor of guest, since one of automobiles was under control and management of third person, making it just as reasonable to infer that third person was wholly responsible for collision as to infer that defendant was responsible for injuries resulting in death of plaintiff's intestate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Lillie M. Keller, administratrix of the estate of William E. Keller, deceased, against Frank Cushman. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Rich & Weis and Arthur M. Bundy, all of Marysville, for appellant.

Steel & Lingenfelter, of Marysville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

The deceased, William E. Keller, met his death while riding as a guest in an automobile operated by the defendant Frank Cushman, in a collision which occurred between the automobile driven by the defendant and an automobile driven by one Bangs, and this action was prosecuted by the administratrix of the estate of the deceased to recover damages therefor. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case the court granted the defendant's motion for nonsuit, and it is from the judgment entered thereon in favor of the defendant that the plaintiff appeals.

The record shows that the deceased and the defendant had been acquainted for a short time and were in the county of Sutter looking for work; that on the day of the automobile collision referred to herein, they had been out looking for employment, had secured the same, and were returning to their respective places of residence, traveling eastward on one of the highways of said county; that while so driving eastward, an automobile driven by one Bangs, being propelled in a northerly direction, collided with the automobile driven by the defendant, at an intersection of two highways in said county. The record shows that the automobile driven by Bangs collided with the automobile driven by the defendant Cushman by striking the latter automobile about the center of the right-hand side, on which side the deceased Keller was then sitting. The force of the collision was such that the Cushman automobile was overturned. The injuries received by William E. Keller in the collision, subsequently resulted in his death.

[1] There is no testimony in the record disclosing just where the collision occurred upon the intersection of the two highways, nor is there any testimony in the record indicating which automobile entered the intersection first, or which one had the right of way. Nor is there any testimony in the record indicating that the driver of either automobile was exceeding the speed limit of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended).

In addition to what we have just stated, the following testimony appears in the transcript, as given by the witness Pepmiller:

"Q. Did you have any talk with Mr. Cushman as to how the accident occurred? A. Yes. I asked him how it happened and he said he didn't know.

"Q. Did you have any talk with Mr. Bangs? A. I did.

"Q. In Mr. Cushman's presence and hearing? A. Mr. Cushman was still in his machine when I walked over to where Mr. Bangs was. Mr. Cushman was kind of knocked out; he was walking around in a circle when I got there, and I went over and asked Cushman how it happened, and he said, 'partner, don't ask me; I don't know.'

"Q. Did they say anything to either of them about it being an unavoidable accident, or anything of that kind? A. I asked Mr. Bangs how it happened; I asked him who was in the fault, and he said, "I don't blame the other man at all.' Mr. Cushman told me he didn't blame the other man, either.

"Q. Did he say anything about what they were doing? A. He said they were coming out of that road from the west, they were looking over toward that service station there, thinking it would be a good place to rent while they were working for Mr. Plummer."

No other testimony was introduced as to the circumstances attending the collision. Mr. Bangs, the driver of one of the automobiles, was not placed upon the witness stand. All that is shown is the fact of a collision in which a car driven by a person other than the defendant, collided with the car driven by the defendant. Whether the car driven by the defendant was where it had a legal right to be at the time of the collision, or was where it had no legal right to be, is a pure question of surmise or guess.

[2] Upon this appeal the plaintiff relies upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and contends that the mere fact of showing a collision and the injury of the deceased places upon the defendant Cushman the necessity of explaining the occurrence. It is likewise argued that the testimony of Cushman that they had been looking toward a service station charges him with negligence. This testimony, however, is so indefinite and uncertain that it cannot be said at what period of time the defendant and the deceased were looking toward the service station.

While a number of cases have been referred to by the respective counsel, illustrating the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, we do not deem it necessary to go into an extensive analysis of the different cases having to do with that doctrine. In the case of Scellars v. Universal Service, 68 Cal. App. 252, 228 P. 879, 880, the general doctrine relative to the application of the rule being discussed, is thus stated: "In order that the maxim, 'res ipsa loquitur,' may apply, it must first be shown that the person held liable had control and management of the thing in question." And further: "Where it is a matter of surmise only that the damage was due to a cause for which the defendant is liable, the doctrine is inapplicable." A number of authorities illustrating the rule, are set forth in that case.

In the case of Riggsby v. Tritton, 143 Va. 903, 129 S. E. 493, 495, 45 A. L. R. 280, we find the following: "There must be reasonable evidence of negligence, but where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care."

In 45 C. J. 1212, § 780, the text, supported by an abundance of authorities, reads: "The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not dispense with the general rule requiring plaintiff to prove that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, but in order to render the doctrine applicable and a presumption of negligence to attach to defendant, the nature and circumstances of the accident must be of such a character that there could be no reasonable inference but that the injury complained of was due to the negligence of the defendant or of others for whose acts he is legally responsible. Accordingly, where there are two or more persons or causes which might have produced the injury, some, but not all of which were under the control of the defendant, or for which he was legally responsible, plaintiff, in order to invoke the doctrine, must exclude the portion of those causes for which the defendant is under no legal obligation. * * * Where either one of two defendants, wholly independent of each other, may be responsible for the injury complained of, the rule of res ipsa loquitur, in accordance with the preceding principles, cannot be applied."

In the case at bar one of the automobiles was under the control and management of a man by the name of Bangs, and by reason of the fact that the car driven by Bangs collided with the side of the car driven by the defendant, it is just as reasonable to infer that Bangs was wholly responsible for the collision as to infer that the defendant was responsible for the injuries resulting in the death of Keller.

In the case of Diamond v. Charles A. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 P. 38, the court had to do with an instance where an automobile and a wagon had come into collision. It was there held that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur did not apply.

The appellant further relies upon the case of Brown v. Davis, 84 Cal. App. 180, 257 P. 877, Id., 92 Cal. App. 20, 267 P. 754, where it was held by this court that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied where the deceased was riding as the guest of an automobile driver. However, in that case only the act of one person was involved, the testimony showing that the deceased was injured by the overturning of an automobile driven by the defendant. There is nothing in the case of Brown v. Davis supporting the contention that when an automobile collision is shown, and the testimony leaves it uncertain as to which automobile driver was at fault, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies in favor of a guest riding in one of the automobiles in the collision. Although the case of Brown v. Davis, supra, was cited to this effect in the case of Wilbur v. Home Lumber & Coal Co., 282 P. 236, by the Supreme Court of Oregon, and a like construction insisted upon by the appellant in the instant case, we find nothing in the opinion which justifies the conclusion of any such holding by this court, and hence the citation as an authority for such holding must have been through misapprehension.

In the case of Wilbur v. Home Lumber & Coal Co., supra, it was held that where a collision of an automobile and a truck, through skidding on ice pavement, might have arisen from one or more causes, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur could not apply. In the case of Brown v. Davis, supra, only the automobile driven by the defendant was involved. In the instant case, just as in the case of Wilbur v. Home Lumber & Coal Co., more than one machine was involved, and therefore the general rule which we have heretofore cited from Corpus Juris necessarily applies.

The order of the trial court granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit was and is correct, and the judgment entered thereon must be and the same is hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ELLIOTT et al.
Cr. 16.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Feb. 17, 1930.

1. Criminal law §693—Admitting confession held not error, where no objection was then made, and question of volition arose after people rested.

In prosecution for robbery, admission of confession held not error, where no objection was made at time, and question of confession, being given under promise of immunity or reward, did not appear in case until people had rested and defendants were testifying in their own behalf.

2. Criminal law §1169(10)—Admitting typewritten copy of questions and answers admitting guilt, if error, held harmless; officer testifying concerning such questions without objection.

In prosecution for robbery, admission of typewritten copy of questions asked defendant and answers thereto, in which he admitted guilt, but which he refused to sign, if error, was not prejudicial, where officer had previously detailed questions and answers to jury from memory without objection, so that admission of paper was merely repetition of competent testimony already before jury.

3. Witnesses §350—In prosecution for robbery, cross-examination respecting prior convictions of felonies held improper, where questions implied other convictions not shown by proof.

In prosecution for robbery, cross-examination of defendant concerning prior convictions of felonies held improper, where district attorney inquired as to other felonies and confinement in United States Penitentiary at Leavenworth, which defendant denied, and questions were not followed up by proof of convictions implied in questions.

4. Criminal law §404(3)—Admitting pistol and revolver alleged to have been used by defendants during robbery held not error.

In prosecution for robbery, admission of pistol and revolver alleged to have been used by defendants during robbery held not error, in view of testimony identifying guns.

5. Robbery §23(1)—In prosecution for robbery committed about 9:30 o'clock, testimony that witness saw men on highway at 11 o'clock, though remote, held admissible.

In prosecution for robbery, which was committed at about 9:30 o'clock at night, admission of testimony to show that witness saw four men together at 11 o'clock on that night at certain place on highway, though remote, was admissible.

6. Criminal law §781(6)—Instruction that incriminatory statements, if made by defendants, may be considered as true, held erroneous.

In prosecution for robbery, instruction that incriminatory statements relative to offense, if made by defendants, could be considered as true, and that law presumes person charged with crime is not liable to make incriminatory statement, unless it is true, held erroneous.

7. Robbery §24(1)—Evidence held to support conviction of robbery.

In prosecution for robbery, evidence held sufficient to support conviction of four defendants, where waitress and cashier of café which was robbed identified defendants as those who committed crime.

8. Criminal law §1186(4)—Error in permitting improper cross-examination and in giving erroneous instructions held harmless, where evidence of guilt was conclusive (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for robbery, error in allowing improper cross-examination of defendants as to prior conviction, and in giving instruction that any incriminatory statements of defendants could be taken as true, held not prejudicial under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where evidence of guilt was conclusive, and left no doubt of correctness of verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Dale Elliott and others were convicted of robbery, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

Trujillo & Eriksson, of San Bernardino, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

MARKS, J.

Defendants were convicted of robbing the Broiler Café in the city of San Bernardino on the night of July 26, 1929, and were sentenced to serve terms in penal institutions. From these judgments the defendants have appealed.

Appellants rely upon six alleged errors for a reversal of the judgments. We will consider them separately as presented.

[1] Appellants complain of the introductions of their confessions because they maintain that they were given under promise of immunity or reward. Each defendant was very willing to admit his participation in the crime at about the time of, and immediately after, his arrest. The confessions were made separately and to a large number of witnesses, both officers of the law and others. In each case the witness laid a proper foundation for the introduction of the confession by testifying to facts showing that it was freely and voluntarily made. No objection was made to the introduction of the evidence of the confession, and the question of its being given under promise of immunity or reward did not appear in the case until the people had rested and the defendants were testifying in their own behalf. The evidence went before the jury without objection, and was properly admitted.

[2] The defendant Jack Elliott maintains that the court erred in admitting a typewritten copy of questions asked him and his answers thereto in which he admitted his guilt. According to the evidence for the people, the paper was prepared in the following manner: Jack Elliott, when under arrest in the city jail in Los Angeles, said he desired to make a statement regarding the crime, and was taken into a room with M. D. Kimberly, a lieutenant of police, and Jacob Schultess, a stenographer. Kimberly asked Elliott questions, which he answered. The questions and answers were taken down on a typewriter by Schultess, and later Elliott refused to sign the paper, which was admitted in evidence as a people's exhibit during the trial, over the objection of the defendant. We can assume that this ruling of the court was error (People v. Luis, 158 Cal. 185, 110 P. 580), but still must hold that it was not sufficiently prejudicial to cause a reversal of the judgment. Prior to the admission of the paper, and its being read to the jury, Officer Kimberly had, from memory and without objection, detailed the questions and answers to the jury. The admission of the paper itself was merely a repetition of competent testimony already before the jury, and appellant Jack Elliott was not sufficiently prejudiced thereby to cause a reversal of the judgment against him.

[3] Jack Elliott further complains of rulings of the trial court in permitting the district attorney to cross-examine him at length concerning prior convictions of felonies. He was asked if he had been convicted of a felony, which question he answered in the affirmative. The district attorney was then permitted, over the objection of the defendant, to ask him if he had not been convicted of other felonies and confined in the United States Penitentiary at Leavenworth, all of which he denied. These questions were not followed up by any offer of proof of convictions for the crimes, the commission of which was implied in the questions. The district attorney was also permitted to ask the defendant if he had not gone under an assumed name. The cross-examination went entirely too far, and court should not have permitted it. People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 P. 697; People v. Eldridge, 147 Cal. 782, 82 P. 442; People v. Adams, 76 Cal. App. 178, 244 P. 106.

[4] The defendants complain of a ruling of the trial court admitting in evidence a pistol and a revolver alleged to have been used by them during the robbery. Two witnesses testified that Jack Elliott and William Morgan were armed during the robbery, with guns similar to those introduced in evidence, and other witnesses testified that each of these defendants admitted ownership of one of the weapons and its use during the robbery. They were properly admitted in evidence and placed before the jury.

[5] Appellants complain that the court committed error in permitting the people to prove by a witness, Wesley Flickinger, that he saw the four men together at about 11 o'clock p. m. on the night of July 26, 1929, on the main highway about one mile west of Riverside, and brought them into that city. The robbery was committed at about half past 9 o'clock on the same night. The evidence, while remote, was admissible. The weight to be given it was to be determined by the jury.

[6] Appellants further contend that the trial court erred in giving people's instructions Nos. 3 and 4, and quote the most objectionable portion as follows: "And, in this connection, you are further instructed that if the jury believe that the defendants, or any of them made any statement or statements relative to the alleged offense which were of an incriminatory nature, then the jury may consider any such statement or statements, if any, made by the defendants or any of them which were of an incriminatory nature, as true as the law presumes that a person charged with a crime or knowing that they are about to be charged with the commission of a crime is not liable to make an incriminatory statement relative to such crime unless such statement be true." This instruction has been expressly criticized in the case of People v. Piner, 11 Cal. App. 542, 105 P. 780. Part of instruction 3 is also open to criticism.

[7, 8] It is admitted by the Attorney General, and we agree with him, that two errors, one in cross-examination of Jack Elliott, and the other in the two instructions noted, were committed during the trial, and it remains to be determined whether or not these errors resulted in a miscarriage of justice requiring a reversal under the provisions of article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution.

The transcript of the evidence in this case is long, and it would serve no good purpose to review in detail the testimony of the twenty-one witnesses who appeared before the jury. Suffice it to say that the evidence of the guilt of all the defendants is overwhelming. Pansy Thomas, a waitress in the Broiler Café, served the four defendants immediately before the robbery, and saw three of them actually engaged in the crime. The fourth had gone to the street in front of the café and started the automobile in which they made their escape. Mary Peck, the cashier in the café, positively identified all of the defendants as the ones committing the crime. The evidence of these witnesses alone was sufficient to support a conviction. Further, the defendants confessed to a number of people, both in Riverside and Los Angeles, and then in San Bernardino. The evidence of guilt was conclusive, and leaves no doubt of the correctness of the verdict of the jury. This is a proper case in which to invoke the provisions of the Constitution above referred to. People v. Burns, 27 Cal. App. 227, 149 P. 605; People v. Black, 73 Cal. App. 13, 238 P. 374.

POUNDSTONE et al. v. GOFOOR.

Civ. 4011.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Feb. 21, 1930.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(13)—Evidence sustained findings that lessee breached lease by failing to commence cultivation of land within time required.

Evidence in action by lessor for unlawful detainer of land by lessee held sufficient to support findings that lessee failed or neglected to move on land and commence operations of plowing land for growing of rice crop within time required by terms of lease, and refused or neglected to prepare land for rice culture in due or proper season.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨103(1)—Demand for performance by lessor terminating lease was unnecessary, where time for lessee's performance of broken covenants had passed.

Where time had passed at which broken covenants of lease of land to commence preparation of soil for growing of rice crop during season could be performed, therefore demand for performance thereof was not required by lessor electing to terminate lease for lessee's failure to perform covenants.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨103(1)—Lessor's right to terminate lease depended upon whether lessee's failure to perform was breach for which damages would inadequately compensate, and not upon time being of essence.

Lessor's right to terminate lease of land for growing of rice crop was not dependent on whether time was of the essence thereof, but whether lessee's failure to perform covenant to commence preparation of land for crop to permit harvesting of crop during season was substantial breach for which damages would be inadequate compensation.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨103(1)—Lessee's use of inadequate equipment to prepare land for rice crop to be harvested during season justified lessor's termination of lease conditioned thereon.

Failure of lessee to perform covenants of lease requiring commencement of preparation of land for growing of rice crop to be harvested during season not only constituted substantial breach of terms, but warranted belief that lessee could not or would not in good faith discharge obligations thereunder, justifying termination thereof by lessor because inadequacy of equipment employed by lessee effected breach of covenants of lease by preventing timely preparation of land.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(12)—Evidence concerning negotiations leading to lease held admissible to show meaning of lessee's agreement to commence operations for cultivation of land at specified time.

Evidence relating to negotiations between parties leading up to execution of lease and conversations between them as to importance of early preparation of land for seeding of rice crop held admissible in action by lessor for unlawful detainer by lessee, for purpose of showing situation and condition of subject-matter of agreement and understanding of parties as to meaning of lessee's agreement to commence operations of preparing land for crop at time specified in lease.

Action by Jesse Poundstone and another against Abdul Gofoor. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

FINCH, P. J.

This is an action of unlawful detainer. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant has appealed.

The defendant went into possession of 700 acres of land belonging to the plaintiffs under a lease dated March 1, 1927, but not signed by the defendant until March 21, 1927. It appears that the plaintiffs had orally agreed to lease the land to the defendant about the 1st of March, but that, by reason of the defendant's objections to some of the details of the lease, he did not sign it until the time mentioned. The plaintiffs signed the lease several days prior to March 21st, and left it with their attorney, at whose office it was understood the defendant was to sign it. When the defendant finally expressed his willingness to sign the lease, the plaintiffs, on account of the lateness of the season for preparing so large an acreage for rice, required the defendant to sign an indorsement on the lease reading as follows: "As a further consideration of the above lease said second party agrees that he will move upon said land and commence operations under said lease on or before the 24th day of March, 1927." Among the terms of the lease were the following:

"Said lessee agrees that he will plant said lands to rice. * * * The said lessee shall prepare said lands, check the same, and plant the seed and do all the irrigating and harvesting of the said rice in accordance with the best methods of husbandry practiced in the vicinity, and it is expressly understood and agreed that said lessee will properly and efficiently prepare said lands and seed the same and irrigate and harvest and thresh said rice crops and do all things necessary or proper in the business of farming said lands for rice. The intent of this paragraph is to secure the best possible rice crop from said premises during the term of this lease, both in quantity and quality. * * *

"It is agreed that in case of default in the performance of any of the acts herein agreed to be performed by lessee, lessors may at their option, terminate this lease."

The court found:

"That said defendant failed and neglected to move onto said land and commence operations of plowing said land and preparing the same for rice culture, under said lease, on or before the 24th day of March, 1927, * * * and did not commence the operations referred to in said lease prior to the 5th day of April, 1927, the date of the service upon him of the notice hereinafter mentioned except that said defendant did, between the 25th day of March and the 5th day of April, 1927, prosecute certain work of disking a portion of said land; that defendant failed and refused to prepare said land for rice culture or to plow, or check the same for irrigation, or to commence the work of plowing or preparing or check the same for rice culture, in due or proper season or at all, but refused and neglected so to do. * * *

"That in order to successfully grow and raise a crop on said land in said season it was necessary that all of said work in the preparation of said land, especially the work of plowing, checking and preparing the same for irrigation, be done in due and proper season, and that all of said work be commenced not later than said 24th day of March, 1927, in order that the same be properly completed in time to be planted and irrigated thereafter in time to successfully raise a crop of rice thereon in said season, and the agreement on the part of said defendant as to the time for the commencement of it, and doing said work, plowing and preparing said land was an essential term of said contract, and the inducement on the part of the plaintiffs for the execution of the same on their part."

[1] There is sufficient evidence to support the foregoing findings, and, since such findings warrant the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, it is unnecessary to consider other findings or the evidence in support thereof. Marion Poundstone, who was in charge of the plaintiffs' lands, testified that prior to March 25 the defendant "brought a set of disks. On the 25th of March, why he brought an engine. * * * The evening of the 25th he tried to work but he didn't * * * actually do any work until the 26th. * * * The morning of the 26th I went down in the field and his engine was stopped. * * * His engineer * * * made the remark, 'The old heap won't pull the disks.' * * * We had this piece of land in field No. 1 that was not included in the lease; * * * it was looser, and they thought by going over there they might be able to do something with it, so I allowed them to go into field No. 1. * * * They disked the best they could; the work was very poor. * * * (He) never had any plows of his own; borrowed a set from Mr. Barnett about the 10th of April. * * * His engine was a 75 Best, but practically everything on it was worn out and it had no power. * * * I think on the 6th (of April) they * * * finished that field No. 1 and then pulled over to No. 2." The defendant testified that he had another 75 Best tractor and 44 head of live stock which he could have used in doing the work, but he did not take either the second tractor or the live stock to the Poundstone ranch. He testified that he did not take any plows to the ranch until April 10. The evidence shows that it is necessary to plant rice early in the spring in order to mature and harvest it before the beginning of the rainy season in the fall or winter months. Henry R. Vail, who raised rice during 1927 on a part of the same land which was covered by the defendant's lease, testified that, "if the work was started by the first of March, I would think two engines of 60 type in good condition could take care of all the work" on the 700 acres of land; that, if the work was commenced about the 1st of April, "I think I had about as few rigs in there as possible to get it through in time to make a crop"; and that he used in the preparation and planting of the land "a 75 Holt, 60 Best, 30 Best, and 75 Best, with one Fordson or possibly two Fordsons." Plaintiff Poundstone testified that on March 13 there was a rainfall of .40 and thereafter .10 March 31, .76 April 1, and .66 April 2.

From the foregoing evidence it may be inferred that, during a week of favorable weather after the time at which the defendant had agreed to "commence operations," he neither had an adequate equipment on the land nor made any reasonable effort to "properly and efficiently prepare said lands and seed the same," as required by the terms of the lease. In the language of counsel for respondent: "Other people were working with a full force during those days. They were vital days for the successful operation of rice growing. Mr. Poundstone had a right to believe if Mr. Gofoor was acting in good faith that he would have been on the ground with adequate equipment and that he would have been able to practically complete the plowing before the rain. * * * In considering whether or not there had been a substantial compliance with this lease, the circumstances surrounding the parties, the season of the year, the character of crop that was to be grown, the things that it was shown were required to (be done) * * * in order to successfully raise such a crop, all must be considered." Through the defendant's continuing neglect to discharge in any substantial manner his obligations under the lease, the plaintiffs were faced with the necessity of either terminating the lease or running the risk of an entire crop failure on their land; the agreed rental being a share of the crop.

[2-4] On April 2, 1927, the plaintiffs served a notice on the defendant to the effect that they had elected to terminate the lease by reason of his failure to perform the covenants thereof, specifying the particulars in which the defendant had failed. A part of the land was then leased by the plaintiffs to Vail, who commenced operations thereon about April 4. On April 5 the plaintiffs served upon the defendant their demand that he "vacate and surrender the possession of said premises." The appellant contends that this notice was insufficient because it did not give him the alternative right either to perform the covenants of the lease or surrender the possession of the premises. The time had passed at which the broken covenants could be performed, and therefore demand for the performance thereof was not required. Pfitzer v. Candeias, 53 Cal. App. 737, 740, 200 P. 839. In this connection the appellant further contends that time was not of the essence of the contract. The plaintiffs' right to terminate the lease was not dependent upon whether time was of the essence thereof, but whether the defendant's failure to perform was a substantial breach for which damages would be an inadequate compensation. Mettler v. Vance, 30 Cal. App. 499, 500, 158 P. 1044. The defendant's failure to perform the covenants of the lease not only constituted a substantial breach of the terms thereof, but warranted the belief that he either could not or would not in good faith discharge his obligations thereunder.

[5] The court admitted evidence relating to negotiations between the parties leading up to the execution of the lease and conversations between them as to the importance of the early preparation of the land for seeding. Appellant contends that this was error. This evidence was properly admitted for the purpose of showing the situation and condition of the subject-matter of the agreement and the understanding of the parties as to the meaning of the defendant's agreement to "commence operations" at the time specified. To "commence operations" might mean different things under differing circumstances. Appellant contends "that operations were commenced by the defendant on March 21, 1927, when he procured a disking machine and moved it to the camping grounds provided by the plaintiffs, and moved to and took possession of the camping ground near the rice fields." This construction of the covenant in question might be permissible under other circumstances, but it is perfectly clear from the circumstances proved in this case and the conversations between the parties prior to the execution of the lease that they understood the language used to mean that the defendant was to commence, with adequate equipment, the actual preparation of the land for seeding at a time not later than that stated. To have commenced operations, even at the time stipulated, with the wholly inadequate equipment used by the defendant, would not have been a compliance with the terms of the lease. It was such inadequacy of equipment rather than the mere delay in the commencement of the work which constituted defendant's breach of the contract of lease and justified the plaintiffs' termination thereof.

Other points made by the appellant are not deemed of sufficient merit or importance to warrant the discussion thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ODENWALD et al. ★
Crim. 1914.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.
Feb. 21, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 7, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 20, 1930.

1. Burglary $\Rightarrow$ 3—Conviction for burglary was sustained, notwithstanding intent was to steal liquor possessed contrary to law (National Prohibition Act, tit. 2, § 25 [27 USCA § 39]; Wright Act).

Conviction for burglary was sustained over defendants' contention that property intended to be taken was not subject to larceny, as it was alcoholic liquor possessed contrary to National Prohibition Act, tit. 2, § 25 (27 USCA § 39), which expressly provides no property right shall exist in such liquor, and to Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79).

2. Burglary $\Rightarrow$ 28(7)—Proof defendants took property from garage, when information for burglary alleged its ownership in garage's owner, held no variance; allegation not being essential.

That information for burglary alleged ownership of property by a certain person, and proof was that defendants took property from a garage owned by this person, held no variance; allegation as to ownership not being essential.

3. Burglary $\Rightarrow$ 41(1)—Proof alleged owner had possession and control of property taken by burglar held to be sufficient.

Where information for burglary alleged property taken was owned by a certain person, proof which failed to show such ownership, but showed possession and control by that person, was sufficient.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

The appellants were convicted of the offense of burglary. They prosecute this appeal from the judgment. But two reasons are assigned for a reversal, and they are: (1) That the proof shows that the property which the appellants intended to steal consisted of intoxicating liquors possessed contrary to the National Prohibition Act (27 USCA) and Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) of this state, and therefore not the subject of larceny; and (2) that there is a fatal variance between the allegations of the information and the proof in this, that the information charged the appellants with entering the garage of one Jeanette Chafffen "with the intent then and there and therein to feloniously and unlawfully steal, take and carry away the goods and personal property of the said Jeanette Chafffen," whereas the proof failed to show that Jeanette Chafffen was the owner of the property intended to be appropriated.

[1] To sustain their first contention, counsel for appellants rely upon the authority of People v. Spencer, 54 Cal. App. 54, 201 P. 130. The testimony establishes that the liquor was unlawfully possessed, and therefore the instant cause is brought squarely within the doctrine of the Spencer Case and the authorities there cited. The question to be determined by us is: Shall we adhere to the rule there laid down? It cannot be denied that there is a sharp conflict in the decisions from other jurisdictions. The National Prohibition Act (Barnes' Fed. Code, 1921, Supp.) provides by section 8352 (27 USCA § 39) as follows: "It shall be unlawful to have or possess any liquor or property designed for the manufacture of liquor intended for use in violating this chapter or which has been so used, and no property rights shall exist in any such liquor or property." (Italics ours.) The authorities which hold that liquor so possessed cannot be the subject of burglary, including the Spencer Case, proceed upon the theory that, since one may not have a property right therein, the property itself cannot be stolen; that, inasmuch as it can have no legitimate or lawful value to its owner, it is without inherent value. We are not ready to accede to this reasoning. Regardless of its lawful or legitimate value, the appellants considered it of sufficient inherent value to make it the subject of larceny. Reasoning which accords with our own is found in State v. Schoonover, 122 Wash. 562, 211 P. 756, 758, as follows:

"The first contention on the appeal is that the court erred in submitting to the jury the question of the larceny of the intoxicating liquors; the argument being that intoxicating liquors, since they are contraband under both the state law and the National Prohibition Act, have no value, and are not, therefore, a subject of larceny. In so far as the question is affected, by our state laws, we have decided contrary to the contention in State v. Donovan, 108 Wash. 276, 183 P. 127. There the precise question was presented, and, after citing and reviewing the sustaining authority, we held that its outlawed and contraband nature did not prevent it from being the subject of larceny. But, subsequent to the decision of the cited case, the National Prohibition Act was enacted, the twenty-fifth section of title 2 of which provides that it shall be unlawful to have or possess any liquor, or property designed for the manufacture of liquor, in violation of the act, and that 'no property rights shall exist in any such liquor or property.' 41 U. S. Stat. at Large, 315 [27

USCA § 39]. It is argued that this provision of the federal act necessitates a conclusion different from that adopted by us, as our statute does not contain the quoted words. We cannot think, however, that this difference in the wording of the statutes in any way affects the principle upon which the rule is rested. The state punishes the wrongful taking of personal property belonging to or in the possession of another because of the offense against the majesty of its laws, and because of the inherent wickedness and criminality of the act, as well as because of the wrong done to the individual whose property is taken. Stated in another way, the state punishes larceny because it is larceny, and, that the guilty may not escape, it will treat any form of personal property having actual value as having value for the purposes of larceny, notwithstanding it may be unlawful for the possessor to have it in possession. Furthermore, the declaration of outlawry against intoxicating liquors and the declaration that there are no property rights therein is for the purpose of discouraging its possession, not for the purpose of encouraging larceny, and it is not the policy of the law, nor conducive to good morals or good government, to allow the laws directed against one offense to become a shield against the punishment of another.

"The case of People v. Spencer [54 Cal. App. 54], 201 P. 130, is cited to us as a case decided since the enactment of the National Prohibition Act, holding that there cannot be larceny in the wrongful taking of intoxicating liquors since the passage of that act. But an examination of the case will show that the court pursued the line of reasoning adopted in the cases opposed to our own case of State v. Donovan, supra, and that its reasoning, if followed, would have required a contrary conclusion in that case. It was not rested solely on the declaration in the federal act to the effect that no property rights exist in intoxicating liquors held for unlawful purposes. A case decided since the passage of the act, and sustaining our view, is People v. Wilson, 298 Ill. 257, 131 N. E. 609."

In the case of People v. Wilson, cited in the quotation, we read: "Samuel Fox testified that the burglary was committed and several cases of whisky stolen which were of the value of $26.50 per case, and the first proposition of counsel in support of the errors assigned is that the evidence failed to support the charge of burglary, because whisky, being contraband under the National Prohibition Act (41 Stat. 305 [27 USCA]), has no value except where it is purchased and kept under a government permit, and is therefore not the subject of larceny unless the indictment charges and the proof shows that a permit has been obtained by the person in whose possession the whisky is kept. Burglary may be committed where personal property which is the subject of ownership is taken, and the fact that the property is kept for an unlawful purpose does not change the nature of the crime. This has been decided as to intoxicating liquors kept for sale contrary to the provisions of a statute, or property used for gambling purposes contrary to law, or a pistol the sale of which was forbidden. State v. May, 20 Iowa, 305; Bales v. State, 3 W. Va. 685; Commonwealth v. Smith, 129 Mass. 111; Osborne v. State, 115 Tenn. 717, 92 S. W. 853, 5 Ann. Cas. 797; 17 R. C. L. 29. The whisky had an actual value, whether it had a market value or not, and was the subject of larceny."

That there has been a confusion of terminology, or a failure at all times to draw the distinction between property rights and property, is indicated by the next excerpt taken from Arner v. State, 19 Okl. Cr. 23, 197 P. 710, 711, as follows:

"The argument advanced by counsel for defendants in support of these various assignments of error, and the contention made thereunder, is that, to constitute robbery there must be the taking of personal property from another by means of force or violence, and that the thing taken must be of some value. Therefore, it is contended that because the prosecuting witness had no property rights of any kind in the whisky of which he was possessed for the purpose of violating the prohibitory liquor laws, no property was taken from him, and therefore all the essential elements of the crime of robbery were not present in the taking of this whisky under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence.

"We cannot agree with this contention. Section 3620, Revised Laws 1910, supra, does not have the effect of altering or changing the inherent character or nature of whisky as personal property. An entire consideration of the prohibitory liquor laws of this state discloses that the intent of the Legislature was to provide that intoxicating liquors possessed by a person for the purpose of violating any of the provisions of the prohibitory liquor laws should be contraband property as between the state, its officers, and such person; that a person unlawfully possessed of intoxicating liquors, etc., could not claim to have property rights in such articles in a proceeding brought by the state to confiscate them; not that the articles and things condemned, when unlawfully kept or used, were not property.

"In the case of Tom Thomas v. State, 13 Okl. Cr. 414, 164 P. 995, which was a conviction for the crime of murder committed by defendant while engaged in the perpetration of a whisky robbery, the contention was made that defendant was not guilty of the crime of murder committed in the perpetration of a robbery, because whisky used in violation of the law was not the subject of robbery. In passing upon this contention, this court, in the body of the opinion said:

"The contention that because whisky is contraband property in this state, as against the state and its officers, others are entitled to rob and murder * * * to obtain possession of it from one who is using it unlawfully, is wholly without merit. Neither robbery nor murder may be justified or excused on such a ground."

A very convincing statement is also found in People v. Otis, 235 N. Y. 421, 139 N. E. 562, in the following language:

"The statute (41 Stat. 315, tit. 2, § 25 [27 USCA § 39]) further provides that 'no property rights shall exist' in liquor illegally possessed. There can be no larceny of property not subject to ownership. How then, it is asked, may there be larceny of such liquor? If we give the broadest possible construction to these words, there is no answer; for it must be conceded that to enforce the recent amendment to the Constitution, Congress may declare that to steal liquor shall no longer be a crime. It might think it wise to license theft so as to discourage intoxication. We should not, however, readily impute to it such a design. Commonwealth v. Rourke, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 397. Certainly the earlier declaration of the same statute (section 3) that its provisions are to be 'liberally construed to the end that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage may be prevented' gives no indication of such a purpose. To so construe the language of section 25 would be to encourage the transportation, distribution, and consumption of liquor by the thief.

"The truth is that sections 25, 26, and 27 [27 USCA §§ 39, 40, 44] are but three of a number of sections providing remedies by which the statute may be more conveniently enforced. A separate sentence or clause is not to be wrenched from its context. The sections are to be construed as a whole in the light of their general object. We start with the presumption that the possession of liquor is illegal. Section 33 [27 USCA § 50]. Such liquor may be seized. Search warrants may be issued, but not with regard to private dwellings with some exceptions. If being transported the officer making the seizure shall also take possession of the vehicle in which it is found. All this is to be followed by an orderly procedure in court. The court shall dispose of the liquor if it finds that it was unlawfully possessed. The court may order it destroyed, or may order that it be delivered to the government. The court is to deal with the vehicle in which the liquor may have been transported. Mingled as it is with these provisions, the clause as to property rights was clearly intended solely to protect government officials in the exercise of their duties. Questions had arisen as to the taking and destruction of property illegally used without a formal condemnation by court decree. Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 14 S. Ct. 499, 38 L. Ed. 385. It was there said that the owner of property so taken had his remedy. He might, if the use of the property was not in fact illegal, replevy it or have an action for its value, and in such cases the burden would be on the defendant to prove jurisdiction. It was to answer as far as possible these suggestions, to protect the officer making the seizure or destroying the liquor, to secure the title of him who might purchase the liquor from the government, to permit a summary remedy by court decree, possibly also to vest immediately the title to such liquor in the state (People v. Case, 220 Mich. 379, 190 N. W. 289, 27 A. L. R. 686), that the provisions as to presumptions and as to property were enacted. However broad the language used, its effects should be confined to the purposes for which it was intended. Property rights in such liquor are not forever ended. They pass to the government. They pass from it to a purchaser. Section 25 is merely a police regulation, adapted to aid the enforcement of the prohibition law and to be applied with that end in view. The intention of Congress went no further."

Any person who contemplates the serious consequences possibly attendant upon a universally accepted doctrine that contraband liquor cannot be the subject of larceny, must do so with serious misgivings concerning its soundness. Focusing our attention upon the fiction that, because it has no legal value, it has no value at all, we must close our eyes to the fact that its illegal value (using that term solely for the purpose of distinction) is such as to arouse the lust of greed to create a new type of dangerous and vicious criminal, the one designated in common parlance as the "hijacker." Can he steal and rob and pillage with impunity simply because the object of his search cannot be made the subject of lawful possession or sale? The question shocks our sense of stabilized society, for the protection of which laws denouncing burglary and like offenses have been adopted. Let him who meditates upon the problem picture to himself the increasing number of breaches of the peace, affrays, and killings, if the illicit dealer in and thief of intoxicating liquors may break locks and doors without fear of drastic punishment, and he will not affirm the right. What becomes of the sanctity of the home if the burglar with apparent intent, whether real or feigned, to steal intoxicating liquor, may ransack it without possibility of serious punishment, except an intent to steal something else of value can be proven? The idea is appalling, and we revolt against the acceptance of any such standard.

Authorities sustaining the view we entertain, in addition to those from which we have quoted, are listed as follows: State v. Friedman, 98 N. J. Law, 577, 120 A. 8, 9; Mance v. State, 5 Ga. App. 229, 62 S. E. 1053; August v. State, 11 Ga. App. 798, 76 S. E. 164; Hoback v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 284 F. 529-532; Gonch

v. Republic Storage Co., 218 App. Div. 584, 219 N. Y. S. 46.

[2, 3] Concerning the second reason assigned by appellants for a reversal of the judgment, it is conceded by respondent that there is no testimony that Jeanette Chaffen was the owner of the liquor. It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire if the allegation is essential to the information. In People v. Rogers, 81 Cal. 209, 22 P. 592, it is said: "A point is made that it is not alleged that Jones & Harding were partners, or that they were the owners of the building or its contents. Under the Code definition of burglary, it was not necessary to allege the partnership, and the ownership of the building and its contents was sufficiently designated. People v. Henry, 77 Cal. 445, 19 P. 830." And in People v. Price, 143 Cal. 351, 77 P. 73, it was held unnecessary to describe the house by ownership; it being sufficient to designate it by street and number. There is less reason for designating the ownership of the property which the burglar attempts to feloniously appropriate than there is to designate the ownership of the building. At least the same principle would seem to require us to say that the allegation was not essential; hence there is no fatal variance. An added reason why appellants may not be heard to complain is found in the fact that the liquor was in the garage of the residence of Jeanette Chaffen, and it has been held sufficient to show that the property "was in the possession and under the control of the person from whom it is claimed to have been taken." People v. Hayes, 72 Cal. App. 292, 237 P. 390, 393.

Judgment affirmed.

GACKSTETTER v. MARKET ST. RY. CO.
et al. ★
Civ. 6951.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.
Feb. 17, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 19, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 17, 1930.

1. Evidence §568(6)—Testimony as to speed of street car given by witness testifying in effect that he had no knowledge on subject held not to conclude court.

In action for injury to four year old girl struck by street car, testimony as to speed of car given by witness, who in effect testified that he had no knowledge on subject of speed, held not to conclude court.

2. Street railroads §114(19)—Evidence did not show that motorman, after discovering peril of child, did not exercise ordinary care.

In action for injury to four year old girl struck by street car, in which plaintiff invoked theory of last clear chance, evidence held not to show that motorman, after discovering peril of plaintiff, did not exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring her.

3. Street railroads §103(4)—Where motorman discovering peril exercised ordinary care to prevent injury to child, there was no liability under last clear chance doctrine.

If motorman of street car exercised ordinary care to avoid injuring four year old girl on tracks when he discovered child's peril, there was no liability under last clear chance doctrine.

4. Appeal and error §1048(6)—In personal injury action against street railway, refusal to permit cross-examination of plaintiff's witness respecting contradictory statement held prejudicial error under circumstances.

In action for injury to four year old girl struck by street car, refusal to permit cross-examination of plaintiff's witness as to contradictory statement made to agent of defendant regarding facts of accident offered as foundation for impeachment held prejudicial error under circumstances, in view of evidence given by such witness.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Betty Gackstetter, by John Gackstetter her guardian ad litem, against the Market Street Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Superseding opinion in 280 P. 154.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Walter H. Linforth, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Vincent W. Hallinan and James J. Roach, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff a minor girl of the age of about four years, was injured by being struck by one of the cars operated by the Market Street Railway Company. By her guardian ad litem she commenced this action to obtain a judgment for injuries sustained. She named the company, L. M. McClelland, the motorman, and W. J. Housel, the conductor, as defendants. The conductor's motion for a nonsuit was granted. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and, from a judgment entered thereon, the other defendants have appealed.

The accident occurred between Broderick and Divisadero on Hayes street in San Francisco on the 24th day of June, 1925, at about half past three p. m. Hayes street runs from east to west. Between Broderick and Divisadero there is a slope toward the east and the street has a grade of 3.6 per cent. The defendant maintains a double track on Hayes street. The collision occurred in about the middle of the block, and the plaintiff was struck by a car traveling from west to east. At the time of the collision a building was being constructed on the south side of Hayes street. In front of that building was a pile of rock or sand. The point of the collision was directly north of that pile.

Judging from the instructions requested by the plaintiff and by the questions propounded to the witnesses, it was the theory of the plaintiff that at the time of the accident the defendants' car was being driven at a speed in excess of the speed limited by an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, to wit, at a speed in excess of fifteen miles per hour; that in any event the car was being propelled at an excessive speed under the particular circumstances introduced in evidence; and that under the doctrine of the last clear chance the defendants' car could have been and should have been stopped before the collision. On the other hand, it was the theory of the defense that at the time and place of the accident its car was being propelled at a speed not to exceed seven or eight miles per hour, and that when the motorman saw the plaintiff she was on the sand pile and later he saw her move northerly toward the track, and when he saw her so move he slugged the car according to the most approved manner and stopped within fifteen or twenty feet.

[1] The only evidence in the record to the effect that defendants' car was being propelled faster than seven or eight miles per hour was given by Mr. McDonnell, a witness called by the plaintiff. Mr. McDonnell was a police officer, going to work, and had boarded the car in the Western addition. He took a seat in the back end of the car and was reading his paper and paid no attention to the movements of the car until he heard a scream; then he laid his paper down. After he heard the scream he testified that the car stopped very quickly. Regarding the speed of the car, he testified that from the time the car left Broderick street until the little girl was struck "it was going at a moderate rate of speed. I would call a moderate rate of speed between twenty and twenty-five miles an hour. To the best of my knowledge it was going about that speed at the time I mentioned." Looking at all of that testimony it is perfectly clear that the officer had, in effect, testified that he had no knowledge on the subject of the speed of the car and therefore his testimony on that subject does not conclude a court of justice. 22 C. J. 726; Newell-Murdoch Realty Co. v. Wickham, 183 Cal. 39, 43, 190 P. 359, 361. In that case the court said: "These statements of the witness, which are but statements, of conclusions and probabili-ties, following his emphatic statement that the subject was not touched upon, cannot be considered as a substantial contradiction of the positive testimony of the defendants that nothing of the kind was said."

As to the second theory advanced by the plaintiff, the record contains no combination of facts which brings it into application. When the motorman saw the children at play on the pile of sand, he did not attempt to run by the pile of sand at full speed, to wit, at fifteen miles per hour. He did not run by it at all. When the car stopped after the accident had happened, the nose of the car was opposite the center of the pile of sand. The little girl's body rested on the rail twelve feet back from the front of the fender when the latter is in a down position.

[2, 3] Under the theory of the doctrine of the last clear chance the plaintiff makes two different claims. One is based on the testimony of the defendant motorman. The other is based on the testimony adduced from witnesses called by the plaintiff. We will take up each claim in the order stated. The defendant McClelland was the motorman in charge of the car. He testified that as he was proceeding easterly on Hayes street his car made a stop at Broderick and took on two passengers. He then proceeded at first slowly and then increased his speed to seven or eight miles an hour. After he had left Broderick and when his car was a length and a half back, he saw the plaintiff on the west side of the sand pile a foot or perhaps two feet from the south curb. He kept his eye on her. Later she started to run across his path in the direction of the north curb. As she did so she was facing him, and therefore running somewhat toward him. At that time his car was twenty feet back from the plaintiff. The instant he saw her start to run he immediately tried to stop his car. He slugged it and stopped the car, so he testified, within fifteen or twenty feet after he saw her start to move. When the fender is down the distance from the edge of the fender to the place where the motorman stands is about eight feet. From the edge of the fender to the plaintiff was therefore twelve feet when the motorman saw her move. While he was stopping the car he was giving his attention primarily to that effort but within the scope of his vision he saw the plaintiff to his right, probably three feet from the car. On cross-examination he testified that he could, under the same conditions, at the same place, by using the same method, stop the car in twelve or fifteen feet and by turning on the air that it would take twenty feet. On direct examination and on cross-examination the witness repeatedly stated that from the moment he saw the plaintiff start to move he did everything in his power to stop the car. The plaintiff called two motormen now employed by the municipal road but who were formerly employed by the defendant road. G. R. Ensign testified that at the time and place of the accident by slugging it the car, traveling seven to eight miles per hour, could be stopped in ten or twelve feet. John Sorgenfrey, similarly qualified, testified that it could be stopped in ten feet. It may be granted that the last two witnesses were more skilled than McClelland. But no witness testified to any fact, or set of facts, tending to prove that after McClelland discovered the peril of the plaintiff he did not exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring her. If he did exercise ordinary care, he was not liable. 19 Cal. Jur. 651. The fact that, notwithstanding the exercise of such care on his part, the plaintiff was injured, is not the test. Green v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 48, 76 P. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68; Lambert v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 146 Cal. 231, 79 P. 873; Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., 10 Cal. App. 271, 278, 101 P. 914.

As based on the testimony of her own witnesses the case of the plaintiff rested partly on the testimony of Mrs. Blass. She resides on the same side of the street in the same block and a few doors east of the place where the accident occurred. She testified that at the time of the accident she was on the sidewalk near the curb talking to some persons in an automobile that was parked alongside of the curb. She stood in such a position that she was looking toward the west. She saw the plaintiff leave the sidewalk on the north side and run toward the south side. At the same time she saw the car leave Broderick street coming east. The left corner of the bumper of the car struck the child and the child was thrown through the air to the right over to and upon the rock pile and rolled down from the rock pile underneath the car. She further testified that the car was moving very quickly, but she did not testify as to where the car was when the motorman saw the peril of the little girl nor did she testify that the motorman omitted, as soon as he discovered plaintiff's peril, to use all possible care to avoid injuring her.

[4] When Mr. McDonnell took the stand he gave the testimony stated above. That testimony we have discussed. He further testified that after the collision he asked the motorman where the little girl came from and that the motorman said she ran across the street. "The motorman said that she ran from the north side, I believe. He pointed to the north side. He didn't mention the north side but he pointed to it. * * * Well, we were standing at the front end of the car and he said, 'She ran across in that direction in front of my car.'"

On cross-examination, in reply to questions propounded by counsel for defendants, the witness stated that about two weeks after the accident he had a talk with Mr. Lewin, an agent of the defendants, regarding the facts of the accident. The conversation was held at Sixth and Market streets. "He asked me about the speed of the car and I told him the car was going at a moderate rate of speed at the time the accident happened. That was a fact, too.

"Q. Now then, didn't you at that time tell him that in your opinion the motorman made a fine stop and was not at fault?

"Mr. Hallinan: We object to that as not binding on the plaintiff.

"Mr. Linforth: I am laying a foundation to impeach the witness.

"The Court: Sustained."

In their briefs the defendants vehemently press that ruling as a prejudicial error. Under the peculiar facts of this case it was. If the question had been allowed and the witness had answered that he did make that statement to Mr. Lewin, necessarily some of the previous answers given by the witness must have been withdrawn. The statement that the motorman was not at fault conflicts squarely with the facts which the witness knew at the time of the accident, or of which he claimed to have been informed, or which his testimony suggested as being true. If in fact the car was traveling twenty or twenty-five miles per hour that was not moderate, but criminally immoderate. Nothing to the contrary appearing, the witness knew the motorman's view was unobstructed, and that, if the latter proceeded at all while an infant four years of age was crossing his path, he was not exercising ordinary care or any care. In short, the facts as related or suggested by the witness were directly contrary to the statement intimated in the question to which an objection was sustained. As the plaintiff had not made a prima facie case on any other theory than the one last discussed, the jury must have rested its verdict thereon. It is patent, therefore, that the error mentioned was prejudicial, and that there has been a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is reversed.

ROGERS v. HAINES.

Civ. 4013.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 20, 1930.

1. Husband and wife ⇨333(9)—Evidence held to sustain judgment for damages for alienation of affections of wife.

Evidence in action to recover damages for alienation of affections of wife held sufficient to sustain judgment for damages by reason thereof.

2. Husband and wife ⇨324—Action for damages lies against one wrongfully enticing wife to abandon her husband, without proving desertion was accomplished through defendant's malice; "entice" (Civ. Code § 49).

Action for damages lies, under Civ. Code, § 49, against one who wrongfully entices a wife to abandon her husband, without necessity of proving that desertion was accomplished through malice on part of defendant, since the term "entice" means to lure, induce, tempt, incite, or persuade one to do a thing, and it is sufficient if conduct of defendant leading to separation of spouses was intentional and wrongful.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second and Third Series, Entice; Enticement.]

3. Husband and wife ⇨333(9)—Less evidence is necessary to support judgment for damages for alienation of affections of wife by stranger than in case of parent.

Less evidence is necessary to support a judgment for damages for alienation of affections of wife by a stranger to family than is required when a parent is charged therewith, for reason that a parent is recognized as entitled to privilege of reasonably counseling and advising their children for their welfare.

4. Husband and wife ⇨326—That defendant's conduct was not sole cause of separation and loss of affections is no defense to action for alienation of affections.

Fact that conduct of defendant was not the sole cause of separation and loss of affections constitutes no defense to an action for alienation of affections of a spouse, it being sufficient if conduct was procuring or controlling cause of alienation of affections, although other reasons may have contributed to some extent.

5. Husband and wife ⇨333(9)—Circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to establish case in action for damages for alienation of affections.

Circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to establish a case in action to recover damages for alienation of affections, when considered in connection with natural presumptions and inferences which may be drawn therefrom, since it is naturally difficult to prove by direct evidence the purpose and effect of conduct upon affections of a spouse.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; H. W. Gregory, Judge.

Action by William Rogers against George Haines. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Richard P. Talbot, of Sacramento, for appellant.

George E. McCutchen and Ralph H. Lewis, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for damages for the alienation of the affections of a wife. The judgment was entered upon the rendering of the verdict of a jury. A reversal is sought upon the sole ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment.

[1] The plaintiff and Gladys Cheney were married at Jackson, Cal., December 10, 1922. They immediately moved to Marshfield, Or., where they established a home and for some time lived happily. A daughter, Betty, was born as the issue of the marriage in 1924. Mr. and Mrs. Cheney, the parents of Mrs. Rogers, lived near Ione, Cal., where her father was engaged in the occupation of hunting and trapping predatory animals. They had a son, named Albert, who was born in 1912. The defendant was a divorced man who lived at Ione with his mother and infant daughter as neighbors of Mrs. Rogers' parents. The defendant was engaged in raising sheep. In the summer of 1925, Mrs. Rogers visited her parents at Ione and then met and associated with the defendant. After a visit of several weeks she returned to her home at Marshfield. Mr. Haines accompanied her as far as Sacramento. About two weeks later the defendant made an excuse to drive with a new Hudson automobile up to Oregon. He claimed that he was seeking to purchase sheep. He invited Albert, the twelve year old brother of Mrs. Rogers, to accompany him and drove directly to the home of the plaintiff at Marshfield. It is evident that the pretense of seeking for sheep was a mere subterfuge and that the journey to Oregon was prompted solely by his interest in Mrs. Rogers. This is obvious for the reason that Western Oregon is not a sheep country and during the time the defendant was there he made no effort to purchase sheep. Moreover, his invitation to take the boy Albert to his sister's home indicates this was really his destination. He had never before met the plaintiff. When he arrived at Marshfield he was invited to remain as a guest at the Rogers' home. He accepted the invitation and remained for about ten days. The plaintiff was employed at the mill as a wheelwright and his occupation kept him away from home during the daytime. During this period of time the defendant was a constant companion of

Mrs. Rogers, remaining at home with her during the absence of her husband or taking her to ride in his automobile. Certain incidents clearly indicate that she exhibited undue interest in the defendant and neglected her husband. She became critical of her husband and he was an unwelcome associate in their games of cards or pleasure excursions. Finally he became suspicious of their conduct and took occasion to return to his home when he was unexpected. On one occasion he found them seated in the kitchen in earnest conference with their chairs and heads in close contact. They gave no explanation for this conduct. On another occasion he found them together in her dressing room. She was attired only in a slip and was engaged in powdering her face while the defendant stood close by. During this visit of the defendant at Marshfield, the plaintiff once suggested that he and his wife were talking of taking a trip around the world, and the defendant said: "Why don't you get a divorce and go." No occasion for the suggestion of a divorce appears in the record. Up to the time of the visit of the defendant the record indicates that Mr. and Mrs. Rogers were living happily together. The conduct of the defendant and Mrs. Rogers led to some controversy between plaintiff and his wife and she said to him: "You ain't like Mr. Haines, Mr. Haines divorced his wife." The inference is that he should do likewise. While it is true that Mrs. Rogers testified that their subsequent separation occurred because her husband was cruel and that he was engaged in bootlegging, she specified no act of cruelty and he emphatically refutes both charges. Mrs. Dalzell testified that while she was riding with the defendant and Mrs. Rogers at Marshfield, they appeared to be very friendly toward each other, and during a conversation, out of the presence of the plaintiff, Mr. Haines said "he thought Gladys should get a divorce." And again he said, "Gladys had better * * * get a divorce." When the defendant left for California, it is quite evident he attempted to persuade Mrs. Rogers to go with him. Mrs. Lucas, a neighbor at Marshfield, testified that Mrs. Rogers, in the presence of the defendant, while discussing his departure said, "I might go home with Mr. Haines." She did not go, however, explaining that she was afraid her husband would make trouble for them. But she soon followed after him. A few months later she again made an excuse to visit her parents at Ione, during which time she frequently met the defendant. However, she returned to her home at Marshfield once more in 1927, but did not remain long. Considerable controversy arose between the spouses over the defendant. In May, 1927, without previous warning and in the absence of her husband, Mrs. Rogers packed her personal effects and left her home, never to return again. His first intimation of her intention to leave was when he came home and found her gone. Upon inquiry from a neighbor he was told his wife had left him. There was no previous quarrel or warning of her purpose to go. After about two weeks the plaintiff went to Ione to persuade his wife to return to him. He found her at her parents' home. The defendant was also there and remained for several days. The plaintiff's wife avoided him, and both his father-in-law and the defendant prevented him from conversing or associating with her. During this period of time the spouses did not live together as husband and wife. The defendant again suggested to plaintiff: "Why not get a divorce and have it over?" Mrs. Rogers obtained employment as a waitress at the hotel in the adjoining town of Jackson and was often taken back and forth to her work by Mr. Haines. The plaintiff testified in this regard:

"Q. How did she get back from Jackson? A. Mr. Haines and Mr. Cheney took her back.

"Q. Did you try to go on any of those trips? A. I did, but they insisted on me not going after her."

The plaintiff failed to persuade his wife to return to her home in Oregon. He testified in this regard:

"Q. Did you try to get her to come back to Oregon with you? A. Yes, I did as much as I could. I could not get any chance with Mr. Haines and Mr. Cheney (interfering) that is why; whenever she * * * come to the house she was with Mr. Haines and Mr. Cheney."

No reason for the final separation was given by either of the parents of Mrs. Rogers, except the bare statement which Mrs. Cheney made that "she (Mrs. Rogers) wrote me that he (Mr. Rogers) had been bootlegging and her father told me to write her to come home." The defendant was a close friend and in great favor with Mr. and Mrs. Cheney. It seems evident the parents were encouraging the separation.

The foregoing circumstances do not present a strong case of alienation of affections, but we are of the opinion they are sufficient to support the implied finding of the jury to the effect that the conduct of the defendant was the procuring cause of the separation of the spouses and of the alienation of the affections of plaintiff's wife.

[2-5] An action for damages lies against one who wrongfully entices a wife to abandon her husband. Section 49, Civ. Code. It is not necessary to prove that the desertion was accomplished through malice on the part of the defendant. Smith v. Mitchell, 64 Cal. App. 463, 467, 221 P. 964. The term "entice" means to lure, induce, tempt, incite, or persuade one to do a thing. It is sufficient if the conduct of the defendant which led to the separation of the spouses was intentional and wrongful. 30 C. J. 1122, § 974. Less evidence is necessary to support a judgment of damages for the alienation of the affections of a wife by a stranger to the family than is required when a parent is charged therewith for the reason that parents are recognized as entitled to the privilege of reasonably counseling and advising their children for their welfare. Horowitz v. Sacks, 89 Cal. App. 336, 341, 265 P. 281; 13 Cal. Jur. 903, § 87; 13 R. C. L. 1471, § 522. It is no defense to an action for the alienation of the affections of a spouse that the conduct of the defendant was not the sole cause of the separation and loss of affections. It is sufficient if the defendant's conduct was the procuring or controlling cause of the alienation of affections, although other reasons may have contributed to some extent. 30 C. J. 1125, § 982. It is naturally difficult to prove by direct evidence the purpose and effect of the defendant's conduct upon the affections of a spouse, and circumstantial evidence may therefore be sufficient to establish a case, considered in connection with the natural presumptions and inferences which may be drawn therefrom. 30 C. J. 1144, § 1019; Adkins v. Brett, 184 Cal. 252, 193 P. 251; Mussellem v. Frenn, 101 Okl. 45, 225 P. 370.

In the present case the circumstances are very persuasive that the effect of the conduct of the defendant resulted in procuring or at least in substantially contributing to the alienation of the affections of Mrs. Rogers for her husband, and in causing the ultimate separation of the spouses.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 7230.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 15, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 17, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 14, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations Ⓒ269(1)—Proceedings where work is done on street not acquired at time are not invalid, if land is acquired before judgment is entered (Improvement Act 1911, § 26, as amended by St. 1923, p. 117, § 5).

Under Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 730) § 26, as amended by St. 1923, p. 117, § 5, where work is done on street or right of way not lawfully dedicated or acquired at time, proceedings are not invalid provided land is lawfully dedicated or acquired at any time before judgment is entered in suit involving such proceeding.

2. Constitutional law Ⓒ289—Inclusion of undedicated strip in street improvement does not deny property owners due process of law (Improvement Act 1911, § 21).

Inclusion of undedicated strip in street improvement proceeding does not deny property owners within assessment district due process of law, since if because of failure to acquire necessary rights their property shall be subjected to an invalid assessment, property owners have their legal remedy under Improvement Act, § 21 (St. 1911, p. 743), and general rules of law applicable.

3. Municipal corporations Ⓒ294(3)—Street improvement proceeding held not invalidated by slight departure from statutory requirement as to lettering of notice of improvement.

Street improvement proceeding held not invalidated by slight departure from statutory requirement as to lettering of heading "Notice of Improvement," in that some of letters fell slightly below statutory standard.

4. Municipal corporations Ⓒ294(4)—Notice of street improvement held not defective because of failure to state work and to describe district (Improvement Act 1911, § 5).

Notice of improvement of street held not defective because of failure to state work was to be chargeable upon a district and failure to describe district, since Improvement Act, § 5 (St. 1911, p. 734), makes no such requirement, and, where resolution gave detailed description of district to be benefited and made subject to assessment, notice, with its reference to resolution, thus afforded necessary information.

5. Municipal corporations Ⓒ339(1)—Award of street improvement contract held not objectionable where contractor had reasonable discretion to vary somewhat proportions of sand and rock in order to fill all voids.

Award of street improvement contract, in which specifications for concrete pavements called for one part of Portland cement, two parts of sand, and four parts of broken rock or stone by measure, with proviso that proportions might be changed by contractor whenever voids in materials used were not filled by use of ingredients in specified proportions, held not objectionable, since discretion of contractor to vary somewhat proportions of sand and rock in order to fill all voids was reasonable.

6. Municipal corporations Ⓒ339(2)—Specifications in street improvement contract held not defective because of clause declaring contractor, if requested, should furnish tests of cement made by reliable chemist, such tests to conform to specifications required by American Association of Civil Engineers.

Specifications in street improvement contract held not defective because of clause in relation to cement for use in concrete pavements, declaring that contractor, if requested by engineer, should furnish tests of cement made by some reliable chemist, such tests to conform to specifications required by American Association of Civil Engineers, where specifications required that all cement should be Portland cement, and should be delivered as specified and be kept dry.

7. Municipal corporations ⇨339(1)—In specifications of street improvement contract, details regarding implements used and material to cover pavement held properly left to engineer's judgment.

In specifications of street improvement contract, details of implements for mixing materials and regarding material to be used in covering concrete pavements during curing process held properly left to expert judgment of engineer as supervising officer.

8. Municipal corporations ⇨339(2)—Provision of street improvement contract requiring concrete pavements to be not less than thickness shown in plans held not invalid.

Provision of street improvement contract requiring concrete pavements to be "not less than thickness shown in plans, after being thoroughly tamped," held not invalid, where contractor was required to keep upon the work a copy of plans and specifications available at all times to engineer.

9. Municipal corporations ⇨339(2)—Clause of specifications in street improvement contract requiring contractor to furnish work or material unintentionally omitted in description but necessary held not objectionable.

In specifications of street improvement contract, clause stating that "any work or material which may have been unintentionally omitted in description of work, but which is clearly necessary for proper prosecution of contract, shall be furnished by contractor, the same as if it had been specified" held not objectionable.

10. Municipal corporations ⇨319—Objections to specifications not presented to town council in protest against proceeding with street improvement were waived (Improvement Act 1911, § 16).

Objections to specifications not made in protest presented to town council under Improvement Act, § 16 (St. 1911, p. 737), against proceeding with street improvement, were waived, and injunction to restrain work would not issue upon grounds not stated in protest.

11. Municipal corporations ⇨331—Notices inviting sealed bids on street improvement held sufficient, where streets were named and reference was made to resolution of intention for further particulars (Improvement Act 1911, § 9).

Notices inviting sealed bids on street improvement held sufficient, where streets were named and specific reference was made to resolution of intention for further particulars and description of work, and resolution contained all information necessary, since Improvement Act, § 9 (St. 1911, p. 735), makes reference to resolution sufficient for purposes of description.

12. Municipal corporations ⇨335(2)—Notice of award of contract for street improvement held sufficient, though not naming one of streets to be improved (Improvement Act 1911, § 11).

Notice of award of contract for street improvement held sufficient under Improvement Act, § 11 (St. 1911, p. 736), though not naming one of streets to be improved, where notice referred to bid and resolution.

JOHNSON, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to enjoin performance of street work at Los Gatos, pursuant to a contract made on May 4, 1928, with the defendant Hanrahan Company under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), supplemented by the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1441). The trial court gave judgment in favor of defendants, and from that judgment appeal was taken by plaintiffs, who are the owners of property within the district assessable for the work. Plaintiffs contend that the proceedings leading up to the award of the contract were insufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the town council to proceed with the improvement.

Among the streets designated for improvement in the resolution of intention and in the notices preceding the award were Royce street, Gray's lane, and Elm street, Gray's lane lying between the other two streets, and all three running from University avenue on the east to Santa Cruz avenue on the west. The three streets are crossed by tracks of the Southern Pacific Company; and, after the contract had been awarded, the town applied to the railroad commission for an order authorizing the widening and improvement of the crossings at the intersection of these streets and the railroad tracks. The commission gave the desired permission for improvement of the crossing at Elm street, but denied the application as to the other two crossings, upon the ground that the volume of traffic at those points did not justify expenditure by the railroad company to the extent involved in the installation of an improved type of crossing.

In such work the railroad company bears the expense of the improvements within lines set two feet outside of the outermost rails; and both the resolution of intention and the notices described the proposed improvement so as to exclude from the public contract awarded to the Hanrahan Company the crossing work within the lines drawn as just stated. It appears, however, that at Gray's lane some widening of the street will be necessary, and that, in addition to the land already dedicated for street purposes, the city will need to acquire and has included in the portion of Gray's lane, as described in the contract, a strip 5.7 feet wide by 27.6 feet long, said to belong to the railroad company.

It is contended that the inclusion of this strip in the public contract renders the contract void, and it is further contended that certain alleged defects in the legal notices and certain alleged shortcomings in the specifications were serious enough to deprive the town council of jurisdiction to charge upon property owners the expense of the proposed improvements.

[1, 2] So far as the undedicated strip of land is concerned, it is quite possible that the town may acquire the necessary rights there to either by dedication or otherwise before any assessment is imposed. And under section 26 of the Act of 1911, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 117, § 5), though work is done on a street or right of way not lawfully dedicated or acquired at the time, the proceedings are not to be held invalid, provided the land is lawfully dedicated or acquired at any time before judgment is entered in the suit involving such proceeding. If, because of failure to acquire the necessary rights, plaintiffs' property shall be subjected to an invalid assessment, plaintiffs will have their legal remedy under section 21 and the general rules of law applicable under such circumstances. The inclusion of the undedicated strip does not result, therefore, in denying to plaintiffs due process of law. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 359, 80 P. 81; Watkinson v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 55, 58, 186 P. 753; Noyes v. Chambers, 202 Cal. 542, 544, 261 P. 1006.

It appears further that the plaintiffs did not deem this objection to be of sufficient merit to receive specific mention in the notice which they filed with the council under section 16 of the act, protesting against the award of the contract. In that notice plaintiffs contented themselves with the general objection that the council never acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the proceeding.

Plaintiffs rely upon Spaulding v. Wesson, 115 Cal. 441, 47 P. 249, and Hall v. Fairchild Co., 66 Cal. App. 615, 227 P. 649. The former, having been decided long before the amendment of 1923, is not now applicable to the situation found here, and in the Hall Case the area in question formed part of a public park which could not legally be withdrawn for highway purposes. Accordingly the assessment in that case was beyond cure.

We are of the opinion that the legal rights of plaintiffs are fully protected under the provisions of the act as it read at the time of the proceedings in question.

[3] Another objection made relates to the heading of the posted "Notice of Improvement." The law requires such heading to be in letters of not less than one inch in length. Some of the letters fell slightly below this standard, but the trial court found that the letters were of sufficient height and size so that the words "Notice of Improvement" could be easily read by a person of average eyesight, at a distance of 45 feet (about the width of a street), and that there was a substantial compliance with the legal requirement in that particular. All the letters in this case were larger than those in Coleman v. Spring Construction Co., 41 Cal. App. 201, 182 P. 473, where the notice, being found sufficiently legible, was held to be in substantial compliance with the law. So also in McCaleb v. Dreyfus, 156 Cal. 204, 210, 103 P. 924, stress is laid on legibility rather than on literal compliance with the statute. In view of the finding of the trial court, we conclude therefore that the proceedings were not invalidated by the slight departure from the statutory requirement as to the lettering. Beck v. Ransome-Crummey Co., 42 Cal. App. 674, 682, 184 P. 431.

[4] It is urged further that the notice of improvement was defective because of failure to state that the work was to be chargeable upon a district and to describe the district. Section 5 of the act makes no such requirement. It directs that there shall be a brief statement of the work proposed, with reference to the resolution of intention for further particulars. The resolution gives a detailed description of the district to be benefited and made subject to assessment. The notice, with its reference to the resolution, thus afforded the necessary information.

[5] An additional objection to the award of the contract is based on the ground that the specifications are defective because of indefiniteness in requirements concerning materials and also because of unlawful discretion conferred upon the contractor. The specifications for concrete pavements call for one part of Portland cement, two parts of sand, and 4 parts of broken rock or stone by measure, with the proviso that the proportions may be changed by the contractor whenever the voids in the materials used are not filled by use of the ingredients in the specified proportions. But it is also stated that a cubic yard of concrete in place shall contain not less than 6 sacks of cement. And the specifications contain likewise detailed provisions concerning the kind, quality, and condition of the sand and stone, and the sizes of the meshes through which those materials must be screened to assure general uniformity.

It thus appears that the contractor is required to furnish materials definitely described and to mix them ordinarily in the fixed proportions with a view to having a serviceable pavement with all voids filled. —It was recognized, however, that occasionally, in order to fill all voids, it might be necessary to vary somewhat the proportions of sand and rock so as to procure the right density and make a durable pavement. The contractor has no discretion to depart from the specifications determining the condition and quality of the materials, and since the purpose is to assure, through intelligent exercise of discretion, an admixture making a pavement free of the voids which are apt to occur in any such work because of occasional variation in uniformity of one or another of the ingredients, there is not that vice in the specifications which the law condemns. It is, of course, desirable to have all details precisely fixed so far as reasonably possible, but allowance must be made in practice for contingencies bound to arise in every piece of actual construction. Some modicum of discretion must therefore in sound reason be conceded, and, though a measure of practical judgment is exercised by the contractor, the property owners are safeguarded by the requirement of fulfillment of the contract under the direction, and to the satisfaction, of the city engineer. There is nothing to indicate that the discretion authorized will have any bearing on the cost of the work proposed or any appreciable effect upon the assessments. Public contracts, as well as private contracts, must be dealt with in a practical way. They are intended to get beneficial results, and, while the property owners' rights must be protected by due legal procedure and such definiteness and certainty in plans and specifications as will guard against jerry-building and dishonesty, the tendency to strain at gnats is to be deprecated. The discretion authorized in this instance is reasonable, and is justified by the views expressed in Mill Valley v. Massachusetts Bonding Co., 68 Cal. App. 372, 380, 229 P. 891; Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 364, 80 P. 81; Haughwout v. Hubbard, 131 Cal. 675, 679, 63 P. 1078; Thoits v. Byxbee, 34 Cal. App. 226, 234, 167 P. 166; Burnham v. Abrahamson, 21 Cal. App. 248, 258, 259, 131 P. 338; Burns v. Casey, 13 Cal. App. 154, 168, 109 P. 94.

[6] Defectiveness in the specifications is charged also because of a clause, in relation to the cement for use in concrete pavements, declaring that the contractor, if requested by the engineer, shall furnish tests of cement made by some reliable chemist, such tests to conform to specifications required by the American Association of Civil Engineers. This, however, is not the only provision concerning such cement. Immediately preceding the clause criticized appears the following: "All cement shall be Portland Cement. It shall be delivered in original unbroken barrels or bags, with the name and brand of the manufacturer plainly marked. It must be perfectly dry and free from lumps, and when stored must be protected from the weather and moisture of the ground." Portland cement is a standard commodity, and the products of the different manufacturers are known to builders and engineers. There is nothing in the language used making it mandatory upon the engineer to demand tests, but as a matter of precaution the contractor is obligated to furnish tests if called for. In relation to cement for use in the construction of sidewalks and curbs, the provision is that "The cement used must be Portland Cement meeting the requirements and tests of the Standard specifications for Portland Cement adopted by the American Society of Testing Materials." There is nothing in the record to indicate that the specifications of the organizations mentioned are not commonly accepted as trustworthy standards, and there is no good reason why general trade usages should not enter into public contracts as well as private. If the engineer may satisfy himself by tests "made by some reliable chemist," and those tests are "to conform to specifications required" in the one case by the American Association of Civil Engineers and in the other by the American Society of Testing Materials, it is fair to conclude that "reliable chemists" in general, as well as engineers and contractors, are thoroughly familiar with the specifications intended. We find no merit in the objection.

[7] The specifications are assailed further because the type of implements for mixing materials is made subject to the approval of the engineer. There is a provision that materials shall be mixed in a batch mixer or a pug mill mixer approved by the engineer, and that, if the latter sort is used, the paddles shall be of the number and type approved by the engineer. Such matters are mere operative details properly committed to the judgment of the engineer as the supervising officer. Thoits v. Byxbee, 34 Cal. App. 226, 234, 235, 167 P. 166; Burns v. Casey, 13 Cal. App. 154, 158, 109 P. 94. The same may be said concerning the attack upon the provision in relation to the curing of concrete pavements, which on being laid are to be covered with not less than two inches of earth or other material approved by the engineer, and kept wet for at least ten days. The "other material" does not enter into construction any more than the earth, if used. It is a mere temporary protective device, and the substitution may properly be left to the expert judgment of the engineer. Mills v. City of Elsinore, 93 Cal. App. 753, 769, 270 P. 224.

[8] Another provision which is said to make for invalidity is that in relation to the concrete pavement, which is required to be "not less than the thickness shown in the plans, after being thoroughly tamped." This is a hypercritical objection. The specifications refer repeatedly to the plans on file, and the plans and the specifications are to be read together; the contractor being required to "keep upon the work a copy of the plans and specifications" available at all times to the engineer.

[9] Under the head of "General Requirements," the specifications contain a clause stating that "any work or material which may have been unintentionally omitted in the description of the work, but which is clearly necessary for proper prosecution of the contract, shall be furnished by the Contractor, the same as if it had been specified." Criticism is leveled, not at the purpose or effect of the clause, but at the use of the words "unintentionally omitted," without designation of an arbiter. The clause is merely included as a general rule of interpretation of the plans and specifications; the clear intent being to declare that all the incidents to the performance of a workmanlike job are to be deemed incorporated, whether expressly mentioned or not. We apprehend that similar provisions are included in almost every such set of specifications as a precaution against disputes over trivial matters. The provision cannot justly be condemned.

[10] Though plaintiffs presented to the town council, under section 16 of the act, a protest against proceeding with the improvement, none of the various objections now made to the specifications was included in their protest. Therefore, according to the express provision of the section, the objections were waived, and injunction to restrain the work will not issue upon grounds not stated in any protest. Blake v. City of Eureka, 201 Cal. 643, 648, 258 P. 945; Brydon v. City of Hermosa Beach, 93 Cal. App. 615, 624, 270 P. 255.

[11] All preliminary proceedings having been duly had, the council acquired jurisdiction to order the improvement. It thereupon passed a resolution to that effect, ordering at the same time posting and publication of notices inviting sealed bids. It is contended, though not seriously, that these notices were deficient in their indication of the character of the work to be done and the district to be affected. The streets were named and specific reference was made to the resolution of intention for further particulars and a description of the work. The resolution contained all the information which plaintiffs would have included in the notices, and section 9 of the act expressly makes reference to the resolution sufficient for purposes of description of the improvement and the assessment district. The notices therefore complied with the law.

[12] Hanrahan Company, having been the lowest bidder, received the award of the contract. Notice of the award was then given, but in the notice one of the streets to be improved, Wilder avenue, was, through inadvertence, not named. The notice of award, referred, however, to the bid on file, to the resolution of award, and also to the resolution of intention for a description of the work and the particulars thereof. Section 11 of the act makes no specific requirement as to the contents of the notice of award, and, since it was not essential that such notice should recite the names of the streets, we are of the opinion that the reference to the resolutions previously adopted and the bid of the successful contractor charged the property owners with notice of the extent of the work actually included in the contract as awarded.

This objection was really the only one now made which was specifically embodied in the protest presented by plaintiffs to the council, and reliance is placed upon the decision in McNutt v. Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 245, 201 P. 592, dealing with the concurrent improvement and change of grade of a tunnel and adjacent streets under the act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 954). Under section 3 of that act, however, it was made the express duty of the city clerk to mail to each property owner in the assessment district a notice of the passage of the resolution of intention "with the name of the street to be improved and between what streets located." There being in the act of 1911 no such mandatory direction to name streets in the notice of award, the case cited is inapplicable.

We have given consideration to the several objections urged by plaintiffs, notwithstanding the fact that these objections, with one exception, had all been waived by failure to present them in the protest to the town council. Our conclusion is that the notices given were in substantial compliance with the law; that the specifications possess legal definiteness and certainty; that the council was invested with jurisdiction to order the work; and that the contract therefor was legally awarded and made.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Libel and slander §21—To render writing libelous, words must be published concerning plaintiff, and understood by third person to have concerned him.

To render writing libelous, it is necessary that words should have been published concerning plaintiff, and understood by at least one third person to have concerned him, since defamatory words, to be actionable, must refer to some ascertained or ascertainable person, and that person must be plaintiff.

Whether words used in writing and libelous in themselves were spoken of and concerning plaintiff under Code Civ. Proc. § 460, dispensing with the inducement and colloquium, is issuable fact, and, if denied, must be established at trial.

3. Libel and slander ☞86(2)—If words written are not libelous in themselves, or have some occult meaning or local signification, meaning showing them actionable must be alleged and averred (Code Civ. Proc. § 460).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 460, dispensing with inducement and colloquium, and requiring only allegation that libelous words were spoken of and concerning plaintiff, if words charged are libelous in themselves, if words used are not libelous in themselves, or have some occult meaning or local signification, and require proof to determine their meaning or show libelous nature, such allegation of their meaning must be made as will show them actionable and by averment to ascertain that to court which is generally or doubtfully expressed.

4. Libel and slander ☞86(2)—Notwithstanding statute dispensing with inducement and colloquium in libel action, averments necessary to show meaning of words must still be made (Code Civ. Proc. § 460).

Though Code Civ. Proc. § 460, dispenses with inducement and colloquium in action for libel, averments necessary in common-law pleading to show meaning of words must still be made.

Notice of cancellation of automobile policy for nonpayment of premium, containing nothing exposing broker soliciting insurance to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or causing him to be shunned or avoided, or which had tendency to injure him in his occupation, held not libelous per se, in view of Civ. Code, § 45, defining libel.

7. Libel and slander ☞15—Cancellation notice for nonpayment of insurance premium, when viewed in light of extrinsic facts alleged in inducement and innuendo, held not to charge broker with embezzlement so as to render notice libelous (Pen. Code, § 503).

Cancellation notice for nonpayment of premium on automobile insurance policy, when viewed in light of extrinsic facts alleged in inducement and innuendo, merely showing that plaintiff collected premium from insured, and that insurer or its agent failed to receive, and not directly or inferentially showing that plaintiff was entrusted with, premium, or fraudulently appropriated it, held not to charge plaintiff with embezzlement so as to render notice libelous, in view of Pen. Code, § 503, defining embezzlement.

8. Libel and slander ☞86(1)—Where written words are not actionable per se, innuendo cannot introduce meaning broader than words naturally bear under facts alleged in inducement.

Where words used in writing are not actionable per se, innuendo can only interpret their meaning, but cannot introduce meaning broader than words naturally bear, in view of facts alleged in inducement.

9. Libel and slander ☞86(1)—Written words bearing but one meaning which is obviously not defamatory cannot be made so by innuendo.

Where words used in writing can bear but one meaning, and that is obviously not defamatory, no innuendo can make such words defamatory.

10. Libel and slander ☞123(2)—Where writing and inducement do not support innuendo, whether in light of existing facts writing is libelous is question for court.

Where writing alleged to be libelous, together with inducement, do not support innuendo, it is for court to determine whether, in light of existing facts, alleged writing can be libelous, and, if in light of existing facts writing is not fairly susceptible of defamatory meaning sought to be attributed to it, complaint fails to state cause of action.

11. Libel and slander ☞123(2)—If alleged libelous article is capable of two meanings, cause of action is stated, and sense in which language was used and understood is for jury.

If language of writing is capable of two meanings, one of which is harmless and the other libelous, and it is alleged that same was used and understood as conveying latter meaning, cause of action is stated, and it is for jury to determine in which sense language was used and understood.

Appeal from a judgment given in an action for libel for failure to amend after the demurrer to the amended complaint had been sustained. Since the four causes of action set forth in such complaint are alike in form and substance except only as to the recipient of the respective notices and the amount therein stated as due, it will be sufficient, for the present purposes as suggested by counsel, to consider only the sufficiency of the first cause of action. As to the publication of the alleged libel it alleges "that the defendant * * * published, declared and circulated of and concerning the plaintiff by depositing in the United States mail, with postage thereon, directed and addressed to the Western States Life Insurance Company the following written, libelous and defamatory communication in words and figures, to-wit:

"Provident Fire Insurance Co.

"By Watson & Taylor, General Agents."

Defendant urges that its demurrer was properly sustained because the notice is not libelous, as (1) it does not refer to plaintiff either directly or by reference, and (2) it does not constitute any charge against him.

[1-4] As to the first point, it is necessary that the words should have been published concerning the plaintiff, and should have been understood by at least one third person to have concerned him. De Witt v. Wright, 57 Cal. 576; Nidever v. Hall, 67 Cal. 79, 7 P. 136. "Defamatory words to be actionable must refer to some ascertained or ascertainable person, and that person must be plaintiff (citing Rhodes v. Naglee, 66 Cal. 677 [6 P. 863]; De Witt v. Wright, supra; Skrocki v. Stahl, 14 Cal. App. 1 [110 P. 957]). If the words used really contain no reflection upon any particular individual, no averment can make them defamatory. It is not necessary that plaintiff should be mentioned by name if the words used in describing the person meant can be shown to have referred to him and to have been so understood (citing Peterson v. Rasmussen, 47 Cal. App. 694 [191 P. 30])." 36 Cyc. 1159. Plaintiff claims that the apparent deficiency of reference to him in the notice is supplied, in accordance with section 460 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by his allegation that the defendant published "of and concerning the plaintiff" the above notice. "By this provision" (referring to said section) "the inducement and colloquium are dispensed with, and, if the words charged are libelous in themselves, the plaintiff is only required to allege that the libelous words were spoken 'of and concerning the plaintiff.' This is an issuable fact, as was the colloquium under the former system, and, if denied, must be established at the trial. If the words used are not libelous in themselves, or if they have some occult meaning or local signification, and require proof to determine their meaning, or to show that they are libelous, or if they are words in a foreign language, it is necessary to make such allegation of their meaning as will show them to be actionable, and by averment 'to ascertain that to the court which is generally or doubtfully expressed.' Van Vechten v. Hopkins, 5 Johns. [N. Y.] 220 [4 Am. Dec. 339]. 'The statute dispenses with them (that is, the colloquium and innuendo) only so far as they show that the defamatory words applied to the plaintiff, and goes no further. The averments necessary in common-law pleading to show the meaning of the words must still be made.' Bliss, Code Pl. § 305. See, also, Fry v. Bennett, 5 Sand. [7 N. Y. Super. Ct.] 54; Petsch v. Dispatch P. Co., 40 Minn. 291, 41 N. W. 1034; McLaughlin v. Russell, 17 Ohio, 479; Wesley v. Bennett, 5 Abb. Prac. [N. Y.] 498; Pike v. Van Wormer, 5 How. Prac. [N. Y.] 171; Cook v. Rief, [20 Jones & S.] 52 N. Y. Super. Ct. 302." Harris v. Zanone, 93 Cal. 65, 28 P. 845, 846. If the language of the notice is libelous in itself, this allegation is sufficient (Rhodes v. Naglee, supra; Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 64 P. 290; Bohan v. Record Pub. Co., 1 Cal. App. 429, 82 P. 634; Skrocki v. Stahl, supra; Peterson v. Rasmussen, supra), but, if it is not, the extrinsic facts which make it libelous must be alleged (Schomberg v. Walker, supra).

[5, 6] A consideration of this question as to whether the language is libelous in and of itself necessarily involves a consideration of the second point urged by the defendant, that is, the notice does not constitute any charge against the plaintiff. If the language of the notice is fairly included within the definition of libel, given in section 45 of the Civil Code, it is libelous per se. Tonini v. Cevasco, 114 Cal. 266, 46 P. 103; Schomberg v. Walker, supra; Stevens v. Snow, 191 Cal. 58, 214 P. 968; Maher v. Devlin, 203 Cal. 270, 263 P. 812.

Since there is nothing in the notice itself, especially in absence of reference to the plaintiff or any charge against him, which exposes him to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation, it is obvious that the notice is not libelous per se. "To constitute a libel, it is not necessary that there be a direct and specific allegation of improper conduct, as in a pleading. The charge may be either expressly stated or implied, and in the latter case the implication may be either apparent from the language used, or of such a character as to require the statement and proof of extrinsic facts (inducement, colloquium, and innuendo) to show its meaning. In the last case, proper allegations and proofs of the facts necessary to make the meaning of the language apparent will be required. Otherwise, whether the charge be directly made or merely implied, the publication, without averment, colloquium, or innuendo, will in itself constitute a libel." Schomberg v. Walker, supra, at page 227 of 132 Cal., 64 P. 290, 291.

"Where the words are actionable in themselves, there is no occasion for inducement to be alleged; but, where the words are not actionable, they may be made so by the inducement, and it is then no more necessary to allege special damages than where the words are actionable in themselves. So long as they are made actionable by appropriate pleading, it is immaterial whether this comes about through the words themselves or through the words coupled with the inducement.

"Words not actionable in themselves may be made so by a colloquium and proper averments. Newell, Defam. pp. 603, 613, citing Stancell v. Pryor, 25 Ga. 40. It is the office of the inducement to narrate the extrinsic circumstances which, coupled with the language published, affect its construction, and render it actionable, where, standing alone, and not thus explained, the language would appear either not to concern the plaintiff, or, if concerning him, not to affect him injuriously. Townsh. Sland. & L. p. 554, and notes." Jarman v. Rea, 137 Cal. 339, 345, 70 P. 216, 218.

"The rule which governs the action for libel in such cases is perfectly well settled. Words, which on their face appear to be entirely harmless, may, under certain circumstances, convey a covert meaning, wholly different from the ordinary and natural interpretation put upon them. To render such words actionable, it is necessary for the pleader to aver that the author of the libel intended them to be understood, and that they were in fact understood by those who read them, in their covert sense." Maynard v. Fireman's Fund Co., 47 Cal. 208; Edwards v. San Jose, etc., Publishing Soc., 99 Cal. 435, 37 Am. St. Rep. 70, 34 P. 128; Ingraham v. Lyon, 105 Cal. 257, 38 P. 892." Ervin v. Record Publishing Co., 154 Cal. 79, 81, 97 P. 21, 22, 18 L.

R. A. (N. S.) 622. See, also, Nidever v. Hall, supra.

[7] By way of inducement, the amended complaint alleges the following extrinsic facts: That the Western States Life Insurance Company was a client of plaintiff, with whom he had transacted insurance business as broker, that the policy of insurance, referred to in the notice, was solicited, obtained, and secured by him, and he brokeraged the policy through the defendant, that is to say, the defendant, as general agent, wrote the policy in the Provident Fire Insurance Company and delivered it to plaintiff, who delivered it to the Western States Life Insurance Company and, at the same time, collected the premium, and prior to the notice he remitted to defendant the premium, less his brokerage. By way of innuendo (i. e., meaning), the complaint further alleges defendant published the notice "for the purpose of conveying to and advising the Western States Life Insurance Company that this plaintiff was a defaulter and that he had committed the crime of embezzlement and the same did charge and declare that he had in truth and in fact embezzled the said sum of Fifty-four dollars and $35\frac{100}{100}$ (\$54.35), all of which was false and wholly untrue and known to be false and untrue by the defendant herein at the time of the publication of the same; that defendant, by the publication of said libel, intended and did charge that plaintiff had converted said premium to his own use and that he, the said plaintiff, embezzled said money; that defendant, in the publication of said libelous communication, intended that the same should be understood by said Western States Life Insurance Company * * * to charge this plaintiff with the crime of embezzlement and that the said Western States Life Insurance Co., * * * did understand and believed said libelous communication as charging and intending to charge plaintiff with the crime of embezzlement."

The rule of construction to be applied to the complaint is well stated in Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 270, 274, 11 P. 713, 715, as follows:

"In the interpretation to be placed upon language charging the publication of a libel, a court of justice is to put such construction upon the words which it contains as may be derived 'as well from the expressions used as from the whole scope and apparent object of the writer.' Spencer v. Southwick, 10 Johns. [N. Y.] 259; Cooper v. Greeley, 1 Denio [N. Y.] 358.

"And not only is the language employed to be regarded with reference to the actual words used, but according to the sense and meaning, under all the circumstances attending the publication, which such language may fairly be presumed to have conveyed to those to whom it was published; so that in such cases the language is uniformly to be regarded with what has been its effect, actual or presumed, and its sense is to be arrived at with the help of the cause and occasion of its publication.

"And in passing upon the sufficiency of such language as stating a cause of action, a court is to place itself in the situation of the hearer or reader, and determine the sense or meaning of the language of a complaint for libelous publication according to its natural and popular construction. Townsh. Sland. § 133."

"It is not required that the facts should be set forth with all the technicality or precision of an indictment, if the crime be imputed in the ordinary language usually employed to denote it in lay conversation." Jarman v. Rea, supra, at page 345 of 137 Cal., 70 P. 216, 218. See, also, Schomberg v. Walker, supra; Carl v. McDougal, 43 Cal. App. 279, 184 P. 885. "Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Pen. Code, § 503. Applying a liberal construction (Ingraham v. Lyon, 105 Cal. 254, 38 P. 892), the most that appears from the notice, viewed in the light of the extrinsic facts alleged, is that plaintiff collected the premium from his client, and that the Provident Fire Insurance Company or defendant as its agent failed to receive it. There is nothing, either directly or inferentially, to show that plaintiff was intrusted with the premium or fraudulently appropriated it. In short, no words are used in the notice which, even if construed by aid of the extrinsic facts, remotely charge embezzlement.

[8-11] But, in the innuendo, the complaint alleges that defendant, by the notice, meant to charge plaintiff with that crime, and was so understood by the Western States Life Insurance Company. As the words in the notice are not actionable per se, the innuendo may only interpret their meaning, but cannot introduce a meaning broader than the words naturally bear in view of the facts alleged in the inducement. Grand v. Dreyfus, 122 Cal. 58, 54 P. 389. Where the words can bear but one meaning, and that is obviously not defamatory, no innuendo can make the words defamatory. Pollock v. Evening Herald Pub. Co., 28 Cal. App. 786, 154 P. 30; Des Granges v. Crall, 27 Cal. App. 313, 149 P. 777. Since the notice, together with the inducement, do not support the innuendo, the following rule is applicable: "It cannot be disputed that it is for the court to determine whether, in the light of such extrinsic facts as are alleged the writing can be a libel. If, in the light of such extrinsic facts, the article is not fairly susceptible of the defamatory meaning sought to be attributed to it, the complaint fails to state a cause of action. Of course, if the language of the article is capable of two meanings, one of which is harmless and the other libelous, and it is alleged that the same was used and understood as conveying the latter meaning, a cause of action is stated, and it is the province of the jury to determine in which sense the language was used and understood by the readers of the article. But it is for the judge to determine whether the language used is capable of the defamatory meaning claimed for it by the plaintiff. See Van Vactor v. Walkup, 46 Cal. 124, 133." Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 593, 140 P. 277, 279, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 766; Maher v. Devlin, 203 Cal. 270, 263 P. 812.

Since the demurrer was good upon both points, the trial court properly sustained it, and therefore the judgment is affirmed.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 833 et al. v.
AMERICAN FARMS CO.★
Sac. 4134.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 24, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 20, 1930.

- 1. Torts ⇨21—One contributing to damage is liable, though his proportional contribution cannot be accurately measured.

One who contributes to a damage cannot escape liability because his proportional contribution to the result may not be accurately measured.

- 2. Waters and water courses ⇨177(1)—Some damage must be shown to enjoin drainage of water through drainage districts' ditches.

Before injunction against drainage of water from defendant's rice lands through plaintiff drainage districts' canals and drainage ditches is authorized, some damage must be shown.

- 3. Waters and water courses ⇨177(1)—Drainage districts held not entitled to injunction against drainage from rice lands through their ditches on ground that increased flowage, not shown to be contemplated, will cause injuries to lands, for which they will be liable.

Drainage districts held not entitled to injunction against drainage of water from defendant's rice lands through their canals and ditches on ground that increased use of natural water courses by defendant for such purposes will cause recurrence of flooding and injuries to basin lands, for which plaintiffs will be liable under contracts with landowners and previous injunctive order, in absence of showing that any such increase in rice production as to cause such increased flowage is contemplated or threatened by defendant or other rice growers.

- 4. Property ⇨7—Owner may use property as he pleases, so long as he does not injure others (Civ. Code, § 3514).

The maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas," incorporated in Civ. Code, § 3514, implies that one may make any use of his own property which he pleases, so long as he does not injure others.

- 5. Waters and water courses ⇨162—Rice grower may discharge drainage waters by natural courses on its land as against drainage districts diverting them into their ditches.

Rice grower, in reasonable enjoyment of its own land, may use natural waterways thereon as conduits for discharge of drainage waters, as against drainage districts complaining of drainage thereof through their canals and ditches.

- 6. Waters and water courses ⇨179(4)—Drainage districts held not entitled to injunction against natural drainage from defendant's rice lands into their ditches, in absence of showing of injury or threatened injury to their works.

Drainage districts held not entitled to injunction against drainage of water from defendant's rice lands by natural water courses thereon through districts' canals and ditches, in absence of showing of injury or threatened injury to plaintiffs' works or property, though court's finding that there was no evidence that any waters drained from defendant's land ever reached plaintiffs' works was contrary to expert testimony based on physical facts, in view of finding, supported by evidence, that such waters could reach plaintiffs' works only by artificial diversion thereof by plaintiffs themselves.

- 7. Waters and water courses ⇨177(1)—Drainage districts held not entitled to injunction against drainage from defendant's rice lands through their ditches on theory that it may ripen into easement (St. 1903, p. 291, as amended; St. 1885, p. 204, as amended).

Drainage districts, created under St. 1903, p. 291, as amended, and St. 1885, p. 204, as amended, are public corporations, and hence not entitled to injunction against drainage of water from defendant's rice lands through districts' canals and ditches, on theory that defendant's use of their works may ripen into easement, since private rights may not be acquired by prescription in or to property devoted to public use.

SHENK, J.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment for the defendant in an action to enjoin the drainage of water from the defendant's rice lands through the canals and drainage ditches and over the easements of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiff reclamation district No. 833 withdrew from the action after its commencement, and the action was thereafter prosecuted by the plaintiffs drainage district No. 100 of Butte county and Butte Creek drainage district, both of which are duly created, and existing drainage districts under the laws of the state of California. St. 1903, p. 291, as amended; St. 1885, p. 204, as amended. When the word "plaintiffs" is used herein, it will refer to the two drainage districts participating in the trial.

The lands within the exterior boundaries of the plaintiffs drainage districts, comprising some 55,000 acres, are devoted mainly to rice culture and are situated in Glenn and Butte counties northerly from a lowland called Butte sink or basin, which lies within Colusa and Sutter counties. Butte creek is a natural water course flowing southerly through the lands of Butte Creek drainage district and around the westerly side of Butte basin and empties into Butte slough, which lies south of the basin and which in turn empties into the Sacramento river.

The defendant owns land comprising about 2,200 acres in Butte county, situated generally easterly from the lands of the plaintiffs and about fourteen miles northeasterly from Butte basin, but which is not included in any drainage or reclamation district. Several natural waterways, which are normally dry during the late summer months and until the winter rains, have their courses through the defendant's lands and join Cherokee canal at a point about 200 feet below the defendant's southerly boundary. From about that point the Cherokee canal runs in a straight line southwesterly toward Butte creek and Butte basin. It is conceded that the canal has existed for so many years, at least since the eighties, that for the purposes of this controversy it may be considered to be a natural water course (see San Gabriel V. C. Club v. County of Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 392, 397, 188 P. 554, 9 A. L. R. 1200), and it is not questioned that its waters flow into Butte creek at a point above Butte basin.

Rice culture is a comparatively recent agricultural development in the state of California. Prior to the time when it was commenced in the region involved in this controversy, Butte basin, which each year during the rainy season became flooded by the overflow of water from Butte creek, had no continuous outlet to the Sacramento river. Except for evaporation and seepage the waters remained in the basin until the increased flow from Butte creek in the winter season raised the water table so that the waters flowed over the rim of the basin into Butte slough, which carried them to the Sacramento river. No complaint was made by the landowners growing various crops on lands in and bordering the basin until rice was produced on such a scale that the drainage of the irrigation waters from the rice fields so enlarged the volume of waters in Butte creek that a flooding of the basin occurred and damaged and destroyed the unharvested bean and other crops of farmers in and around the basin. As a result the growers of general crops in 1919 obtained a judgment in the superior court of Colusa county enjoining the rice growers from emptying their drainage waters into Butte basin to the injury of the complaining owners of lands in and near the basin. Consequently the plaintiffs and other districts were formed for the purpose of constructing works to divert the drainage waters to the Sacramento river without injury to neighboring farmers. To accomplish the purposes for which they were organized, the districts purchased rights of way and other easements to construct ditches, canals, cuts, weirs, levees, etc. The principal works involved herein are a canal which diverts water from Butte creek at a point at the upper end of the basin, called Butte Creek drain, and a cut, known as Moulton cut, and appropriate levees at the lower end of the basin designed to drain waters from the basin into Butte slough and on to the Sacramento river. By contract with various gun clubs owning lands in the basin, the districts obtained flowage rights over the basin but obligated themselves to maintain a specified level of water in the basin for the benefit of the clubs.

At the time of the former litigation above referred to, the defendant was not engaged in the production of rice except in small quantities in 1915 and 1917 and was not a defendant in any of the proceedings, nor was its land included within any drainage district. Beginning in the year 1921, the defendant has each year produced rice on a larger scale, ranging in amount from 300 to 675 acres, and intends to continue the production of rice on its land to which, according to the evidence, it is best suited, because, like the other land in that region devoted to rice culture, the subsurface is an impervious stratum of hardpan. For the purpose of irrigating its rice fields, the defendant has drilled eight deep wells from which, by means of pumps, it has developed a flow of from 1,600 to 1,900 gallons a minute for each well. In the rotation of its acreage the defendant operates the number of wells, usually two or three, necessary to irrigate the particular portion of its acreage which in that year is planted to rice.

As is well known, rice culture requires that irrigating waters stand on the planted surface throughout the summer months and until the rice has matured and is ready for harvest. The waters are ponded on the surface by artificial ditches or "checks." Naturally some of this water seeps through the ditches and otherwise escapes during the irrigating season. Prior to the harvest, in late September and early October, this large volume of irrigating waters is drained off the surface. The seepage and escaping waters during the irrigating season and the drainage waters from the defendant's lands in the drainage or run-off period are discharged into one or more of the several natural waterways on the defendant's lands which empty into Cherokee canal. There is a constant though shallow stream of water about twenty feet wide in the Cherokee canal during the summer months. This flow comprises the seepage waters flowing or discharged into it from the rice fields along its banks and along the banks of adjacent streams. During the irrigating season there are one or more diversions of water from the Cherokee canal below the defendant's lands. How much, if any, of these seepage waters ultimately reach Butte creek or Butte basin is not shown. During the run-off season, however, it appears that no diversions for irrigating purposes are made, but that all rice growers are engaged in draining the irrigating waters from their fields and that the stream of water in the canal at this period is largely increased and flows into Butte creek, and a certain proportion of it is diverted through Butte creek drain into Butte basin. It was in evidence that the amount of water which escaped from the defendant's lands during the irrigating season varied from two to four second feet and that during the run-off period the volume of water flowing from the defendant's property was from six to ten second feet.

The trial court found that "the portion of said water which is not consumed in such irrigation is drained upon defendant's said land into natural and ancient watercourses only to the extent necessary in the proper, reasonable and careful irrigation of said land, and without flowage or seepage upon any property of plaintiffs and without seepage or flowage out of the natural channels of said ancient watercourses"; that there is no evidence that any of the waters drained from the defendant's lands "ever reached any of the canals, works or easements of the plaintiffs," and that they "could only reach the same by being artificially diverted by the plaintiffs; * * *" that the defendant "intends to continue to drain said irrigation water from its rice land into said natural watercourses, but does not threaten to drain the same into any canals, ditches or easements of the plaintiff districts, and there is no evidence showing that said water has ever in any way damaged said right of way or easements of plaintiffs, or that the same will in any way damage or injure the same, and it is untrue that, if the same should continue, it will ripen into any easement or right against the plaintiffs." The court accordingly concluded that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief.

The main contention of the appellants is that the findings of the court are unsupported by and are contrary to the evidence.

There was no direct oral evidence that any of the water drained into the natural water courses on the defendant's land ever reached the works of the plaintiffs. The reason for this lack of proof is obvious because of the commingling of such drainage waters with like waters of other rice growers farther down the canal and the impossibility of identifying one flow of water from another. The most that could be said by the experts produced on behalf of the plaintiffs was that they "believed" or were of the "opinion" that some of the defendant's drainage water found its way to the plaintiffs' works fifteen or more miles below. This opinion evidence was necessarily based on physical facts. That is to say, if it was shown that more water was turned into the water courses on the defendant's land than could seep away or evaporate before it reached the plaintiffs' works and there was no other outlet, the conclusion based on the law of nature would be that the defendant's drainage water passed to and through the plaintiffs' works. The finding of the court that there was no evidence that any of the waters drained from the defendant's land "ever reached any of the canals, works or easements of the plaintiffs" would seem, therefore, to be contrary to the physical facts. But as bearing upon the plaintiffs' right to an injunction, this finding must be considered in conjunction with the further finding, conclusively established by the evidence, that such drainage waters could reach the plaintiffs' works, if they did at all, only by the artificial diversion thereof by the plaintiffs themselves.

[1-4] It is well settled that one who contributes to a damage cannot escape liability because his proportional contribution to the result may not be accurately measured. Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 P. 872, 21 P. 11; People v. Gold Run D. & M. Co., 66 Cal. 138, 4 P. 1152, 56 Am. Rep. 80. But before an injunction be authorized some damage must be shown, and the finding of the court that there is no evidence showing that the defendant's drainage water has in any way damaged the plaintiffs' works or property is supported by the record. It is claimed, however, that a continued and increased use by the defendant of said natural water courses for drainage purposes will so overtax and burden the plaintiffs' properties that there will be a recurrence of the flooding in and injuries to the basin lands for which, under its contracts and the previous injunctive order of the superior court of Colusa county, the plaintiffs will be liable. However, no showing is made that any such increase in rice production in this region by which such an increase in the quantity of waters flowing into the basin would be provoked is contemplated or threatened either by the defendant or any other growers of rice. In the absence of any such showing, to which the defendant may be found to be a threatening factor, we think the plaintiffs cannot be said to have established a right to injunctive relief. The maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas," which is incorporated in the statute law of this state (Civ. Code, § 3514; see Green v. General Petroleum Corp. [Cal. Sup.] 270 P. 952, 60 A. L. R. 475), implies that one may make any use which he pleases of his own so long as he does not injure others. Galbreath v. Hopkins, 159 Cal. 297, 113 P. 174.

[5, 6] We deem it unnecessary to enter upon a discussion of the principles relating to trespass, negligence, or nuisance. Upon any theory it is clear that as between the parties to this controversy the defendant, in the reasonable enjoyment of its own land, may use the natural waterways on its property as a conduit for the discharge of the rice drainage waters. See 26 Cal. Jur., p. 143, and cases cited. That some of those waters may pass through or over the works of plaintiffs is due to the fact that the plaintiffs have voluntarily come to those points and diverted the water, and the fact that by those voluntary diversions some of the waters may flow over the basin, from the present showing at least, may as well be a benefit as a detriment to the plaintiffs. In the absence of any showing of injury or threatened injury, we conclude that to enjoin the defendant from any reasonable use of the water courses on its land whereby as a consequence its rice drainage waters seep or flow down to and through the works and easements of the plaintiffs would be unduly to restrict the reasonable use to which the defendant is entitled. Whether the result would be otherwise were injury or threatened injury shown is not a question presented nor decided on this appeal.

[7] The plaintiffs are not entitled to injunctive relief on the theory that the defendant's use of its works may ripen into an easement. The plaintiffs are public corporations, and private rights may not be acquired by prescription in or to property owned by them which is devoted to a public use. Central Pacific Co. v. Droge, 171 Cal. 32, 40, 151 P. 663; Patton v. City of Los Angeles, 169 Cal. 521, 147 P. 141; County of Placer v. Lake Tahoe Ry. Co., 58 Cal. App. 764, 783, 209 P. 900; Martin v. City of Stockton, 39 Cal. App. 552, 179 P. 894.

The trial court's finding that there was no evidence of actual or threatened injury is sustained by the evidence and fully supports the judgment herein.

The judgment is affirmed.

Feb. 19, 1930.

1. Brokers ⇨88(3)—Motion for nonsuit in broker's action for commission should have been granted, under evidence showing broker was not procuring cause of sale.

In broker's action for commission where evidence showed that broker did not consummate sale of property, did not have exclusive agency, that he knew owners claimed right to sell property themselves, did not inform owners that he had endeavored to interest purchaser in property, and that owners sold property without knowledge that broker had called it to attention of purchaser, held, that defendants' motion for nonsuit should have been granted.

2. Brokers ⇨49(1)—Merely calling purchaser's attention to property and urging desirability of its purchase is not sufficient to support judgment awarding commissions.

Merely calling attention of a prospective purchaser to property and urging upon him desirability of its purchase is not sufficient basis to support judgment awarding any commissions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County;
Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by W. L. Hill against Edna L. Knight and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

For opinion of the District Court of Appeal, see 276 P. 614.

R. M. Rankin, of Willows, for appellants.
J. L. Royle, of Berkeley, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The judgment for the plaintiff in this cause was reversed by the District Court of Appeal, Third District, Mr. Justice Plummer writing the opinion. A petition for a hearing in this court was granted. After further consideration of the record, we are satisfied with the reasoning and conclusions of the District Court of Appeal, and adopt the same as the opinion of this court. It is as follows:

This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff after motion for new trial had been denied by the court. The action was for recovery of commissions alleged to be due the plaintiff on account of the sale of certain real estate, was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff was a real estate broker doing business in Sonoma county, and on or about the 19th day of November, 1923, the defendants executed and delivered to the plaintiff a writing authorizing the plaintiff, for a period of 30 days, to act as agent in making sale of certain real and personal property described and referred to in said instrument. Time was made the essence of the agreement or authorization, and under its terms it expired 30 days after date. On the 11th day of December, 1923, R. N. Rankin, an attorney for the defendants, acting under instructions from one of them, wrote the plaintiff a letter extending the authorization for 30 days from its expiration date, with the understanding that there was no change in price and that the contract or authorization did not confer any exclusive rights upon the plaintiff. The selling price of the property mentioned in the writing executed and delivered to the plaintiff fixed the real estate at $35,000, which price included all machinery, farm implements, horses, harness, and saddles then on the property. The writing also included an authorization to sell 250 head of cattle, more or less, at $30 per head. The plaintiff was to receive 5 per cent. commission on the selling price of the real estate, and $1 per head for the cattle sold. The terms of sale were also set forth in the authorization, and the real estate, consisting of 2,823.93 acres, sufficiently described by reference to deeds, etc. The record shows that no sale was effected under the authorization to which we have referred, nor during the period of time mentioned in Rankin's letter extending the operation of the agreement for 30 days on and after December 9, 1923. As we have said, time was made the essence of the original agreement. In the extension of the authorization for 30 days mentioned in the letter of Mr. Rankin to the plaintiff, it is specifically set forth that the heirs, which means the persons who executed the authorization, will, if they have the opportunity, sell the property, or that they desire to sell the property. This, of course, is only a statement of a right which the heirs possessed during the entire period of time heretofore mentioned, but constituted a further notice to the plaintiff. No sale of the ranch having been effected, it appears that on or about May 25, 1924, one of the defendants, Mrs. Edna L. Knight, wrote a letter to the plaintiff, which, among other things, contained the following: "In regard to the stock ranch, so far as I know it has never been listed with anyone but yourself and while the heirs would not renew the option, if you consummated a sale, you would be protected in your commission. I think the price would still hold good with the exception of the cattle which of course would be revalued. At present day prices I believe cattle will be worth more money in the near future and then of course we would not sell either ranch or cattle separately. One depends on the other. The only assurance I can give you is that if you sell the property you will be protected in your commission—the price the same as that given you with the exception of the stock as I stated above." In this letter, as shown by the excerpt, it was stated that the heirs would not renew the option; that is, the agreement to which we have referred as having been executed and delivered to the plaintiff on or about the 9th day of November, 1923, authorizing the plaintiff, as agent, to make sale of the property therein mentioned. The letter, however, did state that if the plaintiff consummated a sale, he would be protected in his commission. The information is also imparted in the letter that any sale made by the plaintiff must be of both the ranch and the cattle; that they would not consider separate sales. The record shows that there was no further communication relative to the sale of the property mentioned in the authorization between the plaintiff and any of the defendants. However, on or about the 30th of July, 1924, a little over two months after receipt of the letter to which we have just referred, it appears that the plaintiff had an interview with Richard Deming, Jr., at plaintiff's office in Sonoma county, but did not succeed in effecting a sale. On the 4th day of August thereafter the record shows that Richard Deming, Jr., called on the defendants in relation to buying the real property heretofore referred to, and before any negotiations were had with him by the defendants, they inquired particularly if he had seen the plaintiff, Mr. W. L. Hill, and being informed that he had not, and had had no negotiations with him, the defendants entered into negotiations with Richard Deming, Jr., for the sale of the real estate heretofore referred to and succeeded in selling said property to him for the sum of $32,000. Thereafter, the plaintiff learning of the sale of the real property made demand for payment to him of commissions in the sum of $1,600, and payment being refused, the plaintiff instituted this action.

[1] Upon this appeal it is insisted: First, that the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint should have been sustained; second, that the plaintiff had no written contract for the sale of the premises referred to; third, that the court erred in denying the defendants' motion for nonsuit; and, fourth, that the court erred in its instructions to the jury. For the reasons hereinafter mentioned we do not deem it necessary to consider the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint, nor do we need to consider the terms and conditions of the alleged contract further than to state that the plaintiff was not authorized to make any separate offer of the property mentioned therein. The letter dated May 25, 1924, which must be the basis of this action if plaintiff had any rights whatever, specifically informed the plaintiff that the real estate and the cattle must be sold together, or to use the language of the letter, "one depends on the other." The letter also informed the plaintiff that the price of the stock included in the sale would be a matter of further consideration. In other words, the letter, if it amounted to an authorization at all, simply authorized the plaintiff to offer the property for sale, accept a bid, and refer the same to the defendants, as the selling price of the cattle was not fixed. None of the other defendants herein signed the letter to which we have referred, but it appears that their attorney, in open court, stated in effect that if the letter of May 25, 1924, bound the defendant Mrs. Edna L. Knight, it bound all of the defendants,

It will be noticed, further, that the only promise made to the plaintiff was in the use of these words in the letter referred to, to wit, "if you consummated a sale, you would be protected in your commission."

Did the plaintiff bring himself within the terms of this letter, or even within the terms of the original authorization, and did the court err in denying defendants' motion for a nonsuit? These questions can be answered more readily after setting forth the testimony of the plaintiff concerning all that he did in the matter. The plaintiff testified that he saw Mr. Deming on what is known as and called the Canfield ranch, near Geyserville; that Mr. Deming was contemplating buying that ranch; that thereafter he wrote a letter to Mr. Deming concerning the property belonging to the defendants, and asked Mr. Deming to come to his office. It appears that the ranch known as the Canfield ranch, and the real property known as the Caldwell property, belonging to the defendants, was some distance apart. That in response to the letter just referred to Deming appeared at the office of the plaintiff, and they talked over the ranch belonging to the defendants; that the plaintiff told him who owned it, and "went through the details regarding it." The plaintiff testified that he told Mr. Deming he could see the president of the Chamber of Commerce at Santa Rosa; also, a Mr. Doyle, president of the bank there; he had a mortgage on the place for $12,000. The witness then testified as follows: "And after Mr. Deming spent some two hours in the office he got up and said, 'Well, now I am not interested in the ranch,' he said, 'I don't care to figure on it, and,' he said, 'must find a cheaper ranch'; and I said, 'Well, now, you haven't seen it; I will take you up there and show it to you.' He says, 'No,' he said, 'I would be losing my time as well as yours.' So I disregarded all my data on it and threw it in the wastebasket, and disregarded him. A few days later I learned that Mr. Deming had bought the ranch, so I immediately wired the Purkitt heirs that my man had bought it and I expected to be protected on my commissions. Then I looked up the deeds. It was July 30th, the time that Deming came into my office, and the ranch deal was made on August 4th." While there is testimony in the record showing what Mr. Deming, and also a man by the name of Mr. Adams, who appears to have been interested with Mr. Deming, did after the interview with the plaintiff on July 30th, there is nothing in the record showing that the plaintiff took any further action in relation to the sale of the property mentioned in the original authorization, or in relation to the sale of the real property known as the Caldwell ranch belonging to the defendants. No effort was made by him to communicate with the defendants and inform them that either Richard Deming or Mr. Adams had been in plain-tiff's office, or that he had given them any data or information in relation to the property. The plaintiff appears to have acted in accordance with his own statement, that he disregarded him (referring to Mr. Deming), and threw all his data in the wastebasket. As stated heretofore, the defendants made inquiry of Mr. Deming as to whether he had had any negotiations with the plaintiff Hill, or had seen the plaintiff Hill in relation to the property. We refer to this because it shows that the defendants acted in good faith, and brings them within the language of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the case of Smith v. Kimball, 193 Mass. 582, 79 N. E. 800: "The fact that the plaintiff had failed to persuade the purchaser to take the property at one price, is not of itself evidence which would justify a finding that his services were the operating and efficient cause of a subsequent sale at a somewhat lower price which yet was higher than the plaintiff had succeeded in obtaining. Nor is there any question possible as to the defendants' right to terminate the plaintiff's employment. They could have done this, acting in good faith, even if they had known who the plaintiff's customer was, and then had proceeded to deal with him themselves. (Cadigan v. Crabtree, 179 Mass. 474, 61 N. E. 37, 55 L. R. A. 77, 83 Am. St. Rep. 397.) * * * There is no ground on which it can be said that the defendants in throwing over the plaintiff and themselves dealing directly with A. V. Lincoln, acted in bad faith." (Citing a number of authorities.) "They could not have intended to deprive the plaintiff of his commission; for they did not know that Lincoln had been his customer." Disregarding that portion of the quotation relative to knowledge of the plaintiff's customer, the latter portion of the quotation is directly applicable here. The plaintiff took no means and made no effort to inform the defendants that he had a prospective customer or that he had even mentioned to Richard Deming that the ranch was for sale. The mere fact that the plaintiff called the attention of the property to Richard Deming is not sufficient to enable him to prevail in this action. As said in Naylor v. Ashton, 20 Cal. App. 544, 130 P. 181: "It must further appear that the broker performed the duty assumed by him within the time limited in his contract, or within such extension of time as may have been granted by his employer. If he failed to do that, he is not entitled to the commissions, even though he made efforts to sell property, and first called to it the attention of the party who subsequently made the purchase, unless the delay was caused by the negligence, fault or fraud of the owner"—citing Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 17 P. 642; Ayres v. Thomas, 116 Cal. 140, 47 P. 1013; Ropes v. John Rosenfeld's Sons, 145 Cal. 671, 79 P. 354; Hicks v. Post, 154 Cal. 22, 96 P. 878; Brown v. Mason, 155 Cal. 155, 99 P. 867, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328. To the same effect is the case of Cone v. Keil, 18 Cal. App. 675, 124 P. 548, where it is said: "Merely putting a prospective purchaser on the track of property which is on the market will not suffice to entitle the broker to the commission contracted for, and even though a broker opens negotiations for the sale of the property, he will not be entitled to a commission if he finally fails in his efforts, without fault or interference of the owner, to induce a prospective purchaser to buy or make an offer to buy, notwithstanding that the owner may subsequently, either personally or through the instrumentality of other brokers, sell the same property to the same individual at the price and upon the terms for which the property was originally offered for sale." In Stephens v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 199, 171 P. 811, a case where the owner made sale to a purchaser to whom an agent had mentioned the property, and also where the agent had failed to communicate with the owner and inform the owner that he had called the attention of the property to the person to whom the owner thereafter sold, the court held the agent not entitled to commissions, and in so doing used the following language, which is according to the facts of this case: "There was no evidence that Stephens communicated to her any offer to purchase the property, and in these particulars we think there was a failure of proof necessary to sustain the plaintiff's case. We think the rule is fundamental and well understood that before an agent may be said to have earned a commission he is required to show that he produced to the vendor a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy for the price and upon the terms proposed by the vendor in the agency contract. The alleged agency was in nowise an exclusive agency, and, under the conditions shown, Mrs. Anderson had the right to deal independently with anyone who desired to purchase directly from her," etc.

In the case of Brown v. Mason, 155 Cal. 155, 99 P. 867, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328, a case which we have heretofore cited, the rule is affirmed that an agent, by merely calling the attention of the property to one who subsequently purchases the same, is not entitled to commissions unless there is some fault or fraud on the part of the owner.

In McCoy v. Zahn Corporation, 183 Cal. 191, 191 P. 20, the quotation which we have taken from Cone v. Keil, supra, is set forth and approved.

In the case of Rosenfield v. Wall, 94 Conn. 418, 109 A. 409, 9 A. L. R. 1189, a number of cases are cited affirming the rule which we have set forth, and then, in the annotations to that case, beginning on page 1194 of 9 A. L. R., a number of cases are quoted showing under what circumstances an owner may make sale without being liable to a broker who has performed acts similar to those testified to by the plaintiff in this cause.

The respondent calls our attention to the following language found in 4 California Jurisprudence, 605: "To entitle a broker to his commissions as the procuring cause of a sale, it is not necessary that he should have personally conducted the negotiations between his principal and the purchaser, leading to the sale, nor that he should have been present when the bargain was completed, nor that the principal, at the time, should have known that the purchaser was one found by the broker. It is indispensable, though, that the broker was the procuring cause of the sale, so where it appears that the seller and buyer were for the first time brought together by the broker, duly authorized to act for the seller, and the sale was subsequently consummated by the seller and buyer acting independently of the broker, the broker not having abandoned his agency, and the seller not having revoked the broker's authorization or done any act from which a revocation might be implied, the inference is a reasonable one that the sale, under such circumstances, is effected through the broker's agency as a procuring cause." The respondent relies upon the first sentence of the above quotation, but a reference to the authorities cited in the subjoined note shows that the contracts upon which that statement, or that portion of the quotation is based, were entirely different from the contract under which the plaintiff was acting, assuming that the original authorization was still in full force and effect.

In the case of Justy v. Erro, 16 Cal. App. 519, 117 P. 575, one of the cases cited to support the statement contained in the first sentence which we have quoted from 4 California Jurisprudence, the contract reads as follows: "This contract to remain in force for a period of ninety days from the date hereof and thereafter until written notice is given to cancel, and if sale is made by me or through me during the term of this contract, or after the expiration of the same, to anyone to whom said property has been submitted by said N. P. Justy Company, I agree to pay them 2½ per cent. commission on said sale." Nothing of that kind appears in any of the papers under which the plaintiff in this action purports to have acted.

The next California case cited to support the first sentence of the quotation taken from California Jurisprudence, supra, is that of Briggs v. Hall, 24 Cal. App. 586, 141 P. 1067. The contract, however, in that case reads as follows: "I reserve the right to sell said property myself, or to sell said property through the agency of anyone else, but I hereby agree that in case such sale be made by myself, or through any other agency, in consideration of their services to pay said Lyman & Briggs a commission of 2 per cent on" said sale. Here, again, the facts are entirely different and justify the statement of the law as set forth in California Jurisprudence, supra, upon a state of facts or upon a contract binding the owner to pay under conditions covered by the language found in California Jurisprudence, which contemplates an entirely different state of facts from those disclosed by the record in the case at bar. The last California case cited in support of the theory that the language which we have quoted from California Jurisprudence is applicable here, is that of Levy v. Wolf, 2 Cal. App. 491, 84 P. 313. The court, however, in its opinion recites the following: "In the case at bar, assuming the testimony" of the "plaintiff to be true, the name of the purchaser was given by the broker to the seller, and his offer accepted within the time allowed by the contract, and a sale consummated in accordance with the offer." That case does refer to some cases with reference to which it was said: "It is also urged that plaintiff cannot recover because he neither procured a written agreement from the purchaser, nor introduced him to the seller; and in support of this contention cites Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349 [33 P. 1105], and Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514 [39 P. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87]," and then the opinion adds: "In neither of these cases was a written agreement obtained from the buyer, nor was he introduced to the seller by the broker, nor his name disclosed, nor any sale" in fact made. Then follows the language which we have heretofore quoted. And further on in the same opinion the rule is thus stated: "It is well settled, if the agent introduces or discloses the name of the purchaser, and such introduction or disclosure is the foundation on which negotiations are begun and the sale effected, he will be entitled to commissions, and this too, although in point of fact the sale may be made by the owner. In other words, he cannot avail himself of the services, and, by making a sale through information derived from the agent, deprive the latter of his commissions." Like the other cases, this discloses a state of facts entirely different from those in the case at bar, and renders respondent's statement of the law and citation of authorities inapplicable.

Nor is there anything in the case of Haun v. Rosenmayer, 46 Cal. App. 353, 189 P. 117, which limits the application of the cases which we have heretofore referred to showing that the plaintiff is not entitled to prevail. In the Haun Case we find this statement: "It is not necessary that a broker should personally conduct negotiations between his principal and the purchaser or that he should be present when the bargain is completed; it is sufficient that his efforts are the producing cause of the sale and that through his agency the purchaser is brought into communication with the seller, although the parties then negotiate in person"—citing some of the cases to which we have referred and some of the cases which are based upon contracts providing for the payment of commissions if sale is made to any one to whom the broker has disclosed the property. But the general statement in the case of Haun v. Rosenmayer, while a correct statement of the law, is not all of the law applicable to this case, because in the case at bar the plaintiff, by his own testimony, stopped the negotiations and made no effort to communicate with the defendants the incident of his conference with Richard Deming, Jr., or that Deming might be considered a possible purchaser.

Nor do we find anything in the case of Sessions v. Pacific Imp. Co., a corporation, 57 Cal. App. 1, 206 P. 653, which limits anything stated in the cases which we have referred to showing that mere disclosure of the property is not sufficient upon which to base an action for commissions when the property is thereafter sold by the owner under circumstances such as appear in the case at bar. The Sessions Case is too long to admit of any quotations therefrom.

In view of the fact that the plaintiff's own testimony shows that he did nothing more than has been held insufficient in the case of Cone v. Keil, supra, which case was affirmed in McCoy v. Zahn Corp., supra; that he did not consummate any sale of the property referred to in this action; that he did not have any exclusive agency; that he knew the defendants claimed the right to sell the property themselves; that there was no communication between the plaintiff and the defendants for more than two months after the receipt of the letter under which the plaintiff claimed the right to act; that the plaintiff made no effort to inform the defendants, or any of them, that he had endeavored to interest Richard Deming, Jr., in the purchase of the defendants' property; that the defendants made the sale of the property without any knowledge that the plaintiff had called it to the attention of the purchaser; that the record shows that the defendants acted in entire good faith without any subterfuge, without any attempt to make a sale of the property so as to deprive the plaintiff of commissions; that the record shows no fraud or delay on the part of the defendants; and in further view of the cases which we have cited applicable to the facts involved in this action—we find no escape from the conclusion that the defendants' motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. The fact that the purchaser, after having his attention called to the property belonging to the defendants, may have come to the conclusion that he did not wish to deal with the agent, or that he could drive a better bargain by dealing directly with the owners, does not alter the situation or give the plaintiff any right of action against the defendants.

tions, a general statement in relation thereto will suffice. The jury was instructed upon the theory that the plaintiff, by simply calling the attention of the purchaser to the property and explaining the desirability of its purchase, entitled the plaintiff to a judgment; that such action would constitute a proximate cause, irrespective of whether the vendors, the defendants in this action, had any knowledge that the purchaser was one found by the plaintiff, or that the plaintiff had placed the property in question before the purchaser for consideration, and irrespective of the fact that the sale was consummated by the defendants, when the authority, if any, given to the plaintiff, required him to consummate the sale. Under the facts as disclosed by the record in this case and the contract or authorization under which the plaintiff acted, the California cases which we have cited show that merely calling the attention of a prospective purchaser to the property involved and urging upon him the desirability of its purchase is not sufficient basis to support a judgment awarding any commissions. The cases which we have cited based upon an authorization to a broker such as here presented show the correct theory of the law to be adopted in instructing the jury.

The judgment is reversed.

PRESTON, J.

I dissent.

I think the evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury that plaintiff, acting under a proper authorization, was the procuring cause of the sale.

KEATON et al. v. MUNICIPAL COURT OF LOS ANGELES et al.

L. A. 11849.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 21, 1930.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 260(4)—Serving and filing statement on appeal is essential to perfect appeal from municipal court judgment by giving oral notice (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1468).

To perfect appeal from judgment rendered in municipal court in criminal matters by giving oral notice of appeal, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1468, statement on appeal must be served and filed within five days after oral notice, and failure to do so renders notice of appeal ineffectual for any purpose, and judgment appealed from may be enforced as if no attempt had been made to perfect appeal therefrom.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 260(4)—Where statement on appeal was not filed within 5 days after oral notice, appeal was not perfected so as to defeat appeal by written notice (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1468).

Where oral notice of appeal from conviction in municipal court was not followed by serving and filing of statement on appeal within five days thereafter, appeal was not perfected under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1468, so as to defeat defendant's right under same section to appeal by filing written notice of appeal within fifteen days after judgment, since appeal taken by means of written notice of appeal under such circumstances is not second appeal from judgment, because appeal under oral notice never perfected.

Application by Harry Keaton and another for a writ of mandamus, prayed to be directed to the Municipal Court of Los Angeles, Los Angeles County, and Hon. Caryl M. Sheldon, Judge thereof, to compel settlement of proposed statement on appeal.

Writ granted.

Max Lewis, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Lloyd S. Nix, City Pros., and Joe W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Deputy City Pros., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J.

Petition for writ of mandate directed to the respondent court and to the Honorable Caryl M. Sheldon, the judge of said court, commanding said court to settle and allow a proposed statement on appeal filed by petitioners in said court.

Petitioners were on the 22d day of March, 1929, convicted in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles of the crime of petty theft. On the same day they each gave oral notice of appeal from the judgment of conviction entered against them on said 22d day of March, 1929. The petitioner Love, on March 30, 1929, and the petitioner Keaton, on the 1st day of April, 1929, filed written notice of appeal from said judgment, and on April 3, 1929, petitioners served and filed in said court their proposed statement on appeal from said judgments. Demand has been made upon the respondent court to settle said statement, but respondent has refused to settle said statement or to take any action thereon.

The grounds upon which the respondent court bases its refusal to settle said statement is that, while said statement was filed within five days after the giving of petitioners' written notices of appeal, it was not served or filed within five days after the giving of their oral notice of appeal. This same point was raised and decided adversely to respondent's contention by this court in the recent case of Hansen v. Municipal Court (November 22, 1929), 282 P. 384. Respondent contends that the Hansen Case was erroneously decided, and in support of its contention, cites the following decisions of this court: Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 311; Brown v. Plummer, 70 Cal. 337, 11 P. 631; Tompkins v. Montgomery, 116 Cal. 120, 47 P. 1006; Peo- ple v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 152 Cal. 261, 92 P. 481.

[1, 2] These cases undoubtedly hold, as contended by respondent, that there cannot be two appeals from the same judgment, and that, where the appellant has perfected a valid appeal from a judgment, such appeal vests the appellate court with jurisdiction of the case, and that any proceedings thereafter taken by appellant to take a separate or second appeal from said judgment are ineffectual for any purpose. These authorities, in our opinion, contain correct statements of the law upon the right of a party to take two separate appeals from a judgment against him. We think, however, that they are not applicable to the facts in the present action. While the petitioners gave oral notice of appeal, they did not serve or file any statement on appeal within five days after giving said notice of appeal as provided by section 1468 of the Penal Code. This section prescribes the procedure to be taken in the preparation, service, and filing of statements on appeal from judgments rendered in municipal and justices' courts in criminal matters, and expressly provides that, "if no statement is filed and served as herein provided (that is, within five days after giving notice of appeal), the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose, and shall be deemed dismissed, and the judgment and order appealed from shall be enforced as if no appeal had been taken." By this provision of the statute, the Legislature has made the serving and filing of the statement on appeal an essential and necessary step to be complied with in perfecting an appeal from a judgment of the municipal court. Unless the statement on appeal is served and filed within the five-day period, "the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose." The oral notice of appeal, given by the petitioners, as it was not followed by the serving and filing of a statement on appeal within five days, cannot be regarded as a valid appeal from the judgment so as to defeat the right of petitioners given by said section of the Code to appeal by filing written notice of appeal within fifteen days after judgment. The appeal taken by means of the written notice of appeal under these circumstances is not a second appeal from said judgment, for the reason that the appeal under the oral notice of appeal was never perfected. This question was decided in the case of Bornheimer v. Bald- win, 42 Cal. 27. There it was decided that, where an appeal from an order denying a new trial was not perfected and, afterwards, but within sixty days from the order, a second appeal was taken and perfected, the failure to perfect the first did not defeat the second appeal.

It is contended by respondent that these views are in conflict with those expressed in the cases of In re Bathurst (Cal. App.) 271 P. 781, and In re Bathurst (Cal. App.) 277 P. 201. In the first of these cases it was held that oral notice of appeal from a judgment of the municipal court vests the appellate court with jurisdiction over the appeal, notwithstanding the appellant's failure to serve and file a statement on appeal within five days, and that said appeal stays all proceedings in the lower court until the same is dismissed by the appellate court. We think this ruling directly contrary to the express directions of section 1468 of the Penal Code, providing that, "if no statement is filed and served as herein provided, the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose, and shall be deemed dismissed, and the judgment or order appealed from shall be enforced as if no appeal had been taken."

The plain and unequivocal meaning of this language is that the failure to file the statement on appeal within the five-day period renders the notice of appeal of no effect, and the judgment appealed from may be enforced as if no attempt had been made to perfect an appeal therefrom. It would be unnecessary to make a motion to dismiss the appeal in either the trial or appellate court, for the reason that no appeal had been perfected, and whatever proceedings in the shape of an appeal had been taken were "deemed dismissed." In re Bathurst (App.) 271 P. 781, was never before us on petition for transfer, and we have therefore not heretofore directly or indirectly approved the same. A petition for transfer to this court in Re Bathurst (App.) 277 P. 201, was denied. There was nothing decided in the latter case contrary to the views expressed herein.

In our opinion a peremptory writ of mandate should issue as prayed for, and it is so ordered.

We concur: LANGDON, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; SEAWELL, J.; PRES-TON, J.

HARRIS v. MUNICIPAL COURT OF
CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

L. A. 11787.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 24, 1930.

1. Constitutional law $\S$ 33—Constitutional provision guaranteeing accused right to speedy and public trial is self-executing (Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13).

Provision of Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13, that in all criminal prosecutions, in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to speedy and public trial, is self-executing.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 251—Law requiring dismissal, unless defendant is brought to trial within 60 days, applied to misdemeanor charge in municipal court (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382; Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13, and art. 6, $\S$ 1).

Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382, enacted pursuant to Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13, guaranteeing accused the right to a speedy and public trial, and requiring dismissal of prosecution of felony case, unless defendant is brought to trial within sixty days after finding of indictment or filing of information, was applicable to misdemeanor charge in municipal court which is a court of record provided for in Const. art. 6, $\S$ 1.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 576(1)—Delay of 18 months in trial of misdemeanor was "unreasonable" within constitutional provision guaranteeing speedy trial (Pen. Code, $\S$ 16; Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13).

Delay of eighteen months in trial of misdemeanor, constituting a crime under Pen. Code, $\S$ 16, held "unreasonable" within meaning of Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13, guaranteeing the accused in criminal prosecution the right to a speedy and public trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Unreasonable," see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series.]

4. Criminal law $\S$ 576(2)—Delay in prosecution for misdemeanor, in order to coerce payment of money, was no excuse.

Fact that prosecution for misdemeanor was commenced for purpose of coercing the payment of a money claim, and cause was not brought to trial in order to effect that purpose, constituted no excuse for delay in trial thereof, in that such a course of action was abuse and perversion of criminal process, and wholly unjustifiable.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 576(2)—Defendant held entitled to dismissal of prosecution of misdemeanor; warrant of arrest being intentionally withheld from service, and no excuse for delay was tendered.

Answer to application for peremptory writ of mandamus to terminate prosecution of misdemeanor charge admitting that warrant of arrest was intentionally withheld from service for eighteen months, and that no excuse for delay was tendered or pretended on motion to dismiss, held insufficient to state a defense.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 576(1)—Incarceration is not essential to operation of constitutional guaranty to speedy trial (Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13).

Incarceration of defendant during delay in prosecution of criminal offense is not essential to operation of Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13, guaranteeing accused in criminal prosecution the right to speedy and public trial.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 576(11)—Accused need not affirmatively show prejudice by reason of delay of trial of criminal charge (Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13).

Accused need not affirmatively show prejudice by reason of delay in trial of criminal charge in order to warrant operation of Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13, guaranteeing the right to a speedy and public trial, in that prejudice will be presumed from the violation of such constitutional right, and it is enough for defendant to show that prosecution was unreasonably delayed.

8. Mandamus $\S$ 61—Mandamus is available to accused to terminate prosecution of misdemeanor charge on ground of delay (Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13).

Writ of mandamus is available to terminate prosecution of misdemeanor charge on ground of delay in bringing accused to trial in violation of Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13.

In Bank.

Application by Michael Harris for peremptory writ of mandate directed to the Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles and another to terminate prosecution of a misdemeanor charge against petitioner.

Writ granted.

Mitchell, Silberberg & Davis, O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, Homer I. Mitchell, and Louis W. Myers, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy County Counsel, Lloyd S. Nix, City Prosecutor, and Ray Brockman, Deputy City Prosecutor, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This is an application for an appropriate peremptory writ to terminate the prosecution of a misdemeanor charge against the petitioner in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles. The application is made upon due notice after the issuance of an order to show cause. In response to the order, the respondents filed a general demurrer to the petition and an answer. The demurrer will first be passed upon.

It appears from the verified petition that at all times involved in this proceeding the city prosecutor of the city of Los Angeles was charged with the duty of prosecuting, in the name of the people of the state of California, misdemeanors committed in the city of Los Angeles; that early in 1927 the Julian Petroleum Corporation collapsed, and receivers were appointed therefor by the United States District Court; that the receivers found that the corporation was heavily indebted, and was in immediate need of a large amount of cash to meet its obligations and to carry on its business, but that it was unable to raise the amount needed except by recovering from various individuals large sums of money which were alleged to have been theretofore paid to said persons by said corporation in excess of the rate of interest permitted by the laws of the state; that the receivers in August, 1927, commenced several civil actions to recover usurious interest; that in addition thereto there were 143 known transactions with the corporation, by a like number of individuals, alleged to be usurious; that the then city prosecutor came into possession of a full and complete report of said transactions, which report included the names of the 143 individuals claimed to have made loans to said corporation, for which they had been paid large sums of money as interest in excess of the lawful rate; that, in order to assist the receivers in recovering the alleged usurious payments of interest, the then city prosecutor, during the months of August, September, and October, 1927, caused an investigator in his office and under his control to swear to, and caused one of his deputies to file, in the respondent court, 143 complaints charging in each case the crime of usury, a misdemeanor; that, when these complaints were filed, said city prosecutor caused a statement to be published that in every instance where restitution of the usurious interest should be made to the receivers the criminal complaint would be dismissed; that in each instance the complaint named the defendants as "John Doe (whose true name is to affiant unknown)," or by other fictitious name; that in no instance had the complaint described the person or set forth any means of identifying the person so charged except as "John Doe," or by other fictitious name; that in the report submitted to him the city prosecutor was given the information that the petitioner herein was claimed to have loaned to said corporation $45,000 in one, and $46,550 in another, transaction in April, 1927, and had thereupon obtained a usurious return as interest; that on October 5, 1927, when the complaint on which the prosecution of the petitioner is founded was prepared and filed, the then city prosecutor and his said subordinates well knew, and the files of the city prosecutor's office contained, the name of the petitioner and the fact that the petitioner had been a party to the alleged usurious transactions in April, 1927, and well knew that the allegations of the complaint that the true name of the defendant was unknown were untrue; that notwithstanding these facts, the city prosecutor's office, knowingly and willfully, and with the intent to carry out the scheme to compel restitution, caused the defendant in said complaint to be designated as John Doe; that on October 5, 1927, prior thereto and to the present time, the petitioner had been and is a resident of the city of Los Angeles; that his true name is Michael Harris; that he had never been known by any other name, and that his name and address had been listed in the Los Angeles city directory and in the city telephone directory since 1924; that he has been engaged in business continuously in said city since 1923, and has not been absent from the city except on business or pleasure for infrequent periods not exceeding thirty days.

It is further alleged that, upon the filing of each of said complaints on October 5, 1927, the respondent court issued a warrant commanding any officer within the county of Los Angeles "forthwith to arrest the above named defendant John Doe and bring him before the judge" of said court; that, when said warrants were issued, they were delivered by the respondent court to the city prosecutor's office, and that the city prosecutor caused the same to remain in his office without being served; that the warrant issued pursuant to the complaint on which the petitioner is being prosecuted remained in the office of the city prosecutor until May 1, 1929, on which day it was placed in the hands of a peace officer for service, and on said day was served on the petitioner; that between October 5, 1927, and May 1, 1929, no effort was made by the city prosecutor or by any other person to serve said warrant on the petitioner or to bring said criminal action on for trial, and that until his arrest the petitioner had no knowledge that he was accused as a defendant or charged with an offense in said action or of the pendency of said proceeding; that upon his arrest he was taken before said court, released on bail, and the matter of his plea was continued to June 7, 1929; that prior to the last-mentioned date the petitioner, through his counsel, filed a written motion to quash the service of said warrant and to dismiss said complaint on the grounds, among others, that the court had no jurisdiction to hold the petitioner for trial; that the proceeding in the name of John Doe was a subterfuge and in fraud of the petitioner's rights to be timely and openly informed of the charge against him while the pertinent evidence, oral and otherwise, was available, and was conducted with the intent to deprive him of the right to a speedy trial, guaranteed to him under the state and Federal Constitutions. The motion was supported by affidavits of the petitioner and of a former deputy city prosecutor, which set forth substantially the facts alleged in the petition herein. Upon the hearing of the motion, no showing was made by affidavit or otherwise in opposition to the affidavits submitted by the petitioner. The motion was denied and the defendant was called upon to plead. He stood mute, a plea of not guilty was entered for him, the cause was set for trial on July 5, 1929, and was thereafter continued to October 14, 1929. The present proceeding was commenced on August 30, 1929.

Two main contentions are presented. First, if the respondent court had jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter of the action, the prosecution was unreasonably delayed in violation of the petitioner's constitutional right to a speedy trial, and a writ of mandamus should issue to compel its dismissal; and, second, that the court had no jurisdiction to try the defendant in view of the form of the "John Doe" complaint and warrant issued under the particular facts and circumstances here shown.

[1] Section 13 of article 1 of the Constitution of California provides in part as follows: "In criminal prosecutions, in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial." This provision of the Constitution is self-executing. In re Alpine, 203 Cal. 731, 265 P. 947, 58 A. L. R. 1500; In re Begerow, 133 Cal. 349, 65 P. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178. It reflects the letter and spirit of the following provision of the Federal Constitution to the same effect: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial. * * * U. S. Const., Amend. 6. This is a fundamental right granted to the accused, and has been the policy of the law since the time of the promulgation of Magna Charta and the Habeas Corpus Act. In re Begerow, supra. The policy of the law in this respect has been further declared by the Legislature and by constitutional amendment in this state. In 1872 section 1382 of the Penal Code was enacted, wherein, and in subdivision 2, it was provided as to criminal cases originating in the superior court: "The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: * * * 2. If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information." This provision of the Penal Code, founded on sections 593 and 594 of the Criminal Practice Act (St. 1851, p. 278), has not been changed during the intervening years. In 1927 the Legislature of this state adopted section 681a of the Penal Code, declaring: "The welfare of the people of the State of California requires that all proceedings in criminal cases shall be heard and determined at the earliest possible time. It shall be the duty of all courts and judicial officers and of all district attorneys to expedite the hearing and determination of all such cases and proceedings to the greatest degree that is consistent with the ends of justice." At the general election in 1928 article 6 of the Constitution was amended (section 4c) so as to cut down the time for the finality of judgments on appeal in criminal cases. It will thus be seen that the time within which criminal cases should be disposed of has been and is a matter of great public concern, and the duty is imposed upon courts, judicial officers, and public prosecutors to expedite the disposition thereof.

[2] What is a "speedy trial," as those words are used in the Constitution? The Legislature in section 1382 of the Penal Code has declared that, unless a defendant in a felony case has been brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment or the filing of the information, the court must, in the absence of good cause shown for the delay, dismiss the prosecution. Thus the Legislature by necessary inference had said that a trial delayed more than sixty days without good cause is not a speedy trial, and the courts have not hesitated to adopt and enforce the legislative interpretation of the constitutional provision. Nor have the courts hesitated, by writ of mandamus or on appeal, to compel the dismissal of felony cases not speedily brought to trial in accordance with the legislative interpretation. Ford v. Superior Court, 17 Cal. App. 1, 118 P. 96; Abbott v. Superior Court, 17 Cal. App. 13, 118 P. 100; People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 P. 892. Furthermore, said section 1382 has been applied and enforced by writ of mandamus in the case of a misdemeanor charge in the superior court. Cordts v. Superior Court, 53 Cal. App. 589, 200 P. 726. We have been referred to no statute or case, and we have found none in this state, compelling the dismissal of a misdemeanor charge in a court inferior in jurisdiction to the superior court, but no reason appears to justify a refusal to enforce the self-executing provision of the Constitution in such a case. The Constitution says that in criminal proceedings, in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to a speedy trial. The respondent court is a court of record provided for in the Constitution. (Const., art. 6, § 1.)

[3, 4] Commenting on section 13 of article 1 of the Constitution and section 1382 of the Penal Code, this court, in People v. Morino, supra, at page 517 of 85 Cal., 24 P. 892, 893, said: "A party charged with crime has the constitutional right to a speedy trial, and the court has no discretionary power to deny him a right so important. * * * The statute is imperative. 'The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed.' Here no cause for delay was shown. It was enough for the defendant to show that the time fixed by the statute, after information filed, had expired, and that the case had not been postponed on his application. If there was any good cause for holding him for a longer time without a trial it was for the prosecution to show it. The court could not presume it." The complaint pending in the respondent court charged a crime (Pen. Code, § 16), and the Constitution strikes at an unreasonable delay in all criminal cases. The prosecution involved herein was commenced by the filing of the complaint on October 5, 1927. Nothing was done thereafter until the service of the warrant on May 1, 1929, eighteen months after the commencement of the action. It would be most unreasonable to hold that a delay of eighteen months in the trial of the action was not in violation of the constitutional right to a speedy trial when, as here, it is admitted that the petitioner was at all times available for the service of process and that the delay was not at all traceable to him. The only reason for the delay found in the petition herein is that the prosecution was commenced for the purpose of coercing the payment of a money claim from the person so sought to be prosecuted, and the cause was not brought to trial in order to effect that purpose. Such a course of action was an abuse and perversion of the criminal process, was wholly unjustifiable, and constituted no excuse for the delay.

The petitioner has alleged a full and complete cause of action entitling him to a writ of mandamus to compel the dismissal of said action, and the demurrer thereto is not well taken. Next to be considered is whether the answer in itself constitutes a valid defense or raises issues of fact requiring a reference.

[5] The answer consists solely of an allegation that the respondents "have no information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable them to answer the allegations" of paragraphs III, IV, and VI of the petition, and, placing their denial on that ground, deny generally and specifically the allegations of those paragraphs. Said paragraphs contain the allegations that the former city prosecutor had in his possession a full and complete report of the 143 alleged usurious transactions, and knew, or possessed the means of ascertaining, the names and whereabouts of the persons charged as John Doe; that said complaints charging usury, a misdemeanor, were filed for the purpose of assisting the receivers in collecting the alleged money claims and of coercing payment thereof, and that with full knowledge of each of the transactions involving the petitioner herein and of his true name the city prosecutor's office caused the complaint to be filed, charging him under such fictitious name. It is admitted that the prosecution was commenced on October 5, 1927; that the whereabouts of the petitioner within the jurisdiction of the court were easily ascertainable; that the warrant of arrest was intentionally withheld from service by the prosecuting officer for eighteen months; that the cause was not set down for trial until July 5, 1929; and that no excuse for the delay was tendered or pretended before the respondent court on the motion to dismiss. The issues of fact sought to be raised by the answer, if resolved against the petitioner, would not change the result of the present proceeding, and, if resolved against the respondents, would only serve to aggravate the situation in the petitioner's favor. In either event the unreasonable delay in the prosecution is incontrovertibly established, and the answer does not state a defense.

[6, 7] The respondents contend that during the period of the delay the petitioner was not incarcerated and has shown no prejudice to himself by reason of the lapse of the twenty months before the case was set for trial. But incarceration is not essential to the operation of the constitutional guaranty. State of Wyoming v. Keefe, 17 Wyo. 227, 98 P. 122, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 17 Ann. Cas. 161. The guaranty operates on behalf of the "party accused," and, if the petitioner was accused at all, he was accused by the filing of the complaint on October 5, 1927. Furthermore, it is not necessary that the party accused affirmatively show prejudice. Prejudice will be presumed from the violation of this constitutional right. It is enough for the defendant to show that the prosecution has been unreasonably delayed. It will not be presumed that good cause for the delay in fact existed. If there was any good cause, it was for the prosecution to show it. People v. Morino, supra; In re Begerow, supra. If good cause be shown, the defendant is not entitled to relief. In re Gere, 64 Cal. App. 418, 221 P. 689. Here no good or any cause has been shown either in the respondent court or in this court, other than the whim of the prosecution. The facts in the case of United States v. Kojima, 3 Hawaii Fed. 381, are strikingly similar to those in the present case. It was there held that the commencement of the reasonable time within which a defendant must be tried is not postponed until the time of his arrest, when, as here, he was at all times available for the service of process. In the case of Arrowsmith v. State, 131 Tenn. 480, 175 S. W. 545, L. R. A. 1915E, 363, the holding in the earlier case of State v. Sims (Tenn.) 1 Overt. 253, that a speedy trial guaranteed to the accused means a trial as soon "after indictment" as the prosecution can with reasonable diligence prepare for it, was approved.

In U. S. v. Fox, 3 Mont. 512, the court said: "The speedy trial, to which a person charged with crime is entitled under the Constitution, then is, a trial at such a time, after the finding of the indictment. * * *" This is also the test prescribed by section 1382 of the Penal Code. As opposed to this rule the respondents cite Hammond v. State, 39 Neb.

252, 58 N. W. 92, and State v. Williams, 35 S. C. 160, 14 S. E. 309. Neither case is in point. The Nebraska case involved the application of two sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure of that state. The first section prescribed the time for trial when the defendant was incarcerated. The second, when the defendant was on bail. It was held that the first section was inapplicable because it was not shown that the defendant was confined in jail during the delay, and as to the second section that the trial was had within the time therein prescribed. In the South Carolina case it was held that the particular statute there involved, patterned after the seventh section of the Habeas Corpus Act, was available in terms only to one in actual custody. We have no similar statute in this state, and our constitutional provision strikes at the accusation as well as the custody of the defendant.

[8] What has been said renders it unnecessary to pass upon the other question, viz. whether the facts stated by the petitioner entitle him to a writ of prohibition. Under the admitted facts, there was no justifiable reason for the respondent court to refuse to dismiss the action against the petitioner. An abuse of discretion was thereby committed to correct which, under the authorities in this state above cited, the writ of mandamus is available to the petitioner.

Let the peremptory writ of mandamus issue as prayed.

GUTTERMAN v. MUNICIPAL COURT OF
CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

L. A. 11605.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 24, 1930.

Criminal law §576(2)—That material evidence was in possession of superior jurisdiction was not good cause for delay of 18 months in prosecution of misdemeanor.

Answer to application for writ of mandate to compel dismissal of misdemeanor charge, alleging that delay was occasioned by reason of fact that material evidence, including documents and records, was in possession and under judicial control of superior jurisdictions, and unavailable to prosecution, did not state good cause for delay of over eighteen months; there being no showing that any effort was made to obtain such evidence or that it could not have been obtained by exercise of reasonable diligence.

In Bank.

Application by Herman Gutterman for writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles and another to compel the dismissal of a misdemeanor charge pending in such court.

Peremptory writ granted.

Cooper & Collings, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy County Counsel, Lloyd S. Nix, City Prosecutor, and Ray P. Brockman, Deputy City Prosecutor, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Application for writ of mandate to compel the dismissal of an action pending in the respondent court, charging the petitioner with usury, a misdemeanor. An alternative writ was issued. As a return the respondents filed a demurrer and an answer.

This proceeding in its controlling features is the same as the case of Harris v. Municipal Court et al., 285 P. 699, this day decided. There is some dissimilarity in the facts, not however, sufficient to change the result.

It appears from the admitted allegations of the petition that the complaint under which the petitioner is sought to be prosecuted is a so-called "John Doe" complaint, filed in the respondent court on September 8, 1927; that upon its filing a "John Doe" warrant was immediately issued; that during the years 1926 and 1927 petitioner had numerous dealings with the Julian Petroleum Corporation, its officers and agents, and that these transactions led to the filing of said complaint; that the petitioner was arrested on April 20, 1929; that nothing was done in the meantime to bring said action on for trial; that upon his arraignment the petitioner moved the court to dismiss the complaint on the ground, among others, that the petitioner was not granted and did not receive a speedy trial, guaranteed to him under the state and Federal Constitutions. Upon the hearing of the motion, no reason or excuse for the delay was shown or suggested by the prosecution. Upon such hearing, the petitioner offered to prove that about the time the complaint was filed he was under indictment by the grand jury of Los Angeles county involving transactions between himself and the Julian Petroleum Corporation; that he had been a resident of Los Angeles for twenty years, and was at all times available for the service of process in the misdemeanor action; that, after said complaint was filed, he made full settlement with the receivers of the Julian Corporation, and that said receivers advised a dismissal of the misdemeanor complaint. The court refused the offer of proof and denied the motion to dismiss, and set the cause for trial on May 28, 1929. Thereafter this proceeding was commenced to compel the dismissal on the ground that the court abused its discretion in denying said motion, in the absence of any showing, reason, or excuse for the delay.

The only excuse for the delay advanced by the respondents is contained in the answer, wherein it is alleged on information and belief that it was impossible for the city prosecutor to prosecute the misdemeanor charge, for the reason that material evidence, including documents and records by which the corpus delicti must be established, was at all times mentioned in the petition and until recently in the possession and under the "judicial control of two superior jurisdictions, and were therefore unavailable to the prosecution." The answer does not state good cause for the delay of over eighteen months. It does not appear that any effort was made by the prosecution to obtain this evidence or that it could not have been obtained by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

No adequate defense is presented, and the peremptory writ should issue as prayed.

It is so ordered.

E. M. HACKEL, Petitioner, v. MUNICIPAL COURT OF THE CITY OF LOS ANGELES, County of Los Angeles, State of California, and the Honorable Charles L. Bogue, Judge Thereof, Respondents.

L. A. 11632.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 24, 1930.

In Bank.

Cooper & Collings and Louis W. Myers, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy County Counsel, Lloyd S. Nix, City Prosecutor, and Ray P. Brockman, Deputy City Prosecutor, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This is a proceeding in mandate similar in all essential particulars to the preceding cases of Harris v. Municipal Court et al., 285 P. 699, and Guterman v. Municipal Court et al., 285 P. 703, this day decided. The complaint against the petitioner for usury, a misdemeanor, was filed in the respondent court on September 23, 1927, and the warrant was served on April 18, 1929, and nothing was done by the prosecution in the meantime to bring the case on for trial. Proceedings similar to those in the other cases were taken in the respondent court to bring about a dismissal of the action with like result. On the authority of those cases, the peremptory writ of mandamus is ordered issued as prayed.

PEOPLE v. ROCCO.

Cr. 3303.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 24, 1930.

1. Homicide $\S$ 250—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for murder.

In prosecution for murder, evidence which included proof of association of defendant and deceased as bootleggers and of finding blood stains in defendant's automobile, held sufficient to sustain conviction for murder.

2. Homicide $\S$ 166(1)—Statements of defendants that defendant and deceased were living with women in apartment and that defendants "got in" with deceased to make money assisting in running alcohol, held admissible in murder prosecution as showing motive.

In prosecution for murder, statement of defendants made after their arrest that defendants had picked up women at hotel, and that one of defendants and deceased were living with them at apartment; that defendants were engaged in traffic in alcohol and had "got in" with deceased and were willing to make some money in assisting him in running alcohol, held admissible to connect defendants with deceased and show opportunity and motive for crime, where state relied on circumstantial evidence.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1035(3)—Defendant could not on appeal complain of refusal to permit attorneys, appointed for himself and codefendant to withdraw where defendants, after hearing counsel's argument disclosing adverse defenses requested that attorneys continue.

In murder prosecution, refusal of trial court to permit attorneys, appointed by court to represent defendants, to withdraw from case during progress of trial held not error where defendants, after argument between court and counsel disclosing that defenses of the two defendants were adverse to each other, stated, on being asked separately, that they desired the attorneys to continue as their counsel, and one of defendants, after being found guilty, could not on appeal complain of court's action.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 622(1)—Defendants jointly accused could not as matter of right have separate trials.

Defendants jointly accused of murder were not entitled to separate trials as a matter of right.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 641(1)—Defendants whose defenses were adverse could waive any right to be represented by independent counsel.

If defendants whose defenses were adverse were entitled to be represented by independent counsel, they had privilege of waiving that right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Edward Henderson, Judge.

Frank Rocco was convicted of murder, and he appeals.

Superseding opinion, 281 P. 443.

R. D. Knickerbocker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James C. Hollingsworth, Dist. Atty., and Don R. Holt, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Ventura, for the People.

LANGDON, J.

This is an appeal by Frank Rocco from a conviction of the charge of murdering one James Brady, within the county of Ventura, California.

[1] Briefly, the record discloses: In January, 1929, the defendant, Frank Rocco, and his codefendant, Dominic Leo, came to the city of Los Angeles. They went first to the restaurant operated by one Santanillo, on Lucile avenue. From there they were taken by Santanillo to the Louise Hotel, in the vicinity of West Sixth street, where Rocco and his codefendant rented two rooms. At this time the defendant Rocco was accompanied by his wife and they rented room 309 and his codefendant Leo rented room 311. The two defendants had driven across the continent in a Packard roadster bearing a Maine license. Shortly after their arrival at the Louise Hotel, the defendant Rocco made the acquaintance of one James Brady, who was subsequently murdered. Brady also had a room at the Louise Hotel. Within a short time the wife of Rocco left and returned to New York. On or about the 19th day of February, 1929, the deceased, James Brady, went to the King Apartments in the city of Venice, where he, with one Audrey Morosco, rented a double apartment in the rear on the second floor. The defendant Rocco also occupied this apartment, together with another woman by the name of Geraldine Forrester. During the joint occupancy of this apartment, Rocco and Brady were frequently together and had conversations with reference to the illicit liquor "racket."

At about 10:30 p. m. of February 28, 1929, the defendant Rocco, in company with the deceased James Brady and his codefendant Dominic Leo, left the King Apartments in Venice. The two women remained in the apartment. Rocco, Brady, and Leo walked out and got into the gray Packard roadster and drove away, Rocco being the driver of the car. About 1 o'clock in the morning of the following day, March 1, 1929, a resident in the upper Conejo district of Ventura county heard what he described as three or four shots. There was an interval of time, and he heard the engine of an automobile. At about 4:30 of the same morning, a body was found lying in an open field a distance of one and one-half miles east of the town of Camarillo in Ventura county, a distance of about seven miles west of where the shots were heard. The body was identified as that of James Brady. At about the time of the discovery of the body, the two defendants returned to the King Apartments at Venice, where they were received by the two women, who served them coffee, and, shortly thereafter, the two defendants left the apartment and did not again return to it. Shortly before he returned to the apartment for the last time, Leo was seen to enter a garage in Venice, a short distance from the King Apartments, with the gray Packard roadster bearing the Maine license. A short time after his first visit to the garage, Leo again returned and took the Packard automobile, and at this time bought a pint bottle of gasoline.

Shortly after Rocco and Leo left the King Apartments, the two women left in a taxicab. Audrey Morosco went to the California Hotel on West Sixth street, where she rented a room, and the other woman went to the home of one of her relatives. At this time the rent for the apartment at Venice was paid up for another week, but neither Rocco, Leo, nor the women ever returned to it. About half an hour after leaving the King Apartments in Venice, Leo was seen by a policeman to park the gray Packard automobile with a Maine license alongside of the curb at the Hotel Louise on West Sixth street.

An examination of the body of deceased showed that he had received three wounds in his head, which had been inflicted by bullets from a pistol, one bullet having entered on the right side of the head from the rear, and another being in approximately the same position on the head on the left side, and the third wound being on the right cheek. The pockets in his clothing had been turned inside out. The gray Packard automobile was found in a garage in the vicinity of Sunset and Glendale avenues. An examination of the car revealed that it had blood spots on it in fourteen places. There was a bullet hole in the canvas top of the car, and, on the right side of the top of the car, toward the rear, some brain matter was found. In the room which the defendant Rocco occupied at the Louise Hotel some underwear was found on which were blood stains. Blood spots were found on the shoes which were being worn by Rocco, which had been covered over with black shoe polish. There was also blood under the seat of the Packard automobile, and there was a package of cigarettes in the car upon which appeared blood stains. The revolver with which the crime was committed was found about one mile from the position of the body of deceased.

When Audrey Morosco left the King Apartments and went to the California Hotel, it was in accordance with the instructions of Rocco. She registered there under the name of Perro and was joined by Rocco at about 2 o'clock in the morning on March 2, 1929.

Both defendants, upon being arrested, made contradictory statements, which were shown to be untruthful, as to their whereabouts and their acquaintance and association with the deceased, etc.

It is apparent from the foregoing that it cannot be contended, with any forcefulness, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

[2] It is contended that the court erred in permitting to be read to the jury certain admissions made by defendants. These statements, made after arrest, are to the effect that the defendants "picked up" two women at the Louise Hotel and afterwards Rocco and deceased lived with them at the King Apartments; that they (the defendants) were engaged in traffic in alcohol and had been engaged in such occupation in the east; that they "got in" with Brady and were willing to make some money assisting him in "running alcohol." It was necessary to prove the charge against defendants entirely by circumstantial evidence, and it was important to connect defendants and deceased and to show opportunity and motive for the crime. It may readily be assumed that persons engaged in the illicit distribution of alcohol must frequently carry large amounts of cash upon their persons, thus giving a motive for robbery. One who was familiar with the "rum running racket" as it is termed in the record before us, and who had previously been engaged in it, would naturally seek the acquaintance and gain the confidence of another so engaged. The statements offered were relevant upon these matters, even though, incidentally, they did discredit the defendants, and if any other portion of the statements was inadmissible, the error of the trial court in ruling upon that portion was not such an error as to warrant a reversal of the judgment where the record discloses no prejudice occasioned by such ruling.

[3-5] The next objection of appellant is that the trial court erred in not permitting the attorneys, who had been appointed by the court to represent defendants, to withdraw from the case during the progress of the trial. On March 26, 1929, the trial of the case opened, and after considerable testimony had been taken, on March 29, counsel for defendants moved the court that they be permitted to withdraw as attorneys for the defendants. The reason for the motion, as stated to the court, was that while acting jointly for the defendants, counsel had received confidential communications from both, which made it unethical for them to represent the defendants, either jointly or separately. It was intimated in the long discussions between court and counsel that the defenses of the two defendants were adverse to each other. Although counsel forcefully urged this matter before the court, the court insisted that they should continue to represent the defendants; counsel, as insistently, refused and were adjudged in contempt of court, and it was only upon a threat of imprisonment that counsel continued the defense.

It is important to observe, however, that during the course of the discussion between court and counsel, the court asked each of the defendants, separately, if he desired the attorneys to continue as his attorneys, to which question each defendant answered: "Yes."

The defendants were not entitled to separate trials as a matter of right. People v. Dowell, 204 Cal. 109, 266 P. 807; People v. Perry, 195 Cal. 623, 234 P. 890. If it be conceded that they were entitled to be represented by independent counsel when their defenses were adverse, it must also be conceded that they had the privilege of waiving that right, as they had the privilege of waiving the right to be represented by any attorney. The argument between court and counsel was lengthy and dramatic; it brought forcefully to the attention of defendants any possible dangers to them and to each of them by reason of their joint representation by counsel, but, nevertheless, for reasons which were evidently sufficient to them at the time, defendants not only declined to insist upon their privilege, but expressly stated that they desired counsel to continue in their defense. Since the privilege, if it existed, was entirely for the benefit of defendants, it would seem that the court could not do otherwise than defer to the wishes of the defendants, regardless of the wishes of counsel. And since that was done, the one defendant, who was found guilty, could not object to the action of the court, which he had asked to be taken. Indeed, in the event that the court had permitted counsel to withdraw over the protests and objections of defendants and a conviction had occurred while one of the defendants was being represented by other counsel, such defendant would have had grounds to object that against his insistence, he had been denied the right of representation by counsel that he desired.

There are no other matters requiring consideration upon appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CORPORATION, Limited, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 6572.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 13, 1930.

1. Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Industrial Commission's implied finding based on conflicting evidence is binding on certiorari to review award.

On certiorari to review award of Industrial Accident Commission, implied finding based on conflicting evidence is binding.

2. Insurance ⇨435—Indemnity policy covering personal injuries to employees of partnership held not to cover member thereof for injuries sustained in connection with employment.

Indemnity policy covering personal injuries sustained by employees issued to partnership, providing that, if employer is partnership, policy shall not apply to any member thereof, except those named in declaration with disclosure of annual wages, held not to cover member of partnership for injuries received by him in connection with any employment whatever.

3. Partnership ⇨95—One partner's purchase of another's interest presumptively includes final settlement of all existing partnership indebtedness.

Where one partner purchases interest of another transaction presumptively includes final settlement of all partnership indebtedness existing between partners.

4. Partnership ⇨263—Partner remaining in charge of business after withdrawal of other may continue business as liquidating partner until contractual conditions and liabilities are carried out.

Where one partner merely withdraws from business, remaining partner is entitled to continue business as liquidating partner until contractual conditions and liabilities are carried out.

5. Partnership ⇨263—Outgoing partner retains interest in partnership subject to appropriate liquidation of business with right to accounting when net assets are ascertained.

Outgoing partner merely withdrawing from business retains interest in partnership subject to appropriate liquidation of business and with right to an accounting when net assets of partnership as of date of dissolution are ascertained.

6. Insurance ⇨435—Outgoing partner was not covered by indemnity policy covering employees only, unless partnership was dissolved and he retained no interest therein.

Outgoing partner, in order to establish contention that he ceased to be partner, as described in indemnity insurance policy covering personal injuries to employees, but excluding partners, should show, not only that partnership has been dissolved, but also that at time of accident he retained no interest whatever in assets or business thereof, especially so far as particular job was concerned.

Certiorari by the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to C. H. Dillman, employee of George C. Schuldt, employer.

Award annulled.

George H. Moore and Hubert Starr, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Commission.

Hoye & Boehler, of Los Angeles, for respondent Dillman.

CONREY, P. J.

C. H. Dillman, claiming as an employee of George C. Schuldt, made application to the Industrial Accident Commission for an award of compensation for disability, resulting from an accident in which he was injured, while engaged in service for his employer. An award was made in favor of Dillman and against the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Limited (hereinafter called the corporation), as insurance carrier of the employer. In this proceeding by writ of review the corporation contends that the commission was without jurisdiction to make said award.

The evidence shows that the accident and injury to Dillman occurred while he was working for Schuldt. It arose out of, and in the course of, the employment. If the insurance policy covered the employment of Dillman by Schuldt, the award is valid; otherwise, the award should be annulled.

Prior to October 26, 1927, Schuldt and Dillman entered into an oral agreement of partnership as building contractors. Schuldt had obtained a contract for the construction of a public school building, and this contract, although held in the name of Schuldt, was by the partners understood to be included in their business. On October 26, 1927, they made application to the corporation for an indemnity policy to cover personal injuries sustained by employees. In the declarations of their application they represented themselves to be a copartnership, and named themselves, George C. Schuldt and C. H. Dillman, as the members of the partnership. In the policy issued pursuant to said application (and bearing the same date as the date of the application), it was provided that "if this employer is a partnership, this policy shall not apply to any member * * * of such * * * partnership except those named in the Declarations with disclosures of the annual amount of wages," etc. The declarations did not contain any such exception.

[1] In the testimony of Mr. Dillman, before the commission, he admitted that he told the agent of the corporation that he and Schuldt were partners, and, further admitted, that when the policy was written up he knew that it was written in his name as well as that of Schuldt; but he also claims, and he so testified, that subsequently and before he went to work on the job, he and Schuldt agreed to dissolve the partnership, and, further agreed, that he would work for Schuldt on the school building at a stated wage. The work under the building contract was commenced early in November, but the brickwork on which Dillman was employed did not commence until the 2d day of December. The accident to Dillman occurred in the latter part of January, 1928. Dillman admitted that he did not at any time, prior to the accident, notify the corporation about any change in the partnership arrangement. With respect to the time when the partnership was dissolved, as compared with the commencement of the work, the following testimony of Dillman is interesting: "Q. How far had you proceeded with this particular job when you learned you could not go through on basis of a partnership and then decided that Mr. Schuldt would have to go ahead alone and you would merely work for him, how far had you proceeded on this work? A. I hadn't proceeded with the work. That is, we hadn't proceeded on this work. Q. Hadn't done any work at all? A. No." The inference from this testimony is that the partnership was dissolved early in November. Nevertheless, a partnership contract in writing had been prepared, which carries a notarial certificate that it was "subscribed and sworn to" before the notary, on November 25, 1927. However, for the purposes of this proceeding, and since the evidence is conflicting, we are bound by the commission's implied finding that the partnership was dissolved as Dillman says that it was.

[2] For the corporation it is contended that, in the creation of the insurance policy, the intention was for partnership coverage only, and that in no event was it intended to furnish indemnity for liability to employees of either Schuldt or Dillman as individuals. In reply to this contention, counsel for the commission refers to section 2557 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "In the case of transfer between cotenants. A transfer of interest by one of several partners, joint owners, or owners in common, who are jointly insured, to the others, does not avoid an insurance, even though it has been agreed that the insurance shall cease upon an alienation of the thing insured." Whether or not said section has any application to workmen's compensation insurance policies is a question, which we think is not necessary to decide. The terms of the policy, as hereinabove set forth, show that it was issued to a partnership of which Dillman was a member, and that by reason of his membership in the partnership, it was agreed that the policy should not apply to him, since he was not "named in the declarations with disclosure of the annual amount of wages," or at all. The meaning of the language used could not have been more direct and certain if the policy had said, "C. H. Dillman is a member of said partnership and it is hereby agreed that this policy shall not cover any compensation for injuries received by him in connection with any employment whatever." See Zurich, etc., Company v. Stadelman (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 687.

[3-6] For yet another reason, the applicant, Dillman, was not entitled to compensation. "It is the law of partnerships that when one partner purchases the interest of the other the transaction presumptively includes a final settlement of all partnership indebtedness existing between the partners." Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, at page 14, 239 P. 332, 337. On the other hand, upon a dissolution of the partnership, where one partner merely withdrew from the business, the partner who remained in charge of the business "was left in a position where under the law he was entitled to continue the business as a liquidating partner until the contractual conditions and liabilities were carried out." Mervyn Investment Co. v. Biber, 184 Cal. 637, 644, 194 P. 1037, 1040. In this latter form of dissolution, the outgoing partner retains his interest in the partnership, subject to the appropriate liquidation of the business, and with the right to an accounting when the net assets of the partnership, as of the time of dissolution, shall have been ascertained. Avery v. Peirson, 74 Cal. App. 617, 241 P. 406. Dillman, in order to establish his contention that he had ceased to be a partner as described in the insurance policy, should have been required to show not only that the partnership had been dissolved, but also that, at the time of the accident, he retained no interest whatever in the assets or business of the partnership, especially so far as the job on which he was injured was concerned. But there is not in the record any such evidence.

The award is annulled.

JONES v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. et al.

Civ. 3628.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Feb. 13, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨170(3)—Overruling of demurrer to answer not stating facts showing alleged unfitness, negligence, etc., of one driving automobile in which plaintiff was riding, held not reversible error (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Overruling of special demurrer to amended answer alleging plaintiff's contributory negligence in riding in automobile, with knowledge of driver's recklessness, negligence, and unfitness, held not reversible error, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, though amended answer stated no ultimate facts showing his unfitness, etc., and plaintiff's knowledge thereof, where depositions taken before trial clearly stated all facts underlying such allegations and plaintiff was fully advised of facts relied on to establish contributory negligence.

2. Electricity ⇨19(5)—Evidence held to justify finding that driver of automobile colliding with electric power pole was under influence of intoxicating liquor.

In action against electric company for injuries to guest in automobile colliding with power pole, evidence held sufficient to justify jury's finding that driver of automobile was under influence of intoxicating liquor at time of accident.

3. Electricity ⇨19(5)—Evidence held to negative contention that electric power pole was lawfully maintained in boulevard, when automobile collided therewith.

In action against electric company for injuries to guest in automobile colliding with power pole in boulevard, evidence held to negative defendant's contention that pole was lawfully maintained where it stood at time of collision.

4. Electricity ⇨18(1)—One intoxicated to degree preventing him from exercising normal faculties and driving with care of sober, prudent person, cannot drive automobile, though not drunk (California Vehicle Act, § 112).

California Vehicle Act (Acts 1923, p. 553), § 112, prohibiting persons under influence of intoxicating liquor from driving vehicles on public highways, applies if intoxication is to such degree as to prevent or tend to prevent driver of automobile from exercising his normal faculties and driving with care and caution characteristic of sober and prudent person, though he is not drunk.

5. Electricity ⇨18(1)—Guest knowing that automobile driver was under influence of intoxicating liquor held guilty of contributory negligence precluding recovery for injuries (California Vehicle Act, § 112).

One riding in automobile with knowledge that driver was under influence of intoxicating liquor held guilty of contributory negligence precluding recovery for injuries in collision with electric power pole, under California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553), § 112.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Raglan Tuttle, Judge.

Action by Florence L. Jones against the Pacific Gas and Electric Company and another. From a judgment for named defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Charles L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellant.

T. J. Straub and Charles E. Finney, both of San Francisco, W. H. Hatfield, of Sacramento, and Leo H. Susman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

Plaintiff instituted this action to recover damages on account of personal injuries sustained when an automobile driven by the defendant Cottrell collided with a power pole, belonging to and maintained by the defendant Pacific Gas and Electric Company. The defendant Cottrell suffered default, and, upon trial, judgment went in favor of the defendant Pacific Gas and Electric Company. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

[1] The complaint alleges that on or about the 13th day of November, 1926, the plaintiff was riding as a guest in an automobile, in a northeasterly direction, on a certain highway or street in North Sacramento known as "Del Paso Boulevard"; that at said time and place the defendant Cottrell was then and there operating said automobile in a careless and negligent manner; that at the same time the defendant corporation herein, Pacific Gas and Electric Company, was negligently allowing one of its poles to stand wholly within the main traveled portion of the said Del Paso boulevard and near the intersection of said boulevard with a certain other street known as "Globe Avenue"; that the said defendant corporation negligently failed to have said pole guarded, or otherwise marked, or illuminated, in a manner sufficient to direct attention of persons using said boulevard, of the presence of said pole. The complaint then alleges that as a proximate result of said operation of said automobile, and the maintenance of said pole, the collision herein referred to occurred, and that as the result of said collision, the plaintiff suffered severe bodily injuries, etc. The defendant corporation, in its answer, denied that it negligently allowed one of its poles to stand within said boulevard; denied that it failed to have said pole guarded, or marked, or illuminated, at said time or place; and alleged that at said time and place it maintained on said pole a lighted lantern with a red glass chimney, and that said lantern was so suspended and lighted as to sufficiently direct attention of persons using said boulevard of the existence and presence of the pole. In addition to denying the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, the defendant corporation filed an amended answer in which it set up as an additional defense, "that said plaintiff was herself guilty of carelessness and negligence in and about the manner in which she conducted herself at the time and place in question; that said plaintiff, before becoming the guest of said defendant William Cottrell, knew that said defendant William Cottrell had been, and was then and there a careless, reckless and negligent driver and operator of motor vehicles, and had been, and was then and there, unfit to drive or operate said automobile, and having such knowledge, said plaintiff then and there carelessly and negligently volunteered and undertook to, and did, ride in said automobile which was then and there driven by said defendant William Cottrell; that said defendant William Cottrell, at the time and place of the accident mentioned in said complaint, and during all of the times on said day that said plaintiff was riding in said automobile so driven and operated by him, did drive and operate said automobile in a careless, negligent and reckless manner; that said plaintiff, while riding in said automobile so driven by said defendant William Cottrell, knew that said defendant William Cottrell was then and there driving, and would then and there continue to drive, said automobile in a careless, reckless and negligent manner, and knew that said defendant William Cottrell was unfit to drive or operate said automobile, and knowing that fact, said plaintiff carelessly and negligently, and voluntarily continued to ride in said automobile, notwithstanding that said plaintiff had many opportunities to refrain from so doing; and that by reason of such carelessness and negligence on her part, said plaintiff proximately contributed to the damages and injuries of which she complains." To this amended answer the plaintiff interposed both a general and special demurrer, and the action of the trial court in overruling such demurrer is alleged as grounds for reversal. Among other things it is contended that such amended answer does not tender the issue of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. While it is true that the amended answer does not set forth any ultimate facts showing that the defendant Cottrell was an unfit person to drive an automobile, or any ultimate facts showing carelessness, negligence, etc., on the part of the defendant Cottrell, in the control and managing of the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding preceding and at the time of the injury, we do not find that the special demurrer called attention to the fact that the amended answer failed to state any facts upon which it predicated the allegation that the defendant Cottrell was unfit to drive an automobile, and that the plaintiff had knowledge of such facts. On the other hand, if it were to be held that the special demurrer was sufficient, and that it should have been sustained on account of the manner of pleading the unfitness of the defendant Cottrell which we have mentioned, any error of the court in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer thereto furnishes no ground for reversal under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. The plaintiff in nowise is shown to have suffered by reason of any lack to point out why defendant Cottrell was unfit to drive an automobile prior to the date of the collision referred to. Certain depositions taken prior to the actual trial of this cause set forth clearly all the facts underlying the allegation that the defendant Cottrell was an unfit person to operate an automobile upon any of the highways in Sacramento county, and the plaintiff was fully advised of the facts upon which the defendant corporation would rely as establishing the plaintiff's contributory negligence. As to the form of pleading of the answer, we find in the case of Griswold v. Pacific Electric Co., 45 Cal. App. 81, 187 P. 65, 68, holding the following sufficient to tender the issue of contributory negligence; the allegation in that case upheld is as follows: "That the plaintiff himself did not exercise ordinary care, caution, or prudence in the premises to avoid said accident and the resulting injuries, if any, by him sustained, and that said accident and the resulting injuries, if any, complained of were directly and proximately contributed to and caused by the fault, carelessness, and negligence of plaintiff in the premises." It was there held that this allegation was subject to a special demurrer, but as the plaintiff went to trial upon it, no prejudice had been suffered. The answer in the instant case pleads contributory negligence as an additional defense. In the Griswold Case it was pleaded as a further, separate, and distinct answer and defense. The Griswold Case refers to the case of Starck v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 172 Cal. 277, 156 P. 51, L. R. A. 1916E, 58, where the same form of pleading of contributory negligence was approved. This case relies upon the case of Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel Gold Mining Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 P. 714. A consideration of these cases leads to the conclusion that the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was tendered as an issue, and further, that if not sufficiently pleaded, the cause was tried upon the theory of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and that under the constitutional provision which we have cited, no sufficient error is shown in relation to the pleadings to justify a reversal.

[2] The transcript discloses, among other things, the following facts: That prior to September, 1926, the state highway commission financed the paving of a 30-foot strip along the center of Del Paso boulevard; that prior to the work just referred to, an old pavement had existed on said boulevard along the center thereof, which was from 18 to 20 feet in width; that the pole referred to in this action was situate southeasterly of the southerly edge of the old highway pavement, and about 8 feet therefrom; that when the pavement just referred to was finished, a strip of approximately 21 feet in width was paved continuously along the right-hand side of said boulevard for a distance of about one and one-quarter mile, and upon the completion thereof the opposite side was likewise paved, giving a width of the paved portion of the boulevard of 72 feet; that, prior to the work referred to, there was a fence along the property line of the southerly side of said boulevard; that the distance from the property line fence to the center of the pole referred to herein was 37 feet, and from the south curb to the center of the pole the distance was 25 feet. It thus appears that at the time of the accident there was a considerable portion of the paved part of Del Paso boulevard to the right of the pole in question, as well as to the left, and that the right-hand portion was of sufficient width for one to safely drive an automobile when traveling in a northeasterly direction. It further appears from the transcript, beyond any reasonable question, that, at the time of the injury complained of, a lighted lantern with a red globe was suspended in such a manner, upon the pole referred to, as to give notice to anyone approaching from the south, of the existence of the obstruction. As to the actions and movements of the plaintiff on the nights of November 13th and 14th, we find the following: That the defendant William Cottrell and his wife, and a man called Basil Filipino attended the first show of the Hippodrome Theatre on the evening of November 13th. After the show was over the three persons just mentioned went down to the automobile used during the time involved herein, and driven by the defendant Cottrell, and waited for Florence Jones and her husband to come to where the car was parked. Thereupon, all of the party got into the automobile and drove to the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Jones in North Sacramento, where they had a few drinks of what one of the witnesses called "Moonshine" or "Jackass Brandy"; that all five of the party went into the house. The witness Filipino testified that he had four or five drinks, and that others of the party did, also. After this all of the party went down to a place called the "All-Night Grocery," and had something to eat. Following this the party repaired to a place on Second and S streets, in the city of Sacramento, described as a "bootlegging joint"; that the party all went into the bootlegging joint and bought and drank some more liquor; that they all drank at the "joint"; that they were all together, buying drinks like that, each one buying his share; after this the party started for the Jones residence in North Sacramento. This witness could not give any account of how Mr. Cottrell drove on the way home; he does state, however, that Mr. Cottrell was drinking in the bootleg joint; that Mr. Jones was also drinking; that after leaving the bootleg joint, he, the witness, was intoxicated, and in his own language "went out." It further appears from the transcript that all of the party knew of the existence of the pole heretofore referred to. The transcript also shows that the plaintiff in this action was also drinking with the others of the party; and further shows that the plaintiff knew of the drinking to which we have referred. It appears from the transcript that the social party continued from the time of leaving the Hippodrome Theatre between 9 and 9:30 p. m. until about 1 o'clock a. m. The plaintiff testified, in relation to the intoxication of the defendant Cottrell, the driver of the automobile, as follows: "Mr. Cottrell was not intoxicated to my knowledge that night. In my deposition I testified that he had had other accidents, and that he was in a slightly intoxicated condition; I don't remember back there, but I remember now, he was not in an intoxicated condition, not incapable of handling the machine, or anything of that kind. I thought, of course, he had been drinking; he had a couple of drinks of what is commonly called 'Jackass Brandy'; I had one. I said nothing to him about his driving; I don't know that Mr. Cottrell had any further drinks at that place where we stopped in Sacramento, that night before we started home. I testified, at the time my deposition was taken, that it was my understanding that they went there for the purpose of getting a drink; that was my impression, that they went in there to drink. I knew of the existence of the poles; I had passed them twice a day most of the time for several years; I didn't look at the poles, but I knew I was in their vicinity, and said nothing to Mr. Cottrell about the poles. I did not attempt at any time to get out of the car, nor ask Mr. Cottrell to stop." This witness further testified, as to Cottrell driving: "He did not necessarily drive negligently as to speed that night; he does drive kind of fast, particularly with those poles there, he was driving fast that night; I know they like to ride fast; I did not care; I like to go slow." Upon cross-examination the witness (plaintiff) testified as follows, referring to Cottrell: "Well, I knew he had taken one drink; I knew that he had taken more than one drink at the time." Plaintiff further testified: "In my deposition I stated I knew he occasionally drove when he was drinking; it was a frequent occurrence for him to drink. I don't know as he drove often when drinking. I knew he had been drinking that night. All the other party had a little drink; none were what I would say intoxicated. Mr. Cottrell was feeling good, but I would not say he was intoxicated." The transcript further shows that the bootleg joint to which the party repaired was apparently conducted by a friend of plaintiff's husband. While at this bootleg joint the party engaged in dancing, singing, and drinking. The defendant Cottrell states that all of the party engaged in drinking at the bootleg joint. The plaintiff testified that she did not drink there. The husband of the plaintiff, who accompanied the party and participated in the drinking, would not say that Cottrell was either drunk or sober. On the way from the bootleg joint on Second and S streets, in the city of Sacramento, to the home of the Joneses in North Sacramento, the plaintiff occupied the front seat of the automobile with the defendant Cottrell. According to the testimony, the machine was driven at a speed of from 30 to 35 miles per hour, and on the way home, the defendant Cottrell, it appears swerved the machine a few times in close proximity to the curbing of the streets on which he was driving. It further appears from the testimony that the defendant Cottrell, as well as other members of the party, saw the red light on the power pole and attempted to swerve the machine so as to escape the collision. The light on the power pole was observed, according to the testimony, while the machine was at a distance therefrom of a half block or more. The defendant Cottrell testified that he was confused by lights of other machines approaching on the boulevard, just preceding the accident. Other members of the party testified that there were no approaching machines. From what the testimony shows as to the carousing of the party, the jury was warranted in drawing the inference that the defendant Cottrell was seeing lights where there were none. It appears also from the transcript that there was considerable arguing as to the manner of Cottrell's driving of the machine. The plaintiff herself testified that the defendant Cottrell made one of his daring attempts in the vicinity of the pole, referring to a swerving of the machine, and just before the accident said to the plaintiff that she was the only one in the car that had any sense. The scene of the accident was in a restricted zone, where the speed of automobiles was limited to 20 miles an hour. The testimony is conflicting as to who was the owner of the machine. The husband of the plaintiff originally bought the machine, and testified that he had sold his interest therein to the defendant Cottrell for the sum of $25. On the other hand, the defendant Cottrell states that the automobile belonged to the husband of the plaintiff. There is other evidence in the transcript concerning the actions of the party on the night in question, and of the condition of the participants after the collision, but what we have set forth is amply sufficient to justify the jury in coming to the conclusion that all of the men, at least, were under the influence of the intoxicating liquor which they had imbibed both at the home of the plaintiff and her husband, and also at the bootleg joint.

[3] The defendant Pacific Gas and Electric Company, in support of its contention that it was guilty of no negligence in maintaining its power poles, and especially the pole with which the collision occurred, in the place where said pole was then standing, introduced an ordinance granting a franchise to erect power poles along what was then called the "Old Auburn and Sacramento Roads," this franchise having been granted long prior to the incorporation of North Sacramento. A reading of this ordinance, however, does not indicate that the pole in controversy was where the defendant Pacific Gas and Electric Company had a right to place it, or where its grantors had a right to place it. Section 3 of the ordinance reads: "The poles for the support of said wires shall be of height and strength sufficient to forestall interference with the public safety, convenience and comfort, and so located at the side of the highway as not to disturb travel, and such poles shall be erected under the supervision of the Board of Supervisors of Sacramento County." So far as the transcript shows anything in relation to the original location of the poles, it appears that they were not located at the side of the highway, but were located, as shown by the testimony hereinbefore referred to, a number of feet therefrom, and the transcript, so far as it shows anything in relation thereto, shows that the poles were maintained for a considerable period of time, in a situation on the improved highway so as to constitute an obstruction to the free use of Del Paso boulevard. It appears that the Electric Company offered as a reason for not having removed the poles from the boulevard, that there was some delay in determining just where the poles should be located and the grant of a privilege to locate the poles elsewhere. It is evident, however, from the width of the street and the length of time required to pave the same for the distance mentioned in the testimony, and the time that elapsed after the completion of the improvement, that prompt action was not taken to remove the obstruction from the boulevard. There is some testimony to the effect that at the time the poles were erected the highway was not suitable for travel in the vicinity thereof, but there is also testimony in the record to the effect that for a considerable period the highway in the vicinity of the poles could be used, though it was a little rough. If testimony had been introduced to the effect that the poles were erected along the side of the highway, then, and in that case, the law relating to obstructions on the highway under license would apply, but as the testimony set forth in the transcript is only to the effect that the poles were erected under the franchise, and not where the franchise directed that they should be erected, it is unnecessary to consider the various cases relied upon by respondents, to justify the maintenance of the poles within the improved portion of the boulevard.

[4] This lack of showing that the pole in question was lawfully maintained in the situation where it stood at the time of the collision does not dispose of the case. Nor do we need to consider whether the defendant Pacific Gas and Electric Company had taken adequate means to warn automobile drivers of the then existence of the pole, as the defendant Cottrell, the plaintiff and the other persons composing the party, save Filipino, saw the red light and knew of the location and presence of the pole, and for the further reason that there is another element entering into this case which we think decisive. Section 112 of the California Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553, § 112) in force at the time of the collision, is as follows: "No person who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor or who is an habitual user of narcotic drugs shall drive a vehicle on any public highway within this state." This portion of the section is continued in force in the California Vehicle Act of 1929 (St. 1929, p. 537, § 44). It will be observed that the prohibition of the section applies even though the operator of the machine is not in the condition which in common parlance is called "drunk."

In the case of Jensen v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 133 Wash. 208, 233 P. 635, an instruction to the effect that if the driver of an automobile was, at the time of the accident, or immediately before, under the influence of intoxicating liquor, to such an extent as to dull his sense of sight and to prevent, or tend to prevent him from exercising the care and caution which a sober and prudent man would have exercised under the circumstances, and that Jensen (riding with the driver as a guest) knew, or should have known, of the driver's condition, and thereafter continued to ride with him, this would constitute negligence on Jensen's part, was approved. Thus, it is shown that the statute applies if the intoxication is to such a degree as to prevent, or tend to prevent, the driver of an automobile from exercising his normal faculties, and driving with the care and caution characteristic of a sober and prudent person. The facts related in the case to which we have referred are much less certain in demonstrating the fact of the driver of the automobile being under the influence of intoxicating liquor than appears in the instant case.

[5] In Schwartz v. Johnson, 152 Tenn. 586, 280 S. W. 32, 33, 47 A. L. R. 323, the Supreme Court of Tennessee, in passing upon the right of one to recover who voluntarily rides with an intoxicated driver, used the following language: "When one gets into an automobile which is to be operated by a drunken driver, through the traffic of a populous city, such person takes his life in his hands. All the authorities are to the effect that such contributory negligence prevents a recovery by one taking such a chance, if he is injured as a result of the driver's negligence." Citing Lynn v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 112, 148 P. 927, L. R. A. 1915E, 588; Jensen v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 133 Wash. 208, 233 P. 635; Winston's Administrator v. City of Henderson, 179 Ky. 220, 200 S. W. 330, L. R. A. 1918C, 646; Kirmse v. Chicago, etc., Co., 73 Ind. App. 537, 127 N. E. 837; Cunningham v. Erie Ry. Co., 137 App. Div. 506, 121 N. Y. S. 706. In Lynn v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 112, 148 P. 927, L. R. A. 1915E, 588, cited in the Schwartz Case, the following language is used: "While it is true that in general the negligence of the driver of a vehicle is not imputable to a passenger so as to bar that passenger's right of recovery" (citing cases) "yet the conduct of the plaintiff in riding and in continuing to ride in an automobile when he must have known that the driver was intoxicated established independent negligence * * * from the driver's negligence, barring the right of recovery." (Citing a number of cases.) In the instant case the plaintiff had every reason to know, and we think it is conclusively shown that she did know that the defendant Cottrell was under the influence of intoxicating liquor at all times while driving the automobile after leaving the home of the plaintiff in North Sacramento. The plaintiff's own testimony shows that the party repaired to the home of the plaintiff and her husband for the purpose of drinking "moonshine" or "jackass brandy," and that after the supply at this home was exhausted, the party went to a bootlegging joint situate several miles distant, for the purpose of securing additional drinks. Under such circumstances the cases which we have cited prohibit recovery on the part of the plaintiff, irrespective of whether the Pacific Gas and Electric Company had or did not have a legal right to maintain its power pole in the position that it occupied on the night of November 13, and morning of November 14, 1926. The testimony shows that the party involved in this proceeding knew of the existence of the pole, and saw the warning light, but notwithstanding this knowledge, the driver was apparently too drunk, and we might add that most of the party was too drunk to know where to drive to avoid the collision. Under the section of the Vehicle Act, the party had no right upon the highway; the party was violating the law, and as said in one of the cases, "they were taking their lives in their own hands."

Some complaint is made as to the instructions given and instructions refused, but a consideration of the instructions given by the court as a whole leads us to the conclusion that the jury was not misled in any particular to the prejudice of the plaintiff. On the subject of intoxication, the court instructed the jury substantially in form and effect as approved in the case of Jensen v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., supra.

Where one voluntarily participates in mid-night festivities leading to the drunken condition of an automobile driver, the law does not permit such an one to shut his eyes to the hazards of riding with the intoxicated driver and in the event of injury following his careless and negligent driving, hold a third party responsible in damages. We think such facts establish contributory negligence barring the right of recovery.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Exchange of property ⇨1—Contract for exchange of realty and personalty is entire, not separable, where nothing to contrary appears on its face.

Contract for exchange of real and personal property is entire, not separable, where nothing to the contrary appears on the face thereof.

2. Exchange of property ⇨8(3)—Plaintiffs cannot recover for breach of exchange contract, in absence of allegation, finding or proof of any damage (Civ. Code, § 3300).

Parties contracting to exchange realty for other realty and shares of corporate stock cannot recover for breach of contract on ground that stock certificates were worthless as representing shares sold for nonpayment of assessments, in absence of allegation, finding or proof of any damage; plaintiff not being entitled to recover damages in excess of detriment proximately caused by breach, under Civ. Code, § 3300.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Cliff Hahn and others against Frances E. Wilde, individually and as executrix of the estate of L. J. Wilde, deceased. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Ewell D. Moore, James Farraher, and Ben S. Hunter, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. W. A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J.

In their amended complaint the plaintiffs allege in paragraphs I and II the capacity of the defendants. Continuing, they allege that in November, 1925, the plaintiffs and the defendants entered into a contract of exchange. Continuing, they allege that the defendants were to transfer certain properties, real and personal, giving exact descriptions but not stating any value on the real property and not stating any value on the personal property. The personal property consisted of thirty shares of the corporate stock of the U. S. Grant Hotel and Office Building Company. It was further alleged that, while negotiations were pending, the parties agreed on forty additional shares in the place of one piece of real estate. Then it is alleged that the defendants transferred all properties according to the agreement, but that the certificates of capital stock represented shares of stock that had theretofore been sold for the nonpayment of assessments and that said certificates were worthless and without value, although each share of stock purported on its face to be of the par value of one hundred dollars and the total to be of the value of seven thousand dollars. Finally, it is alleged that prior to the commencement of this action the plaintiffs offered to return the certificate to the defendants, but that their offer was refused. The defendants appeared and answered, and, in their answer, they denied all of the material allegations regarding the certificates of stock as being worthless and of no value, and continuing, they set forth that in the contract of exchange the shares of corporate stock were by the express agreement of the parties thrown in for good measure.

The trial court made general findings which were in favor of the plaintiffs. From a judgment entered thereon, the defendants have appealed.

[1-2] In their brief the defendants assert that the corporate stock was never properly sold for nonpayment of assessments; that the certificates were all that they purported to be on their face; that the plaintiffs were never precluded from exercising any of their rights as stockholders; that the stock was not turned in at par; that the stock was part and parcel of the property transferred by the defendants and is not separable from the other properties transferred by them; that the plaintiffs failed to prove tender prior to suit; that the plaintiffs' offer to restore was incomplete and insufficient; and that the trial court erred in allowing interest as from December 26, 1925, the date the exchange was completed. In reply the plaintiffs assert that the action is not for rescission, that it is not for damages, but that it is to recover the par value of the stock. In support of this claim they cite and rely on Beckwith v. Sheldon, 168 Cal. 742, 145 P. 97, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 963. That case is not at all helpful to the plaintiffs. In the first place, in the instant case the contract was entirely executed on both sides and there was nothing left in the nature of a covenant by which either party was bound to make any payment. In the second place, Beckwith v. Sheldon deals with executory contracts in which one of the parties covenants to pay a sum of money in specific articles at a fixed rate. In the instant case we have no such contract before us. On the contrary, we are dealing with a simple contract of exchange by the terms of which the plaintiff agreed to transfer to the defendants certain real property and the defendants agreed to transfer in exchange therefor certain other real properties and the certificates hereinabove mentioned and referred to. If there has been a breach of an implied warranty of title as to any item of property covered by the contract, the plaintiffs have several remedies (23 C. J. 227). Nothing to the contrary appearing on the face of the contract, it is entire and not separable (1 C. J. 1111). The plaintiffs cite no authority and we know of none that authorizes them to recover any damages in excess of "the detriment proximately caused" by the breach (Civ. Code, § 3300). In the record before us there is no allegation, finding, or proof, of any damage.

The judgment is reversed.

DOCKSTADER v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF LEMOORE et al.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF LEMOORE v. DOCKSTADER et al.

Civ. 202.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 19, 1930.

1. Deeds ⇨194(5)—Recording by wife of husband's deed to her implied delivery.

In action by wife to quiet title against judgment creditor of husband claiming judgment lien upon land in suit, where wife's sole muniment of title was deed from husband alleged by her to have been delivered and proved to have been recorded by her, act of recording implied delivery.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨259(1)—Cross-complaint praying cancellation of husband's deed to wife which she recorded held sufficiently to plead delivery, especially where wife denied nondelivery.

In wife's action to quiet title against judgment creditor of husband, a bank, cross-complaint by bank praying cancellation of husband's deed to wife which she had recorded sufficiently pleaded execution and delivery, where wife in answer to cross-complaint denied nondelivery of deed and relied upon it as sole muniment of title.

3. Quieting title ⇨44(2)—Testimony that witness bank cashier would not have lent money if he knew debtor did not own property was incompetent to show circumstances of loan by another cashier.

In wife's action to quiet title against husband's judgment creditor, a bank, which had lent him money in reliance on his ownership of property in suit, testimony by bank cashier that he would not have made loan if he had known that husband was not owner of property was incompetent to show circumstances surrounding loan in question, which was made by another cashier.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—Cashier's testimony that he would not loan money if debtor did not own property was harmless, evidence showing that debtor made misrepresentations to lender.

In wife's action against husband's judgment creditor, a bank, to quiet title to land which husband, after conveying to her, had represented as his property to secure loan from bank, testimony by cashier who had not made loan that he would not lend money if he knew debtor did not own property, although improperly admitted, was not prejudicial in view of evidence and finding that debtor induced loan by representing himself as owner of property, and that such property was community property and hence subject to husband's debts.

5. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨300(5)—Deed by husband to wife held under evidence for adequate consideration.

In action by wife against judgment creditor of husband to quiet title to property deeded to her by husband, evidence that brother-in-law who had boarded with family for many years had conveyed his interest in property to husband with understanding that after debts were paid it should be conveyed to wife held to show trust in husband, executed by deed to wife, which was therefore upon adequate consideration.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Findings supported by material evidence were conclusive on appellate court in action to quiet title.

In action by wife to quiet title to land which husband, after conveying to her, had represented as his own in order to obtain loan from defendant bank which claimed judgment lien on property, findings supported by material evidence were conclusive on appeal.

7. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨299(10)—Evidence held not to show intent to defraud creditors by conveyance to wife.

In action by wife to quiet title to land conveyed to her by husband under deed alleged to be fraudulent as to creditors, evidence that wife collected rent, advertised in her own name for renters, paid taxes and insurance with her own checks, and that deed was acknowledged before notary who customarily took acknowledgments for judgment creditor, tended to show that failure to record deed was not due to intent to deceive creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; K. Van Zante, Judge.

Action by Lou E. Dockstader against the First National Bank of Lemoore and others to quiet title to two parcels of land. The bank filed a cross-complaint demanding cancellation of plaintiff's deeds. From judgment in favor of plaintiff as to one parcel, and in favor of the bank as to the other, both parties appeal.

Affirmed.

Claude L. Rowe, of Fresno, for Lou E. Dockstader.

Clark Clement, of Lemoore, for First Nat. Bank of Lemoore.

SLOANE, P. J.

This appeal involves title to two parcels of land in Kings county which may be sufficiently referred to for purposes of this opinion respectively as the "McBee ranch" and the "Lemoore property."

For an understanding of the case the following preliminary facts may be stated: While both parcels of land stood of record in the name of the defendant J. W. Dockstader, he obtained loans of money aggregating the sum of $11,800 on credit of the reputed ownership of said real property, from the defendant and cross-complainant, the First National Bank of Lemoore, a national banking corporation.

The bank afterwards brought suit to recover on this loan and procured an attachment lien thereon, subsequently merged into a judgment lien. The plaintiff, Lou E. Dockstader, wife of defendant J. W. Dockstader, claiming ownership of both parcels of real property, thereafter commenced the present action to quiet title against her husband and the bank.

The husband disclaimed, and the bank by answer denied plaintiff's title, and alleged, by way of cross-complaint, that plaintiff's claim of ownership was based upon two separate deeds from her said husband executed in fraud of the latter's creditors, particularly the cross-complainant bank, and demanding the setting aside and cancellation of said deeds.

The trial court gave judgment in favor of plaintiff, quieting her title to the Lemoore property, and in favor of the cross-complainant bank, sustaining its lien on the McBee ranch.

Both parties have appealed, the plaintiff as to the McBee ranch and the cross-complainant as to the Lemoore property.

The issues as to the McBee property, being the less complicated, will be first disposed of.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

The trial court's findings as to the McBee property are sufficient to sustain the judgment for cross-complainant. The sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings is not questioned.

Plaintiff's claim for a reversal is based upon her objection alleging insufficiency of the cross-complaint to state a cause of action, and certain alleged errors of the court in the admission of evidence at the trial.

Plaintiff's counsel thus states the alleged insufficiency of the cross-complaint.

"Respondent nowhere in his cross-complaint alleges a transfer of the property from Mr. Dockstader to respondent (appellant), or title in her. In fact they directly aver that the essential element of a transfer, viz., a delivery of the deed, is lacking."

[1] This refers to the deed alleged in the cross-complaint to have been dated on the first day of August, 1925, and recorded on the 11th day of April, 1927, purporting to convey title to the McBee property from J. W. Dockstader to the plaintiff, his wife, and which is claimed by her as the sole muniment of her title to this ranch. She in her answer to the cross-complaint denies that it was not delivered; the trial court found that it was delivered. The undisputed evidence shows that it was filed for record by her, and its recordation under these circumstances implies a delivery.

Since prior to the execution of this deed her husband, J. W. Dockstader, was the record owner of the McBee ranch, a holding that there had been no delivery of this deed would leave appellant without any evidence of title whatever, and while such finding might leave no deed subject to cancellation, it would leave appellant without a color of title to be quieted.

[2] We think the execution and delivery to appellant of this deed from her husband to the McBee ranch is sufficiently pleaded and shown by the evidence, and that the deed was subject to annulment and cancellation upon a showing that it was fraudulently given.

[3, 4] The objections to the introduction of evidence are equally without merit. They were directed to questions addressed by counsel for cross-complainant to the witness Campbell. At the time the loans to defendant J. W. Dockstader were made, one N. W. Sorrick was cashier and manager of the bank and conducted the negotiations. At the time of the trial, the witness Campbell was cashier and manager. He was permitted to answer, over appellant's objection, a question propounded by counsel for respondent as to whether Mr. Campbell during the time he was manager would have extended this credit to defendant Dockstader, had he know the latter had deeded this property to his wife. He answered: "Why I might have extended a small amount of credit to Mr. Dockstader." "I would not have renewed the $11,500 note unless Mrs. Dockstader signed the note."

This question and answer might have been directed to the custom of the bank in such matters, but it was clearly incompetent to show whether or not the transaction in question at the time the note was renewed was influenced by the state of the title to this property, as this witness was not present when the loans were made.

The matter is shorn of prejudice, however, by the fact that the cross-complaint alleges other evidence was introduced and the trial court found that the renewal of these loans to J. W. Dockstader were induced by reliance on his representations that he was at the time the owner of all this real property.

Besides, under the findings and judgment of the trial court, it is adjudged that the McBee ranch was at all times the community property of Mr. and Mr. Dockstader, and was subject to J. W. Dockstader's debts.

The judgment affirming cross-complainant's lien on the McBee property is affirmed.

Cross-Complainant's Appeal.

The findings of the trial court sustaining the title of plaintiff, Lou E. Dockstader, to the premises described as the Lemoore property are to the following effect:

That it is true that plaintiff above named, Lou E. Dockstader, is now and for a long time hitherto has been the owner and in possession of those pieces and parcels of property situate in the county of Kings, state of California (describing the Lemoore property).

That it is true that the First National Bank of Lemoore claims and asserts an interest in said real property hereinabove set forth, adverse to the plaintiff.

That it is true that said defendant cross-complainant has not any estate, right, title, or interest whatever in said land or premises or in any part thereof. (Referring to the Lemoore property.)

That it is true that said cross-complainant, First National Bank of Lemoore, claims an interest in all of said described real property, upon the ground that said J. W. Dockstader is the owner thereof as community property, and that it is true that said cross-complainant claims an interest in said property upon the alleged ground that the conveyances thereof from the defendant J. W. Dockstader to his wife, Lou E. Dockstader, are void because they were recorded with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the cross-complainant, but that said claims, as far as the Lemoore property is concerned, are unfounded.

That it is untrue that ever since the 9th day of March, 1918, the said J. W. Dockstader has been or now is the owner or in possession of the said Lemoore property.

That it is not true that said deed of March 9, 1918, conveying the Lemoore property to Lou E. Dockstader was never delivered.

That it is true that the said J. W. Dockstader and said Lou E. Dockstader are and at all times herein mentioned were husband and wife, and for many years prior thereto had been husband and wife.

That it is not true that all of the property in the complaint described has been acquired and is community property, and it is not true that said property has always been treated by the said J. W. Dockstader and the said Lou E. Dockstader as community property, save and except that it is true that said property described as the McBee ranch has been acquired during their marriage out of community earnings, and is community property and has been treated by said J. W. Dockstader and Lou E. Dockstader as community property.

That it is true that on various times and occasions from and including the 4th day of October, 1922, to the 27th day of January, 1927, the said J. W. Dockstader orally represented to said bank that he was and is the owner of all of the real property in said complaint described or referred to.

That it is true that he so represented to said bank at the time he negotiated the said loan commencing on the 4th day of October, 1922.

That it is true that he so represented in a written financial statement on the 22d day of May, 1924, or on the 6th day of March, 1926, or on the 27th day of January, 1927.

That it is true that said bank made said loans on the representations of said J. W. Dockstader that he owned all of said property.

That it is not true that said cross-defendant, Lou E. Dockstader, knew said loans were being made, and/or said money being obtained by the said cross-defendant J. W. Dockstader on the representation that he was the owner of all of said property.

That it is not true that said bank had no knowledge of the existence of said conveyance of March 9, 1918, prior to or on or about the 12th day of April, 1927; or for the reason that the recordation of said deed was not published in the official real estate reports in said county of Kings, but said bank had constructive knowledge of the recording of said deed.

That it is not true that of said sum of $11,500 the sum of $6,800 was borrowed from said bank by the said J. W. Dockstader to build a dwelling house upon a portion of said Lemoore property.

That it is true that the said J. W. Dockstader has not in his name any property out of which said judgment shall be satisfied.

That it is true that said bank made said loans on the representation of said J. W. Dockstader that he owned said McBee ranch.

That it is true that when said J. W. Dockstader procured said loans from said bank he was solvent and in good financial circumstances.

That it is not true that there was no consideration paid or given for said deed of March 9, 1918, but that it is true that a valuable consideration was paid by the said Lou E. Dockstader to the said J. W. Dockstader for said deed of March 9, 1918, to the Lemoore property.

That it is not true that said deed of March 9, 1918, was recorded as a part of a scheme on the part of the said J. W. Dockstader and Lou E. Dockstader, or either of them, formed with the intent and/or purpose of preventing said bank from collecting said indebtedness.

That it is true that said Lemoore property is exempt from execution under said judgment No. 528 of said bank against said J. W. Dockstader.

That it is true that in equity and good conscience the said cross-defendant, Lou E. Dockstader, should be permitted to retain the said Lemoore property conveyed as aforesaid.

The cross-complainant bases its appeal from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Lou E. Dockstader, affecting the Lemoore property on the alleged ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings on which the part of the judgment appealed from is predicated. The substance of the cross-complainant appellant's position is that the court having found that the loans in question to J. W. Dockstader were induced by fraudulent representations relied upon by the bank that he was the owner of these two parcels of land, and the fact that plaintiff, Lou E. Dockstader, retained the deed from her husband to the Lemoore property unrecorded, covering all of the periods of negotiations of these loans, and that the money procured by the loans was used in large measure and presumptively with knowledge of the wife, in the improvement of the Lemoore property, raises a strong implication that she had knowledge of the fact that these loans were being granted on the strength of the apparent ownership of the real property by the husband. There would be strong reason for this contention if respondent's claim that the Lemoore property was deeded to Mrs. Dockstader by her husband as a gift and without a consideration from her was true. Respondent states his case at page 33 of his opening brief as follows:

"Clearly the court has found that J. W. Dockstader was guilty of fraud. The question in this case therefore, is whether the wife, Lou E. Dockstader, should be permitted to claim that she is the owner of the property, after holding an unrecorded deed for nine years, and permitting her husband thereby to commit a fraud on the bank, by representing that he was the owner of this particular property, and obtaining credit thereon."

Respondent quotes largely from the case of Bush & Mallett Co. v. Helbing, 134 Cal. 676, 66 P. 967. This was an action in which a deed was made May 15, 1893, by the defendant Louis Helbing to his wife Louise Helbing, when plaintiff was not a creditor of the defendant Helbing. The deed so made to the defendant was executed as a deed of gift.

The Supreme Court says in the course of the opinion:

"One of the main questions in the case is as to whether or not such deed is void as to subsequent creditors. The general rule is that a deed of gift is valid if the grantor was not indebted at the time he made it, or had ample means outside of the property conveyed with which to pay his indebtedness. This is so held for the reason that a man's property is his own, and he has a right to give it away if he so desires. If it be made while the grantor is free from debt, or while his solvency is not questioned, and he has ample means, after so deeding part of his property, to meet all his obligations, it can injure no one, and it is not the business of any one except the grantor and grantee.

"To this rule there is a well-known exception. This exception is that a deed of gift fraudulent in its inception, and made with an intent to enable the grantor to defraud future creditors, is void. A creditor has the right to believe that his debtor has dealt fairly with him, and if, in view of future indebtedness, and secretly, without the knowledge of the creditor, the debtor makes a fraudulent conveyance of his property, upon which he knows his contemplated creditor relies, or has a right to rely, this is actual fraud, and renders the conveyance void."

The trial court had held that this deed could not be defeated as to the defendant, the wife of the grantor, because of the fact that it had not been shown that she was a party to the fraud. The opinion continues:

"In this view of the law the court was in error. A deed of gift made by the grantor for the purpose of defrauding his creditors is none the less fraudulent because the grantee took no part in the fraud. Such grantee is not a purchaser for value, and, being the party benefited by the gift, receiving that for which nothing has been paid, is not in a position to claim the benefit of a conveyance made for the express purpose of defrauding creditors. A man must be just before he is generous. If he makes a deed of gift to his wife, it must be with no fraudulent purpose, and openly and under such circumstances that the law will impute no fraud as to his conduct.

"It is well settled that it is the motive of the grantor, and not the knowledge of the grantee, that determines the validity of the transfer. The grantee, however innocent, cannot retain the fruits of a voluntary fraudulent transfer. * * *

"The court below was of the opinion that defendant Louise [Helbing] must have been shown to have intended the fraud, and to have been connected with it. If this were true, as a proposition of law, her intention might be inferred from her conduct and all the circumstances of the case. It is well said by Wait, in his work on Fraudulent Convey- ances (section 281): 'In litigations of the class under consideration, great latitude should undoubtedly be allowed in regard to the admission of circumstantial evidence for the purpose of proving participation in manifest fraud. Objections to testimony as irrelevant are not favored in such cases, since the force of circumstances depends so much upon their number and connection. The evidence should be permitted to take a wide range, as in most cases fraud is predicated on circumstances, and not upon direct proof.'

"In this case the deed was made without consideration. The grantor continued to deal with the property as before. The deed was kept secret and not placed of record. When the wife was called upon to testify, the husband objected. The materials went into her property, with her knowledge, and with no statement to plaintiff as to her title. All these matters might be true, and yet the deed might have been made with no intent to defraud. But the circumstances certainly are such as to call for a full, fair, and complete explanation. The burden was shifted upon the defendant to show that the transaction was honest, and with no fraudulent purpose. The fact that a deed is kept secret and not recorded is a very potent badge of fraud. In Francis v. Lawrence, 48 N. J. Eq. 511, 22 A. 259, the wife retained a deed, and the husband obtained credit by representing that he was the owner of the house and lot conveyed. In speaking of the transaction, the court said:

"At the time of these representations, except the first, his wife was in possession of a conveyance of the property from him to his brother-in-law for the purpose of vesting the title in her name. The deed was not delivered to the grantee, and not placed upon the record, but was held by the wife; and the husband was thus enabled to trade upon the false credit which he acquired by being the apparent owner of the property, while the deed was ready to be put upon the record at a moment's notice."

Respondent has strongly fortified his position with citations supporting this view of the law, and there was undoubtedly much evidence introduced on the trial of the present case tending to justify an inference that the wife and plaintiff here had notice that her husband was obtaining credit on the strength of his record title to this property. If the trial court had not found against these contentions and there had not been sufficient conflict in the evidence to give substance to the conclusions of the trial court, the judgment here might well have been rendered against the cross-defendant, but we think that there was substantial evidence to support the findings of the court against the cross-complainant as to the Lemoore property.

[5] On the important question of consideration, the evidence disclosed that the defendant J. W. Dockstader and a deceased brother, Hi Dockstader, had been for many years copartners in all of their property holdings and business transactions, and that this property was acquired by them as such copartners. That the brother, Hi Dockstader, had been an inmate of the household of his brother, J. W. Dockstader, and that Mrs. Dockstader had for many years boarded him and rendered personal services for him, and that it was his purpose that his interest in the property should ultimately go to Mrs. Dockstader in a manner to compensate her for the obligations he felt he had incurred. Prior to his death he conveyed all of his interest to his brother, J. W. Dockstader, with the agreement and understanding that the latter should hold and administer the same until all the debts and incumbrances thereon were paid off, and that he should then convey this Lemoore property to Mrs. J. W. Dockstader for the benefit of herself and the children. This arrangement amounted to a trust in J. W. Dockstader which was finally executed by the conveyance of March 9, 1918, of the Lemoore property to the plaintiff, Lou E. Dockstader, and we think was upon an adequate consideration.

[6] Our examination of the record discloses that on each point of alleged insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a specified finding, there was some material evidence to justify the finding which makes it conclusive on this court.

It may be said that the evidence that cross-complainant was not without notice of the existence of the unrecorded conveyance to Mrs. Dockstader of the Lemoore property is very slight. Of course, the constructive notice of the recording of this deed after the 27th of September, 1926, the date of such recordation, is sufficient. But there is some evidence that prior to that time officers of the bank were informed that Mrs. Dockstader owned the Lemoore property. There is the testimony of J. W. Dockstader in answer to the question "Q. Did you ever tell the First National Bank or any of its officers that you deeded this property (referring to the Lemoore property) to your wife? A. I told Mr. Hinkle that that was my wife's property. Mr. Hinkle was one of the cashiers, clerks of the bank." A witness, Bramkamp, testified that he was present at a conversation between J. W. Dockstader and Mr. Sorrick, the cashier and manager of the bank, who supervised the Dockstader loan, and that he heard Sorrick make the statement that Mr. Hinkle took the first financial statement from Dockstader. This was corroborated by the witness Cochrane, who testified to a statement of Mr. Sorrick, made in his presence, to the effect that he thought Mr. Hinkle had taken the first financial statement from Mr. Dockstader and that Sorrick said: "It was probably the general run for the bank for Mr. Hinkle to take care of that."

[7] Tending at least to show that the failure to record the deed to the Lemoore property was not by reason of any intent to deceive or defraud creditors, are the facts testified to that at all times subsequent to the date of the deed in question, Mrs. Dockstader collected any rentals accruing on the Lemoore property, advertised in her own name for renters, paid the taxes and insurance with her own checks and from her own funds, although these were kept in a joint account with her husband, and there is some significance in this connection, to the fact that the deed itself was acknowledged before the notary who customarily took acknowledgments for the bank. These conditions would not likely exist in connection with any deliberate intent to conceal the transfer from the bank.

Mrs. Dockstader herself denies that she had any knowledge of any loans to her husband, negotiated by the bank, in reliance upon his apparent or represented ownership of this property by her husband; and Mr. Dockstader testified that he at no time informed his wife of these loans. The bank never called them to her attention. It may be assumed that in their business and domestic relations she was aware that he was securing money from some source, but as he was evidently a man of considerable affairs, and at the time solvent, it may reasonably be assumed that it did not occur to her that his credit was being bolstered up on any assumption that he owned this particular property.

Dealing with matters of inference from the conduct and relations of all the parties, it may be a matter of doubt as to the amount of reliance placed on any of the financial statements alleged to have been made to the bank.

Mr. Dockstader was evidently in the confidence of the bank as a steady patron, and on the basis of his general solvency, which existed until sometime after the placing of these loans. Even the criticisms of the bank examiner as to the unsecured conditions of these notes did not lead the bank to any particular investigation or attempt to obtain security.

To the extent, at least, of the value of the McBee ranch, it turns out that cross-complainant was not prejudiced by any misapprehensions as to its ownership.

The finding that the Lemoore property is exempt from execution, when qualified as it is by the statement contained in the finding, that it is exempt from the judgment obtained by the bank against J. W. Dockstader, is clearly correct under the general finding that this property belongs to the plaintiff, Lou E. Dockstader, who was not a party to the judgment.

Without going into the details of the voluminous transcript of the evidence, we are satisfied that the judgment quieting plain-tiff's title to the Lemoore property cannot be overturned for insufficiency of the evidence.

Both judgments are affirmed.

TRACY v. GAUDIN.*
Civ. 94.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
Feb. 19, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 17, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 17, 1930.

1. Executors and administrators $\S$ 92—Infants $\S$ 58(2)—Except in certain instances, contract of minor under eighteen may be disaffirmed by minor or his personal representatives without return of consideration (Civ. Code, $\S$ 35).

Under Civ. Code, $\S$ 35, contract of minor under age of eighteen may be disaffirmed by minor or by his personal representatives, in case of death, without return of consideration received, except in instances specified in statute.

2. Executors and administrators $\S$ 156—Administrator of minor of 16, who purchased automobile, could disaffirm contract and recover money without making or offering restitution (Civ. Code, $\S$ 35).

Where minor, 16 years of age, forged name of his guardian to bank withdrawal slip on which he obtained money with which he purchased automobile, and shortly thereafter died, minor's administrator, as personal representative, could disaffirm contract and recover money without restoring, or offering to restore, consideration to seller under Civ. Code, $\S$ 35.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Percy Tracy, as administrator of the estate of Harold Tracy, deceased, against G. C. Gaudin. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

G. W. Zartman, of Tulare, for appellant.
Walter C. Haight, of Visalia, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

Respondent instituted this action to recover the sum of $510 from appellant, being money paid him by Harold Tracy, deceased, then a minor under the age of eighteen years, as the purchase price of an automobile. Judgment was rendered in his favor.

The case was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts from which it appears that on June 10, 1926, Harold Tracy was of the age of sixteen years, and that Percy Tracy was the duly and regularly appointed and acting guardian of his person and estate. The guardian had the sum of $576.51, belonging to the minor, on deposit in a bank in the city of Tulare. Appellant owned and operated an agency for the sale of automobiles and Harold Moffet was employed by him as a salesman. The minor went with Moffet to the home of Percy Tracy, the guardian, and tried to get his permission for the purchase of an automobile by the minor, from appellant, with guardianship funds. This permission was refused by the guardian.

About June 18, 1926, the minor forged the name of his guardian to a withdrawal slip, on which he obtained $510 of the guardianship funds from the bank, which he placed in the form of a cashier's check, with which he purchased an automobile from appellant, paying for the same in full. A few days later the minor traded the automobile, purchased from appellant, to another as part payment on a more expensive car. The minor died on July 23, 1926, and Percy Tracy was appointed administrator of his estate on August 11, 1926, and thereafter qualified as such and entered upon the discharge of his duties.

The exact date respondent first learned of the withdrawal of the $510 by the minor from the guardianship account does not appear, except that it was after the automobile obtained from appellant had been traded off by the minor, and prior to August 9, 1926. On this day the bank credited the guardianship account with $510, which credit it later canceled and refused to restore the money to respondent. At no time did either the minor or respondent restore, or offer to restore, to appellant the automobile which the minor had purchased from him, or its value. On January 7, 1927, respondent demanded the sum of $510 from appellant, which demand was refused. This action was instituted to recover the money and judgment was rendered for respondent.

[1] The law is well settled in this state that, except in certain specified instances, of which this is not one, a contract of a minor under the age of eighteen years may be disaffirmed by the minor, or by his personal representatives, in case of death, without the return of the consideration received by the minor. Section 35, Civ. Code. As was said in the case of Flittner v. Equitable Life Assurance Society, 30 Cal. App. 209, 157 P. 630, 633, in passing upon a contract of a minor under eighteen years of age:

"The law in its wisdom shields minors from their lack of judgment and experience, and vests in them under certain conditions the right to disaffirm their contracts. That right the plaintiff in this case invoked, and he was thereupon entitled to recover the premiums theretofore paid by him. This position may seem, under all the circumstances of the case, to be a hardship on the defendant, but 'the right of an infant to avoid his contracts is one conferred by law for his protection against his own improvidence and the designs of others; and though its exercise is not infrequently the occasion of injury to those who have in good faith dealt with him, this is a consequence which they might have avoided by declining to enter into the contract. It is the policy of the law to discourage adults from contracting with infants, and the former cannot complain if, as a consequence of their violation of this rule of conduct, they are injured by the exercise of the right with which the law has purposely invested the latter, nor charge that the infant in exercising the right is guilty of fraud.'"

[2] In this case the minor had received and retained the benefits of his contract, and was not required to restore the consideration or its equivalent. To the same effect are the cases of Hakes Investment Co. v. Lyons, 166 Cal. 557, 137 P. 911; Cummings v. Strobridge Land Syndicate et al., 150 Cal. 209, 88 P. 901, 119 Am. St. Rep. 189; and Maier v. Harbor Center Land Co., 41 Cal. App. 79, 182 P. 345.

In the case of Lee v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, 177 Cal. 656, 171 P. 677, the Supreme Court considered a case in which a minor brought suit to escape liability under a note secured by a deed of trust to secure the repayment of money loaned her before she was eighteen years of age, and which loan she attempted to confirm and ratify before her eighteenth birthday. The court held that there was no duty resting upon the minor to either restore, or offer to restore, the consideration received by her for the execution of the note, and held the obligation void. The contract of a minor under eighteen years of age, relating to real property or to personal property not in his immediate possession or control, is void. Section 33, Civ. Code. All other contracts of minors under eighteen years of age, except those specified in sections 36 and 37 of the Civil Code, are voidable by the minor, or his heirs or personal representatives in case of death, without restoring, or offering to restore, the consideration or its equivalent. Section 35, Civ. Code; 14 Cal. Jur. 127. Harold Tracy being under the age of eighteen years at the time he paid appellant for the automobile, his personal representative could disaffirm the contract and recover the money without restoring, or offering to restore, the consideration to appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

BREWER v. BENTON et al.*

Civ. 3928.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Feb. 17, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 19, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 18, 1930.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 931(4)—Evidence warranted finding that plaintiff given judgment below for damages to automobile when forced off highway by passing car was not contributorily negligent.

In action for damages to automobile resulting when plaintiff's car was forced off narrow roadway by defendant who was attempting to pass plaintiff, evidence held sufficient to warrant reviewing court's finding, in support of judgment for plaintiff and in absence of finding on issue by trial court, that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence by driving in center of paved highway and neglecting and refusing to allow defendant sufficient room in which to pass.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 931(4)—Reviewing court in support of judgment for plaintiff may supply finding of want of contributory negligence inadvertently omitted by trial court (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 956a).

Where trial court, in action for damages on account of defendant's negligence, adopted findings in favor of plaintiff upon material issues, except that of contributory negligence, and rendered judgment for plaintiff and preponderance of evidence refutes theory of contributory negligence, and it is apparent that the trial court inadvertently omitted to adopt a finding on that issue, reviewing court is authorized, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 956a, to supply the omitted finding.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action by Arthur N. Brewer against W. A. Benton and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed, with additional finding.

Evan J. Hughes, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Butler, Van Dyke, Desmond & Harris, of Sacramento, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment for damages to the plaintiff's automobile sustained by coming in contact with an electric power pole when his car was crowded from the highway by the passing of defendant Benton's machine. A reversal of the judgment is sought on the sole ground that the trial court failed to adopt findings upon the issue of contributory negligence.

The plaintiff was driving his automobile along the highway from Sacramento to Rio Linda. It was a narrow roadway. The paved portion was but ten feet in width with a five or six foot shoulder on either side. The plaintiff was traveling about 30 miles an hour. The defendant Benton was driving his Studebaker car which approached from behind the plaintiff's machine. After first passing an intervening Ford coupé, the defendant claims to have sounded his horn and then attempted to pass the plaintiff's car by traveling along the extreme left-hand portion of the highway with his automobile running almost entirely on the dirt shoulder of the road. He admits traveling 36 or 38 miles an hour. Both the plaintiff and his companion who sat by his side testified that the defendant did not sound his horn and that he was traveling 40 or 45 miles an hour. The defendant testified that as his car reached a point opposite the plaintiff's machine the front wheels of his automobile struck a little trench across the roadway and that it was suddenly thrown toward the plaintiff's machine. He said: "There is a little drain over there, probably three or eight inches (wide), and when I passed him the rear end of my car gave a swing like (toward his car)." Both the plaintiff and his companion testified that they were traveling about 30 miles an hour on the right-hand side of the roadway, and heard no horn, but suddenly discovered the defendant's car when it was nearly opposite their car; that it was traveling at a rapid rate of speed estimated at 40 or 45 miles an hour and that it swerved and came at an acute angle directly toward their car; that in order to avoid a collision it was necessary for the plaintiff to turn his car off of the highway entirely; that in doing so, he lost control of the machine and it ran through a ditch which paralleled the highway and collided with a telephone pole, seriously damaging the car.

In separate answers which were filed in behalf of the defendants, contributory negligence was pleaded in the following language: "The plaintiff left the said road and collided with a certain power line pole * * * as the direct and proximate result of his own contributory negligence * * * in this, that the said plaintiff was negligently and carelessly driving in the center of said paved highway and failed, refused and neglected to allow defendants sufficient room in which to pass said plaintiff."

[1] A judgment for $880, which was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, is amply supported by the evidence. Indeed the appellants' sole claim of error upon which they seek a reversal is the failure of the trial court to adopt findings upon the issue of contributory negligence. This was clearly an inadvertence which occurred in the preparation and presenting of findings. Apparently all available testimony was adduced at the trial. No benefit could be derived by a retrial of the case. From the fact that the trial court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and adopted findings favorable to him upon all the issues in the case except that of contributory negligence, it is evident that this issued was overlooked, and that a finding on this issue would have also been favorable to the plaintiff if it had been presented and adopted. It is true that, while there is a conflict of evidence respecting the charge that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in driving along the wrong side of the highway, the evidence upon this subject strongly preponderates in favor of the plaintiff. Only three persons saw the accident. They were the drivers of the respective cars and a companion of the plaintiff, who differ as to whether the plaintiff was driving on the wrong side of the highway. The physical facts seem to preclude the theory that he was on the wrong side of the road, for the highway was narrow and the defendant's car succeeded in reaching a point opposite the plaintiff's machine before the course was changed. This seems to confirm the plaintiff's claim that he was running on his proper side of the highway. The plaintiff's associate who rode with him upon this occasion testified as follows:

"Q. On what side of the road was Brewer driving that car just before the collision occurred? A. On the right side, the car was off as far as it could be driven.

"Q. You are sure of that? A. Positive."

The only other witness to the incident was Mrs. Redmond, who was called by the defendants. It is impossible to tell from her evidence which machine she thought was taking too much space on the highway. Her evidence is valueless.

[2] Under such circumstances when the trial court has adopted findings in favor of the plaintiff upon all the material issues except that of contributory negligence and has rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and the clear preponderance of the evidence refutes the theory of contributory negligence, and it is apparent the trial court has inadvertently omitted to adopt a finding upon that issue, but would have determined the issue favorable to the plaintiff, in support of the judgment and in accordance with justice the reviewing court is authorized to supply the omitted finding pursuant to the provisions of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure and thus avoid the unnecessary expense and cost of a new trial. This statutory provision concludes with this sentence: " * * * This section shall be liberally construed to the end, among others, that whenever possible causes may be finally disposed of by a single appeal and without further proceedings in the trial court, except where the interest of justice requires a new trial."

In the case of Tupman v. Haberkern (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 970, 974, the Supreme Court has very properly said it was not the purpose of the legislature in enacting section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure to transform the reviewing courts into trial courts or to authorize the appellate courts to set aside findings which the trial court has adopted or substitute contrary findings when in doing so it is necessary for the reviewing court to pass upon the preponderance of evidence, for the reason that the trial court is better qualified to exercise that function, since it has the opportunity of observing the witnesses on the stand and determining their credibility. In the last-mentioned case the court says: "The appellate courts will not develop into trial courts because they will undoubtedly exercise this power [of modifying findings] sparingly and will refer any complicated questions of new evidence to the trial court or a referee for hearing." But the court also added: "Whenever possible, and the interests of justice would seem to require, the reviewing court should have the power to make new findings contrary to or in addition to those made by the trial court * * * to the end that the judgment or order appealed from may be affirmed and further litigation terminated."

With this addition to the findings, the judgment is affirmed.

Accordingly, this court hereby finds that the affirmative defenses which are alleged in the separate answers of W. A. Benton and Henderson Bros., charging the plaintiff with contributory negligence, are untrue.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

On Application for Hearing in Supreme Court.

PER CURIAM.

Hearing Denied.

SEAWELL, J.

The trial court made the following finding: " * * * That at said time and place defendant W. A. Benton so carelessly and negligently drove and operated said automobile in attempting to pass the car of plaintiff Arthur E. Brewer as to cause the car of said W. A. Benton to cross said highway at said point at an angle and come close to and immediately in front of the car being driven by plaintiff Arthur E. Brewer; that as a result of said careless and negligent driving of defendant W. A. Benton at said time and place it became necessary for plaintiff Arthur E. Brewer to leave said highway, and that his car did leave said highway and collided with a telephone pole and a power line pole; that as a direct and proximate result of said negligence and carelessness of defendant W. A. Benton in driving and operating his said automobile at said time and place, the automobile of plaintiff Arthur E. Brewer was damaged."

In my view, the above finding precludes by way of demonstration any other conclusion than the one that the plaintiff was guiltless of contributory negligence. This being so, it was not necessary to declare in the terms of a conclusion that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. The finding fully supporting the judgment, the affirmance should be based solely on that ground. I am in accord with the majority of the court in denying the petition, but think it unnecessary to place it upon the power of the appellate court to make findings where the evidence is conflicting.

SLOANE, P. J.

This appeal was taken to the Supreme Court and afterwards transferred to the Fourth District Court of Appeal for decision.

This action was brought by the plaintiffs, Harry Sheehan and Elbe Oil Land Development Company, a corporation, to quiet title to a tract of land in the county of Kern, described as the S. W. ¼ of section 18, township 28 S., R. 29 E., M. D. B. & M.

It is alleged in the complaint as the basis of plaintiffs' right of action: That plaintiffs have, and are entitled to have, the exclusive right to prospect for oil or gas, and to drill for oil or gas in and upon said premises.

Dwight G. Vedder, sometimes known as D. G. Vedder, R. D. Vedder, and Vedder Brothers, Inc., a corporation, hereinafter referred to as defendant Vedder, answered to the complaint by setting up and alleging an adverse interest in this property under a drilling contract entered into by and between the plaintiff Harry Sheehan, as party of the first part and the defendant Vedder as party of the second part, on the 3d day of June, 1926, about a year prior to the beginning of this action, the terms of which contract will be later considered.

The exclusive right to prospect for, drill, and develop oil on this land claimed by plaintiffs was acquired by the plaintiff Sheehan under United States prospecting permit serial No. 010684 in the United States Land Office at Visalia, California, under and pursuant to the Act of Congress approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), and it is undisputed that this permit was in full force and effect on June 3d, 1926, and that Sheehan was empowered thereunder to enter into the agreement of that date, with defendant Vedder. The substance of such agreement is as follows:

"Said party of the first part does hereby grant and give unto said party of the second part the right to drill and prospect for oil and gas upon some portion of the land embraced in said permit, as above described, and said party of the second part does hereby covenant and agree that he will commence the actual drilling of a well thereon, on or before six months after oil has been discovered in paying quantities in a well which is to be drilled by said party of the second part on either section in the above township and range they may elect. Said party of the second part is to commence operations for the drilling of said well on or before three years and the drilling thereof is to be conducted with diligence until oil or gas is encountered in commercial quantities on said land or until such time as said party of the second part is satisfied that no oil or gas exists under said land.

"Within sixty days after the completion of each well upon the above described property, as described in said Permit, said party of the second part shall commence the drilling of another well on said land and continuously prosecute the work of drilling the same until completed, until he has completed at least one well for each ten acres of land.

"Said party of the second part, in addition to the foregoing, agrees to comply with all the drilling requirements of said Permit and the drilling requirements of any and all leases which may hereafter be granted for said land by the United States, at least sixty days prior to the time when such drilling is required by the terms of said Permit and leases.

"Said party of the first part agrees, in the event the Secretary of the Interior so requires, to assign to the party of the second part, the area covered by this contract; said assignment, if made, shall not change or alter the royalties to be paid said party of the first part as hereinafter set forth.

"After the discovery of oil on said land in paying quantities the parties of the first part agree to make application for a lease thereof to the United States, and thereafter, and subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to sublet to the party of the second part or his successors in interest, the portion of the Permit area covered by this contract. Said party of the second part shall pay all taxes on all improvements and all taxes on his proportion of oil and gas taken from or stored on said land, and also all costs incurred by said party of the first part in securing a lease from the United States.

"After the discovery of oil in paying quantities, the party of the second part, in addition to satisfying the requirements as to royalties due the United States, agrees to pay to the parties of the first part the equivalent of five per cent (5%) of all oil and gas marketed from that portion of the said land upon which the royalty due the Government is five per cent (5%), in cash at the prevailing market price.

"Said party of the second part shall have the free use of so much of the oil, water or gas produced on said property as may be required in the operation of the property;

"It is further agreed that the party of the second part shall keep books of record, logs of wells, and all other data relating to the well or the drilling thereof, and relating to oil, gas and gasoline produced on said land, and that the same shall be at all times available to the party of the first part in order that the required reports may be furnished to the United States and the State of California.

"Time is hereby declared to be the essence of this contract, and in the event the party of the second part for any reason fails to comply with the terms hereof, or with any extension hereof in writing, signed by the parties hereto, this contract may be at the option of the party of the first part, terminated and forfeited by giving the party of the second part thirty days' (30) written notice thereof by registered mail at his address at 551 Chamber of Commerce Building, Los Angeles, California, and said party of the second part covenants, promises and agrees that should such notice of forfeiture be given, he will, if the Permit issued to said Harry F. Sheehan has been assigned to him, re-assign the same to the said party of the first part within ten days after receiving such notice.

"If the party of the second part has completed one or more wells which are producing oil or gas, he shall be entitled to the lease of the legal subdivision of ten (10) acres upon which such well or wells is located, provided a lease shall have been granted to the party of the first part by the United States for such ten (10) acres, and forfeiture shall only extend to the remainder of said land upon which party of the second part has failed to drill, in accordance with the terms of this contract, but in event of any such forfeiture, no well shall be sunk for oil and gas within 500 feet of any well retained by the party of the second part.

"The party of the second part at any time before or after the discovery of oil on said premises may quitclaim said property or any part thereof to the parties of the first part, their successors or assigns, and thereupon all rights and obligations of the parties hereto, one to the other, shall thereupon cease and determine as to the premises quitclaimed.

"This contract shall inure to the benefit of, and be binding upon the heirs, assigns and successors in interest of the respective parties hereto.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have set their hands the day and year hereinabove first written.

"D. G. Vedder,

"Party of the Second Part."

Defendant Vedder, by amended answer, after setting up this contract, alleges that on or about June 5, 1927, he, in writing, notified the plaintiffs that he then was ready, able, and willing to perform said contract and to commence and prosecute the work of prospecting and drilling for oil and gas, as provided in the contract, but that plaintiffs failed and refused, and have ever since failed and refused, to give defendant possession for said purposes, and then and ever since, have denied the validity and effect of said contract, although defendant at all times was and still is ready, able, and willing to perform on his part.

The amended answer further alleges that the only claim of right or interest in said premises of the plaintiff Elbe Oil Land Development Company, is by virtue of a contract practically identical in its terms with the Vedder contract entered into between the plaintiff Sheehan and one L. S. Barnes, of date April 7, 1927. That Barnes was, at the date of said contract, and ever since has been, the secretary and a member of the board of directors of the plaintiff Elbe Oil Land Development Company, and that the said Barnes took and received said contract as the agent of, and for the benefit of said corporation, and has transferred and assigned said contract to said corporation.

That although said contract is dated April 7, 1927, it was not executed until long after that date, namely on or about June 1, 1927. And that said Barnes and said Elbe Corporation, at the time of execution of the latter contract, were informed and knew of the contract of defendant Vedder.

On this alleged state of facts plaintiffs demanded judgment on the pleadings, which was granted, and it is from such judgment that this appeal is taken.

The judgment decrees: "It is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiffs herein are the owners of and entitled to, and have the exclusive right and privilege to prospect the premises hereinafter described, for oil and gas, and to drill wells therein and therefor, and that said plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of said premises for such purpose and that the said defendants Dwight G. Vedder, sometimes known as D. G. Vedder, R. D. Vedder and Vedder Bros., Inc., a corporation, have not nor have any of them any estate or interest whatsoever in or to the right or privilege of prospecting said lands for oil or gas or in or to the oil or gas content of said premises or to the possession thereof for such purpose or for any purpose incident thereto; that the title of the said plaintiffs in and to the said right and privilege of prospecting said premises for oil and gas and in and to the exclusive possession of said premises for such purpose and in and to the oil and gas content thereof as against the said defendants herein specifically named, be and the same is hereby quieted as against the said specifically named defendants and the said defendants so specifically named are and each of them is hereby forever enjoined, debarred and restrained from asserting any right and from bringing any action against plaintiffs in regard to plaintiffs' right, title or possession of said premises, for the purpose of prospecting the same for oil or gas and the rights and privileges of plaintiff incident thereto, adverse to plaintiffs; and that the agreement, set forth in the answer of defendants, alleged to have been entered into under date of June 3, 1926, between plaintiff Harry F. Sheehan and defendant D. G. Vedder, is declared null and void."

[1] In order to sustain a judgment on the pleadings, all the allegations of the answer must be taken as true.

The questions to be considered on this appeal are (1) the sufficiency of a showing of title in the plaintiffs to maintain the action; (2) the sufficiency of the answer to support defendants' adverse claim.

Assuming as we must, the truth of all the allegations of the answer, we are unable to find any evidence of title in the plaintiff Elbe Oil Land Development Company.

[2] In the first place the plaintiff in a quiet title action must recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title, not on the weakness of that of defendant. (22 Cal. Jur., p. 167 and citations.) Rockey v. Vieux, 179 Cal. 681, 178 P. 712.

[3] The complaint alleges by way of title that "the plaintiffs have and are entitled to have the exclusive right to prospect for oil or gas, and to drill for oil and gas in and upon the described premises."

The answer expressly denies that the plaintiffs or either of them are or is entitled to have the exclusive or any right to prospect for oil or gas, or to drill for oil or gas on said premises. This allegation of the answer raises a direct issue of fact material to the disposition of the action, excepting to the extent that the denial is modified by a subsequent admission of the answer that the plaintiff Sheehan is, and at all times mentioned was, the owner of the prospecting permit with prospecting and drilling rights thereunder, subject only to the subleasing agreement with the defendant Vedder.

The denial of any actionable interest of the plaintiff Elbe Corporation is only qualified by the statement in the answer that its only claim of right arises on the subleasing contract from plaintiff Sheehan to Barnes and assigned to the Elbe Corporation, which is declared to have been acquired subsequent to and with full knowledge of the Vedder contract, and to correspond in its terms with the previous Vedder contract.

In any event, the contract under which the Elbe Company claims is limited by the same clause as the Vedder contract, permitting the termination, at any time, of the rights of all parties by a quitclaim and release from the party of the second part.

It is this clause upon which plaintiffs rely as destroying mutuality of the Vedder contract, and rendering it invalid and ineffective to vest any property interest in the defendant.

If such is the effect upon the Vedder contract, it must likewise result that the same provision in the Barnes-Elbe contract defeats the claim of title or interest in the plaintiff Elbe Corporation.

If, on the other hand, this surrender clause does not invalidate the contracts in question, the right of action of the Elbe Corporation must fail, because of its contract being subsequent and subordinate to the Vedder contract.

Assuming the truth of the allegations of the answer in this regard, it must follow, in the absence of a trial of the issue, that the Elbe Corporation can have no claim in this action to a quiet title decree against the defendant on the pleadings.

As to the plaintiff Sheehan, however, the answer admits an actionable title, subject only to the rights, if any, vested in defendant under the contract of June 3, 1926.

As we understand the argument of respondent's counsel, they base their claim that the Vedder contract is invalid and vests no adverse rights in defendant, on the ground that there is a lack of mutuality in the agreement, in that the provision therein that the "party of the second part at any time before or after the discovery of oil on said premises, may quitclaim the property or any part thereof, to the parties of the first part, their successors or assigns, and thereupon all rights and obligations of the parties hereto, one to the other, shall thereupon cease and determine as to the premises quitclaimed."

They claim, that by reason of this release clause, the contract is not subject to enforcement of specific performance, and that a contract that is not capable of specific performance is not a defense to an action to quiet title. Citing Archer v. Miller, 73 Cal. App. 678, 239 P. 92; Crane v. Roach, 29 Cal. App. 584, 156 P. 375; Jolliffe v. Steele, 9 Cal. App. 212, 98 P. 544; Valentine v. Streton, 9 Cal. App. 640, 643, 99 P. 1107; Dabney v. Key, 57 Cal. App. 762, 207 P. 921.

These authorities seem to support respondents' position, but it seems to us they go further than the facts in this case would warrant.

All the cases cited are distinguishable in several particulars from the instant case.

Archer v. Miller, 73 Cal. App. 678, 239 P. 92, 94, is an action by plaintiff to quiet title against a contract of lease of real property. The pleadings admit that plaintiff is owner and in possession of land in question.

The answer sets up as adverse claim a contract executed by plaintiff Archer leasing to defendant Miller this property for a term of 10 years, at a total rent of $40,000, payable in periodical installments, with an option to defendant "during the faithful performance of all covenants of this lease, to purchase the premises for the sum of $40,000, any amounts paid on the rents to apply on purchase price."

The contract contained covenants for performance of various conditions at specified times by lessee, and a condition that should the lessee fail to make any of the payments agreed to be made, or to fulfill any of the obligations of this lease, then the party of the second part agrees and does hereby relinquish all rights and interest created under this agreement.

The lessee is by the contract also in consideration of $50 paid to the lessor given the right to terminate the contract at any time before a specified date, by notice in writing to that effect.

The defendant pleaded this lease agreement, and asked, by way of cross-complaint, decree for specific performance of the option to purchase. Judgment was for defendant in trial court, and was reversed by the Second District Court of Appeal on the following grounds:

(1) That the answer was silent as to fairness of the contract, and adequacy of consideration.

(2) That the contract was lacking in mutuality of remedy, and containing covenants for personal services which could not be specifically enforced against the defendant and cross-complainant.

(3) That it appears from the pleadings that defendant was in default in the performance of some of the conditions prescribed.

On the question of sufficiency of the answer as a defense in a quiet title action, the opinion says: "It is sufficient on this proposition to refer to the rule, established by decision, that a contract of purchase and sale which is not specifically enforceable cannot be the basis of defense against an action to quiet title." Citing Jolliffe v. Steele, 9 Cal. App. 212, 98 P. 544; Valentine v. Streton, 9 Cal. App. 640, 99 P. 1107, 1108; Crane v. Roach, 29 Cal. App. 584, 587, 156 P. 375.

The following distinguishing points exist in the instant case. Here the lessee by his answer alleges the fairness of the contract and adequacy of consideration; that he was not in default but that this attempt and offer to perform was defeated by the lessor; and he is not applying for specific performance, but merely interposing his contract by way of defense to the action to quiet title.

Moreover we question if the rule as stated in the Archer Case that a contract "which is not specifically enforceable cannot be the basis of defense against an action to quiet title" is, at least in its application to the instant case, supported by the authorities cited. In the case of Jolliffe v. Steel, supra, the rule is stated by way of dictum, as the contract there relied upon by defendant was held to have been without consideration.

In Valentine v. Streeton, supra, the contract pleaded in the answer was not merely by way of defense to the quiet title action, but by cross-complaint seeking specific performance of an agreement to convey, and the appellate court held that the contract relied upon was unfair and inadequate as to consideration. It was admitted in the pleading that "the premises so contracted for were at the date of the contract worth nearly threefold the contract price." The court says: "This admission as to the inadequacy of the price is sufficient to defeat appellant's claim for specific performance."

In Crane v. Roach, supra, the defense was also by way of cross-complaint to enforce an agreement to convey property, under which the court found that the defendant had not performed, and was in default in the conditions of the agreement.

Not one of the cases cited involves a transaction where a defendant, merely standing on his unbreached contract by way of defense, and not seeking affirmative relief by way of specific performance, was denied the right to rely upon his contract.

Dabney v. Key, 57 Cal. App. 762, 207 P. 921. The only other case bearing with any force upon the proposition of specific performance, here involved, was an action brought by the plaintiffs to enforce a specific performance of a contract by defendant to execute a lease for the development of prospective oil lands. The relief sought was denied on the ground that the proposed lease was lacking in mutuality, one of the proposed conditions being that the lessee reserved the right to surrender the lease at such time as he might see fit, whereas the owners of the land were to be bound for twenty years.

[4] The rule is sufficiently established that equity will not grant the relief of specific performance to one who is not himself bound to perform his part of the contract, but it does not follow that one who holds an executed grant or lease to real estate, and who is not in default in the performance of his obligations under the contract, may not defend against an action of the grantor or lessor to quiet title by setting up such executed contract. Neither the Dabney Case nor the case of Sturgis v. Galindo, 59 Cal. 28, 42 Am. Rep. 239, on which the rule relied on in the Dabney Case rests, were quiet title actions. The Galindo Case was one brought by a plaintiff to compel specific performance, in his favor, of an alleged contract for the sale of real estate. The consideration for the contract to sell was an agreement on the part of the plaintiff to render certain services in prospecting the land for coal, but provided that plaintiff might at any time cancel the agreement on his part if he became satisfied that it was useless to carry his prospecting further.

Holding that the contract was not specifically enforceable for want of mutuality, the court applies the general rule "that when, from personal incapacity, the nature of the contract, or any other cause, a contract is incapable of being enforced against one party, that party is equally incapable of enforcing it specifically against the other, though its execution in the latter way might, in itself, be free from difficulty attending its execution in the former."

None of the cited cases involve, as here, an executed grant wherein the right to possession and use of the premises was vested and only subject to revocation on the happening of conditions subsequent.

It may be admitted that the surrender clause destroys the resort to specific enforcement of the terms of the agreement against defendant Vedder. Any attempt to enforce the obligations assumed by Vedder by a decree of court could be defeated by his throwing up the contract under this surrender clause.

But do the authorities relied upon support the doctrine that a contract not mutually enforceable in all its terms, by decree for specific performance, is insufficient to support a defense in an action to quiet title?

The Vedder contract relied on here is something more than an option. In its operative clause, it is an express grant by the plaintiff to the defendant of the prospecting and development right on the premises in question. It provides that "Said party of the first part does hereby grant and give unto the said party of the second part the right to drill and prospect for oil and gas," upon the land covered by plaintiff's government permit. The party of the second part just as explicitly undertakes on his part to commence drilling on the premises within six months after the happening of future events to be postponed not longer than three years, but the happening of these conditions is not made to postpone the vesting in the defendant of a present right to enter upon, having possession of, and exploit said premises in search of oil. That right was created by the granting clause.

All the subsequent provisions of the contract are conditions subsequent and go to the manner of carrying on the work of prospecting and developing, the interest to be enjoyed by the respective parties in any discoveries made, and reserving the right of the plaintiff to revoke, on notice, the grant to defendant, in case of failure to meet the conditions of the contract, and the right of defendant at any time in the future, to quitclaim his interest under the contract and restore possession to plaintiff.

This is an executed contract, so far as the vesting of the right to the specified use and possession of the premises in defendant is concerned, and is a very different matter from an executory option to purchase, or take a lease on property, dependent for its operative effect upon some future election of the parties.

In the case of an express grant of title to real estate, could the grantee be kept out of its use or possession, or be precluded from defending his title, because the instrument of conveyance provided for a reversion of title to the grantor if certain conditions subsequent provided for in the deed were not yet complied with, or because the grantee was permitted to relieve himself from further obligations to the grantor, by a quitclaim or surrender of the premises?

If we are right that the document here vested some sort of a present interest in defendant to the use and occupation of these premises, when did that vested right terminate?

The pleadings show that he has not defaulted in any of the conditions subsequent that he was to perform; that he, within the time specified, offered to perform, but was denied possession by plaintiff. There has been no claim or notice by plaintiff, of forfeiture, and no election to quitclaim and terminate the contract by defendant.

These various covenants and provisos in this contract are not made conditions to the vesting of defendants' rights under the grant, but conditions subsequent upon the failure or happening of which the grant may be revoked. These conditions of forfeiture have not happened, and may never happen, and until they do, we can see no good reason why defendant may not maintain his rights under the contract.

He alleges a good and adequate consideration, and that the transaction was fair and equitable. Even if some of the conditions subsequently to be performed may not be specifically and mutually enforced, does it follow that defendant would not be entitled to rely as a defense to plaintiff's action to quiet title, upon the specific terms of the grant which purport unconditionally to give him the present right to use and possession of the land?

It is conceded that the defendant may recover damages for the breach of this contract by plaintiff, but what becomes of even this remedy under a judgment on the pleadings which declares his contract null and void. One may not even predicate an action for damages on the breaching of a void contract.

If defendant possesses any sort of an interest, legal or equitable, under his contract here, dependent upon the use and occupation of these premises, he should be permitted to set it up in defense of an action to quiet such title against him.

Section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not confine the right to an action to quiet title to an adverse claim of any particular character. It was intended to embrace every description of claim, whereby the plaintiff might be deprived of the property, or whereby the title would be clouded, or its value depreciated, or whereby the plaintiff might be incommoded or damaged by the assertion of an outstanding title already held or to grow out of the adverse pretensions. Accordingly an action may be maintained to quiet title against a claim under a void tax deed, a forged deed, or one undelivered, a deed intended as a mortgage, or a recorded option to purchase, a claim of an easement granted on a condition subsequent and asserted after condition broken, and in short any adverse interest from a claim of title in fee to the smallest leasehold; whatever may be regarded by third persons as a cloud upon title. 22 Cal. Jur., pp. 115, 117; Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 443, 21 P. 946; Withers v. Jacks, 79 Cal. 297, 21 P. 824, 12 Am. St. Rep. 143; Akley v. Bassett, 68 Cal. App. 270, 228 P. 1057.

It must then, as a corollary to this proposition, be true, if either of such adverse claims exists and plaintiff's title cannot be unclouded until such claim is annulled, that the defendant may maintain the validity and potency of such claim as a defense to an attempt to avoid it.

If its existence constitutes a cloud, its removal can only be effected by showing that it is wrongfully maintained, or is invalid, or ineffective to create any right or interest in defendant to the possession or use of such premises.

The amended answer here pleads the equitable rule that he who seeks equity must do equity and must come into court with clean hands.

It has been repeatedly held that the owner of land may not quiet his title as against an unsatisfied mortgage without paying the mortgage debt, even though its collection is barred by the statute of limitations. Faxon v. All Persons, 166 Cal. 708, 137 P. 919, L. R. A. 1916B, 1209; Bulson v. Moffatt, 173 Cal. 685, 161 P. 259.

The mortgagee may plead the existence of his unsatisfied mortgage as a bar to the action of mortgagor to quiet title, but he cannot compel the payment of the mortgage debt.

How can the plaintiff in this action equitably deprive the defendant of the benefits of this contract, on the ground that it is not specifically enforceable in his favor, when he has, by his own refusal to perform, denied the offer and prevented the efforts of defendant to perform his part of the agreement?

It is also alleged in the answer that the defendant by reason of fulfillment of conditions agreed upon between the parties as an inducement to entering upon the contract, has been placed in a position which renders it inequitable that the contract should be avoided.

[5] Even where the right to specific performance of a contract is involved, it is not always true that lack of mutuality prevents specific performance. The equity rule, set forth in Civil Code § 3386, as stated in Pomero's Equity Jurisprudence, 2191, is open to so many exceptions, it is of little value as a rule. Wolleson v. Coburn, 63 Cal. App. 315, 324, 218 P. 479.

One ground of exception is where a party to the contract has thereby been led to place himself in a position where it would be inequitable to deny him relief.

In this case it is alleged in the answer that one of the main inducements to this lease contract was the fact that defendant Vedder was a geologist and an experienced prospector of oil lands; that the lands in question were undeveloped and were in what is known as "Wild Cat Territory," and the advisability of sinking prospect shafts on them depended to a large extent upon the exploitation of the surrounding and adjacent country. The contract in question fixed the time at which defendant was to commence operations on the leased premises "on or before six months after oil has been discovered in paying quantities in a well which is to be drilled by said party of the second part" (the defendant) on any section in the township and range in which the leased lands are located. It is alleged that no well had previously been drilled within five miles of the land in question, and that in reliance on the acquiring of this lease defendant was induced and did expend much time and money in causing wells to be drilled in such locality, and that plaintiff knew of such facts, and knew that defendant relied upon and required said contract with plaintiff as one of the items which justified and made worth while said work and expense.

The nature and extent of this outside exploitation work is not very definitely pleaded, but, in the absence of any demand to make the pleading more definite and certain, it furnishes an additional reason why defendant should have been permitted to present his case to the court.

Again the plaintiff's hands are somewhat besmirched from an equitable standpoint, from the fact as alleged in the answer, that plaintiff Sheehan has joined with the plaintiff Elbe Corporation to sustain the Barnes contract which under the alleged facts is subsequent to and subordinate to the Vedder contract, and which is open to the same defense of want of mutuality, and have combined to permit the exploiting and developing of the land in question under the Barnes contract, to the exclusion of any rights of defendant under his prior contract.

[6] Defendant further alleges in his answer that plaintiff at no time prior to the bringing of this suit, or since, has returned or offered to return any part of the consideration paid by defendant upon the execution of his contract. The money consideration alleged was only the sum of $10. It is, however, the general rule applicable to actions to quiet title, that one may not ask for a decree barring another from asserting a claim under an instrument executed by the former, without restoring the consideration received. 22 Cal. Jur., p. 134; Chandler v. Chandler, 55 Cal. 267; Henry v. Phillips, 163 Cal. 136, 124 P. 837, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 39.

We are satisfied that the pleadings in this case do not justify the decree quieting title in favor of the plaintiff Elbe Corporation, and while we are not entirely clear as to where the weight of authority lies as to the rights of defendant under the Sheehan-Vedder contract, we feel that the equities are with him, and decide accordingly.

The judgment is reversed as to both plaintiffs.

I concur: BARNARD, J.

MARKS, J. (concurring).

I concur in the foregoing opinion of the court. In reaching this conclusion I desire to particularly stress and rely upon the rule stated in the opinion, that he who asks equity must do equity. This is an action to quiet title, and not for the specific performance of a contract, and therefore section 3386 of the Civil Code and the cases decided under it are not necessarily involved in a decision of the case, as I view the issues framed by the pleadings.

The answer of respondents raises the direct question of whether or not the respondent Sheehan came into court with clean hands. This presents an issue which the trial court should decide. Sheehan made a lease with appellant Vedder, which the parties to this action admit was good in law. It appears from the answer that before Vedder entered upon the leased premises to perform his contract, and before he was required to do so under its terms, Sheehan made another lease to a third person and put his assignee in possession of the leased property. Whether Sheehan did this as a result of a whim, or to acquire the personal gain of a larger profit from the transaction, or for some other reason, does not appear. A chancellor sitting in a court of equity should not relieve him of his first contract, to further either end, and not at all unless satisfied after a trial that fairness and equity are with him. To do so might put the stamp of approval upon a transaction tainted with fraud. The case should go to trial upon its merits, with the trial judge keeping in mind the mandate of equity that the hands of the respondents must be clean before a court of equity will grant them any relief.

1. Automobiles ⇨242(8)—Defendant, sued for injuries from automobile collision, had burden to prove contributory negligence.

Burden was on defendant, sued for injuries arising out of automobile collision, to prove contributory negligence on part of plaintiff.

2. Automobiles ⇨242(2)—Mere collision of automobiles does not destroy presumption that both drivers used ordinary care (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963).

There mere occurrence of collision between two automobiles does not destroy the presumption that both drivers used ordinary care, as declared by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, to effect that person is presumed to take ordinary care of his own concerns.

Presumption, declared by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, that person takes ordinary care of his own concerns, which is denominated disputable presumption, is in itself evidence that will support finding made in accordance therewith, even though there be evidence to contrary.

5. Automobiles ⇨245(2)—Regardless of which party in action for injuries sustained in automobile collision adduced evidence therefor, whether presumption that person takes ordinary care of own concerns was rebutted was for jury (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963).

Regardless of which party adduced evidence to rebut presumption declared by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, that person takes ordinary care of his own concerns, it was province of jury, in action for injuries arising from automobile collision, to determine whether proof had sufficient weight or substance to dispel the presumption.

PER CURIAM.

On petition for a rehearing elaborate briefs have been filed in support of appellant's assertion that it was error to instruct the jury it could consider, with other evidence adduced on that subject, the presumption declared by section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure "that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns," in determining whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

[1-4] Under the circumstances of this case, we are satisfied the opinion of this court correctly states the law. The burden was on the defendant with respect to this issue as to contributory negligence. The plaintiff was fortified with the presumption that he exercised ordinary care for his own safety. The mere occurrence of a collision between two automobiles does not destroy the presumption that both drivers used ordinary care. The burden is upon him who charges negligence to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence. In the present case the plaintiff offered no evidence to refute this presumption. He claimed the benefit of this presumption. The presumption is declared by statute to be evidence. In the absence of any testimony to the contrary, it is controlling. Since it is some evidence of the fact as declared by statute, it becomes necessary for the jury to decide whether the opposing testimony is substantial and sufficient in character and weight to dispel the effect of the presumption. It has been repeatedly held that these rebuttable presumptions which are created by statute "are of themselves evidence * * * and will support a finding made in accordance with them, even though there be evidence to the contrary." People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 390, 95 P. 863, 865; People v. Ellis (Cal. Sup.) 274 P. 353; Simonton v. Los Angeles T. & S. Bank (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 672, 675; Estate of Wiechers, 199 Cal. 523, 527, 250 P. 397.

In the case of Smellie v. Southern Pac. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 276 P. 338, 341, the court did say this presumption "that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns" is weak and unsatisfactory evidence which will not stand against facts to the contrary; that upon proof of facts to the contrary the presumption will be deemed to have been overcome or dispelled. This case is still pending in the Supreme Court. Assuming, however, this language will be finally approved, it must be construed in the light of the facts of that case. In that case the plaintiff, who relied upon this presumption, produced evidence herself which was deemed to refute the presumption. Her own witness, Ireland, testified to facts which tend to dispute the presumption. Under such circumstances it has been held without conflict of California authorities that the presumption is dispelled. The Smellie Case may therefore be reconciled with the leading authority of Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corp., 190 Cal. 1, 9, 210 P. 269, 273, in which the cases upon this subject are collected and analyzed and reconciled in the following language: "From the foregoing we deduce that a fact is proved as against a party when it is established by the uncontradicted testimony of the party himself [who relies upon the presumption] or of his witnesses, under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence; and that, when the fact so proved is wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked, the latter is dispelled and disappears from the case."

[5] It may be reasonably said that, regardless of which party adduces the evidence, it is still the province of the jury to determine whether the proof has sufficient weight or substance to dispel the presumption. In determining whether substantial evidence upon this subject has in fact been adduced, it is proper to instruct the jury it may consider the presumption which is involved in the controversy. Otherwise the court will be usurping the function of the jury by passing on the weight of evidence.

The appellant relies on the case of Western & Atl. R. R. Co. v. Henderson, 279 U. S. 639, 49 S. Ct. 445, 73 L. Ed. 884, wherein a statute of Georgia (Civ. Code Ga. 1910, § 2780) was held to be unconstitutional which imposed a liability upon the railroad company for damages, resulting from injuries sustained from the use of its equipment, "unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company."

This Georgia statute was class legislation. It attempted to shift the burden contrary to the uniform rule of law and require a railroad company to affirmatively prove its freedom from negligence. It purported to create a presumption which was based upon neither reason nor justice and which was not uniform in its operation. It is little wonder the federal court said it was unreasonable, arbitrary and violative of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. The statute in that case is in no wise similar in effect to the one here involved. That case is not authority for the determination of this case.

The other points made by the appellant in the present case are fully covered by the opinion.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

104 Cal. App. 218

DUNCAN v. SUPERIOR COURT, CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.
Civ. 7329.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 24, 1930.

1. Execution $\S$ 195—Order continuing, without showing as to good cause, hearing on petition to have title to automobile determined violated statute but was not in excess of jurisdiction.

Where petitioner caused writ of execution to issue and to be levied on automobile and third party claim was filed, whereupon petitioner filed verified petition to have title to automobile determined, order putting hearing over to November 19, after hearing had been set for November 13 and petitioner failed to appear, was in violation of terms of statute but not in excess of jurisdiction notwithstanding absence of showing as to good cause.

2. Sheriffs and constables $\S$ 90—Where property has been levied on, third party claimant may have it released unless plaintiff gives statutory undertaking (Code Civ. Proc. § 689, as amended by St. 1929, p. 661).

Where property has been levied on, third party claimant may make attempt to have it released and such attempt may be fully made and effectually accomplished within period of five days after levy unless plaintiff gives undertaking specified in Code Civ. Proc. § 689, as amended by St. 1929, p. 661.

3. Mandamus $\S$ 16(1)—Mandamus will not compel performance of idle act.

Writ of mandate will not issue to compel performance of an idle act.

4. Mandamus § 16(1)—Mandamus would not issue to compel hearing of action to determine title of automobile levied on where plaintiff did not give undertaking after filing of third party claim (Code Civ. Proc. § 689, as amended by St. 1929, p. 661).

Where property was levied on and third party claim was filed, but plaintiff did not give undertaking, under Code Civ. Proc. § 689, as amended by St. 1929, p. 661, court must assume that sheriff released automobile levied on, and, in absence of contrary showing, could assume that it was no longer within jurisdiction of court so that mandamus would not issue to compel court to hear and determine action to have title determined.

Application for writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James G. Conlan, Judge.

Petition by Adele Duncan against the Superior Court of the State of California, City and County of San Francisco, James G. Conlan, Judge, to compel respondent to hear and determine an action to establish title to an automobile.

Writ denied.

Clarence A. Linn, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Timothy Healy, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an application for a writ of mandamus, directing the defendant to hear and determine a petition asking it to determine the title to an automobile on which the plaintiff had caused a writ of execution to be levied. An order to show cause was issued by this court, the defendant answered, and the application was submitted on the pleadings.

In her petition for a writ, the plaintiff alleged that heretofore she obtained a judgment against P. B. Cross and that the judgment has become final; that she caused a writ of execution to issue and to be levied on an automobile; that on October 1, 1929, C. E. Ryan filed with the sheriff a third party claim; that on October 2, 1929, the sheriff notified this plaintiff that said claim had been filed; that on October 15, 1929, this plaintiff filed a verified petition to have the title to the automobile determined; that the court fixed the date of the hearing on said petition for October 28, 1929, and issued an order to show cause returnable at said time. The defendant's answer admitted those allegations, but, continuing, it alleged that on November 4, 1929, the plaintiff filed an amended petition which was set for "Nov. 13, 1929, and that upon the failure of petitioner to appear at said time, the hearing of said amended petition was continued to Nov. 19, 1929, at which time the petition came on for hearing and the said C. E. Ryan objected to the hearing of said petition and moved the said court to dismiss the petition on the ground that the Superior Court was without jurisdiction; * * *"; and that on December 31, 1929, the motion was granted on that ground.

On the argument the defendant called attention to the fact that a continuance was had from November 13, 1929, to November 19, 1929, and that the plaintiff did not appear on November 13, 1929. He also argued that "good cause" was not shown for that continuance, and, therefore, the order made December 31, 1929, dismissing the petition, was not improper.

[1-4] The order putting the hearing over to November 19, 1929, without any showing as to good cause was apparently in violation of the terms of the statute, but was not in excess of jurisdiction. Moore v. Conley, 163 Cal. 609, 610, 126 P. 492.

It therefore becomes necessary to ascertain the general scope of section 689, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended at the last session of the Legislature. St. 1929, p. 661, c. 341. Formerly that section provided for a trial by a sheriff's jury. Practice Act, § 281. When the statute was so worded it was held that the proceedings before the sheriff were not judicial and that as the statute assumed to specify its effects, the court would not presume other effects. Perkins v. Thornburgh, 10 Cal. 189. Later the statute was amended authorizing the sheriff to accept and act on a verified claim of an alleged third party. St. 1889, p. 20. The statute, as so amended, did not purport to do more than provide a method by which the sheriff could lay a basis to protect himself against subsequent suits for damages. Kellogg v. Burr, 126 Cal. 38, 42, 58 P. 306. The provisions as so amended, with some slight changes of no importance to the question before us, have ever since remained the law and are continued by the statute as amended. Inserting a number to each paragraph for our own reference, section 689, as amended in 1929, is as follows:

"1. Where property claimed by third party; Indemnity. If the property levied on is claimed by a third person as his property by a written claim verified by his oath or that of his agent, setting out his right to the possession thereof, and served upon the sheriff, the sheriff must release the property if the plaintiff, or the person in whose favor the writ of execution runs, fails within five days after written demand, to give the sheriff an undertaking executed by at least two good and sufficient sureties in a sum equal to double the value of the property levied on. If such undertaking be given, the sheriff shall hold the property. The sheriff, however, shall not be liable for damages to any such third person for the taking or keeping of such property if no claim is filed by any such third party.

"2. Such undertaking shall be made in favor of, and shall indemnify such third person against loss, liability, damages, costs and counsel fees, by reason of such seizing, taking, withholding, or sale of such property by the sheriff.

"3. Exceptions to the sufficiency of the sureties and their justification may be had and taken in the same manner as upon an undertaking on attachment. If they, or others in their place, fail to justify at the time and place appointed, the sheriff must release the property; provided, however, that if no exception is taken, within five days after notice or receipt of the undertaking, the third person shall be deemed to have waived any and all objections to the sufficiency of the sureties.

"4. The sheriff may demand and exact the undertaking herein provided for notwithstanding any defect, informality or insufficiency of the verified claim served upon him.

"5. Hearing. Whenever a verified third party claim is served upon the sheriff, upon levy of execution, the plaintiff, or the person in whose favor the writ of execution runs, shall be entitled to a hearing within twenty days therefrom, before the court having jurisdiction of the action, in order to determine title to the property in question, which hearing must be granted by the said court upon the filing of an application or petition therefor. Ten days' notice of such hearing must be given to all parties claiming an interest in the property, or their attorneys, which notice must specify that the hearing is for the purpose of determining title to the property in question. The court may continue the hearing beyond the said twenty-day period, but good cause must be shown for any such continuance."

Paragraphs 1 and 4 are but re-enactments of what was formerly the law. The other paragraphs are new matter. Where property has been levied on it is clear that the third party claimant may make an attempt to have it released and that such attempt may be fully made and (unless the plaintiff gives the undertaking specified in paragraph 1) effectually accomplished within a period of five days after the levy. Nothing but the execution of the said undertaking will stay the sheriff's hand. If the plaintiff gives the undertaking provided for in paragraph 1, and if he also petitions for a hearing as provided in paragraph 5, important questions as to the legal effect of the hearing will arise which should not be passed on till they have been duly presented in a proper case. If he does not give the undertaking the statute contains no provisions that the sheriff's hand will be stayed, nor that he may later retake the property, nor that the court may impound the property until a petition has been heard, nor that thereafter the court can make any order looking toward the retaking of the property. Under the facts last stated it is clear that a hearing of such a petition as is provided for in paragraph 5 would be an idle act. But a writ of mandate will not issue to compel the performance of an idle act. Boyne v. Ryan, 100 Cal. 265, 34 P. 707; Moore v. Conley, 163 Cal. 609, 610, 126 P. 492; Fawkes v. City of Burbank, 188 Cal. 399, 205 P. 675. The record before us does not show that plaintiffs gave the undertaking and therefore we must assume that the sheriff has released the automobile, and, nothing to the contrary appearing, we may further assume that it is no longer within the jurisdiction of the court. We have therefore concluded that the issuance of a writ will be of no appreciable advantage to the petitioners, and that the emergency is not serious enough to justify such action. Moore v. Conley, 163 Cal. 609, 610, 126 P. 492.

The writ is denied.

GOLDWATER v. OLTMAN et al. ★

Civ. No. 6262.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 21, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 21, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 21, 1930.

1. Action $\S$ 48(1)—Plaintiff having several causes of action based upon same transaction involving same amount of money may set them forth in single action in varied counts.

If several causes of action are based upon the same transaction and involve the same amount of money, plaintiff has the right to set them forth in varied or even in inconsistent counts in a single action.

2. Payment $\S$ 16(1)—Promissory note generally does not discharge debt but extends period for payment.

Ordinarily, a promissory note is but an evidence of indebtedness and does not discharge the debt for which it is given but only operates to extend period of payment of debt until maturity of note.

3. Bills and notes $\S$ 447—Creditor taking note may, after note matures, sue either on original indebtedness or upon note.

Creditor receiving note as evidence of account has option either to sue on original indebtedness or upon the note given as evidence thereof, except that he may not pursue the former remedy until the expiration of the time of maturity as extended by the note.

4. Pleading ⚡369(1)—Plaintiff need not elect between causes of action on note, book account and account stated, set forth in single complaint, where all arose out of same transaction.

Plaintiff could join in single complaint causes of action on promissory note with counts setting up book account and account stated, where the note was given as evidence of the account and represented the same indebtedness; and court erred in requiring plaintiff to elect between such causes of action.

5. Pleading ⚡121(1)—Answer denying information and belief upon which to answer allegations contained in cause of action in verified complaint held insufficient to raise issue; specific denial of each allegation being required (Code Civ. Proc. § 437).

Answer setting up that defendants had no information or belief upon which to base answer to allegations contained in cause of action alleged in complaint held insufficient to raise an issue where complaint was verified, since under Code Civ. Proc. § 437, specific denial of each allegation intended to be controverted was required in order to raise issue thereon.

6. Pleading ⚡377—Plaintiff need not prove causes of action alleged where defendants denied allegations generally on information and belief (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 437, 462).

Allegations of causes of action, sought to be denied generally by answer on information and belief contrary to Code Civ. Proc. § 437, were deemed admitted under section 462, and plaintiff was not required to offer proof in support of such causes of action; motion for nonsuit by defendants being allowed under section 581 only when plaintiff fails to prove sufficient case for jury.

7. Pleading ⚡125—Where cause of action was based on note, allegation that defendants acquired properties of original debtor and agreed to pay amount owed by him was matter of inducement, rendering form of denial thereof immaterial.

Where cause of action was based on note, allegation that original debtor sold, transferred, and conveyed its business and properties to defendants who promised, assumed, and agreed to pay amount due was merely a matter of inducement and not material, and therefore, form of denial thereof was immaterial.

8. Bills and notes ⚡488—Allegations as to execution of note by individual defendants and form of denial thereof could be disregarded where note set out in complaint showed that such individuals did not execute it.

Where note set out in hæc verba in complaint showed on its face that it was executed by business organization by its president, contradictory allegations as to its execution by defendants individually must be disregarded under rule that specific averments must be given precedence over general averments in case of inconsistency between the two; and form of denial of execution of note by the individual defendants could, therefore, be disregarded.

9. Bills and notes ⚡489(1)—Denial that note sued on was delivered as evidence of defendants' obligation held insufficient to raise issue of delivery.

In action on note in which it was alleged that note was delivered and that such delivery was as evidence of the obligation of the defendants, denial that note was delivered "as evidence of any obligation at all of the said defendants or any of them" held insufficient to raise issue as to delivery of note.

10. Pleading ⚡121(3)—Defendants sued on note must deny delivery positively, not merely on information and belief.

Whether defendants delivered note sued on was matter presumably within their knowledge, and one, therefore, which they were called upon to deny positively rather than on information and belief if they wished to raise an issue on that point.

11. Pleading ⚡121(4)—Allegation that partnership had filed certificates required of partnership was not put in issue by denial on information and belief (Civ. Code §§ 2466, 2468).

Allegation that partnership had filed certificates required by Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, in case of partnership transacting business under fictitious name or designation not showing names of persons interested as partners, was matter of record which could not be put in issue by defendants by denial on information and belief.

12. Pleading ⚡122—Denial of account stated and promise to pay to raise issue should be positive, not on information and belief.

In action on account stated, allegations that account had been stated and that defendants had promised to pay amount thereof were matters within defendants' knowledge which they were required to deny positively, and denial on information and belief as to such allegations was tantamount to an admission.

13. Joint-stock companies and business trusts ⚡1—Trusts may be organized in California for purpose of engaging in business (Civ. Code, § 2220).

Trusts can be organized in California for purpose of engaging in business under Civ. Code, § 2220, authorizing creation of express trusts in personalty for any purpose for which a contract may lawfully be made; personal property trust being subject to no restriction by statute, except rule against suspending power of alienation under section 715, and direction against accumulations under section 724.

14. Joint-stock companies and business trusts ⚡15(1)—Holders of certificates under declaration of trust, who had no control over investment of corpus but were merely entitled to net income under management of trustees, held not personally liable as partners for obligation incurred by trustees (Civ. Code, §§ 2220, 2395).

Where declaration of trust, entered into for carrying on business, provided that certificate holders were not associated together for purpose of carrying on business in accordance with definition of partnership under Civ. Code § 2395, and had no control or direction over investment of corpus of trust, and were entitled only to receive net income not required for the operation of trust and proportion of the corpus of the trust upon its termination, the certificate holders were cestuis que trustant in "Massachusetts" or business trust and not members of partnerships or joint-stock associations under Civ. Code § 2220, authorizing creation of express trusts in personalty, and were not personally liable for obligation incurred by trustees.

15. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 1170(3, 8)—Defects in answer and failure of one defendant to join in motion for nonsuit did not require reversal of judgment for defendants who on merits were not liable (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Failure of defendants to make proper answer to some of counts of complaint and failure of counsel for one of defendants to join in motion for nonsuit did not warrant reversal of judgment for defendants who on the merits were not liable; and court in the interest of justice under Const. art. 6, § 4½, was required to affirm the judgment.

Burnell, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Henry Goldwater against William Oltman and others. From a judgment entered in favor of certain defendants, following the granting of a motion for nonsuit, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This appeal is taken from a judgment entered in favor of certain of the defendants following the granting of a motion for nonsuit. An understandable presentation of the points presented for our consideration requires that we first review, as briefly as possible, the extremely voluminous pleadings in order that the issues between the plaintiff and various groups of defendants may be clarified.

The second amended complaint, on which the plaintiff went to trial, sets forth ten causes of action. The first, omitting matters not germane to any point in controversy and dispensing with the legal verbiage, may be summarized as follows, the Roman numerals referring to the paragraphs as numbered in the pleading:

II. Defendants Oltman and Morante are partners under the name "Morante Comedy Company."

IV. All defendants other than Morante and Morante Comedy Company are partners under the name "Drascena Productions."

V. Between October 15, and December 1, 1920, Bloom Film Laboratories, a copartnership (hereinafter for brevity referred to as "Laboratories"), "performed and furnished work, labor and materials, and expended money, all at the special instance and request of defendants" Morante, Oltman and Morante Comedy Company.

VI. $3,822.94 was the reasonable value of this work, etc., of which $3,000 is unpaid.

VII. February 9, 1921, an agreement was made between defendants Oltman and Morante and Morante Comedy Company as vendors and all the other defendants as vendees whereby the business and property of the vendors was transferred to the vendees, who, as part of the consideration, "promised, assumed and agreed to pay" to the Laboratories the debt due from the vendor. This agreement, the plaintiff, on information and belief, alleges was in writing.

VIII. January 3, 1921, one of the three partners composing the Laboratories assigned his interests to the other two, who continued in business under the firm name, and on June 7, 1922, assigned and transferred the claim in suit to the plaintiff.

IX. February 9, 1921, "as evidence of said obligation of the defendants, excepting only * * * Morante and Morante Comedy Company," the defendants other than these two executed and delivered to the Laboratories a note for $3,000, dated as above, payable April 15, drawing seven per cent. interest and containing a provision for attorney's fees to be fixed by the court in case of suit for collection, and signed "Drascena Productions, by Charles M. Conant, President"; $1,273.78 is a reasonable attorney fee.

X. No part of the $3,000 "or any amount of principal, interest or attorney's fees, of said note" has been paid.

XII. None of the defendants has filed certificate of copartnership in the clerk's office.

The second, third, and fourth causes of action are identical with the first, with these exceptions: The second omits paragraph six, alleging reasonable value, and in lieu thereof alleges a promise to pay the Laboratories and a part payment, leaving a $3,000 balance unpaid; the third omits paragraphs five and six, and substitutes an allegation of account stated between Morante Comedy Company and the Laboratories; and the fourth, with the same omissions as the third, alleges the original indebtedness to have been on a book account.

The remaining causes of action all plead that the defendants other than Morante and Morante Comedy Company are members of and unit holders in an association known as "Drascena Productions," all the business of which is transacted and all the property of which is held in trust by five of the defendants as trustees under a declaration of trust of record in Los Angeles county, the provisions of which are, at least in part, set forth. It is further alleged that each of 72 named defendants owns the number of units or "shares of trust certificates" set opposite his name in the complaint. Except for the omission of the allegation as to partnership of those defendants connected with Drascena Productions found in paragraph four of the first cause of action, and by reference thereto incorporated in causes two, three, and four, and the substitution thereof of the allegation as to nature and membership of Drascena Productions above referred to, causes five to eight, both inclusive, contain the same allegations as do causes one to four, respectively; that is to say, five corresponds to one, counting on the reasonable value of the work done, etc., as the basis of the original indebtedness; six corresponds to two, counting on the promise of Morante Comedy Company to pay, and so on.

It is to be noted that, while the first eight causes of action differ in the details above enumerated, they all set up the note executed by Drascena Productions. The ninth and tenth causes of action do not. The ninth cause of action alleges indebtedness to the Laboratories on the part of all the defendants on a book account showing $3,000 due and an assignment thereof to the plaintiff, while the tenth sets up an account stated between the Laboratories and all the defendants together with such assignment. With these exceptions the last two causes of action are but a repetition of the allegations of the first, with paragraphs four, six, and nine, hereinabove briefed, omitted.

Drascena Productions as a separate entity was not made a party to the action, the title of the same as it appears from the complaint listing all defendants other than Oltman and Morante as "Co-partners, doing business under the firm name and style of 'Drascena Productions.'" The transcript fails to show service on or appearance by some of the defendants, including Oltman, Morante, and the Morante Comedy Company; others who were served defaulted, and their defaults were duly entered. Therefore, in further reference to "the defendants," we are to be understood as meaning only those who answered. These may be divided into four groups. Group one was composed of thirteen defendants on behalf of whom an answer was filed by attorneys Schweitzer & Hutton and included the defendant Lars A. Dahl, specially mentioned for reasons which will appear later. The answer of this group failed to deny or in any way refer to the tenth cause of action set up in the complaint. Group two also consisted of thirteen defendants, represented by attorney Winterer, and to these thirteen may be added defendants Apostol and Arnis, who had filed a separate answer by other counsel, but who were represented at the trial by Mr. Winterer. Group three was composed of defendants I. N. and Nellie M. Thompson, on whose behalf an answer was filed by attorney C. O. Morgan. The record indicates that Nellie M. Thompson died pending the proceedings, and that attorneys Bordwell & Mathews appeared for the executor at the trial. The fourth group (if merely for the purpose of classification we may be permitted to apply the word "group" to one individual) consisted of the defendant Howard C. Galloupe, who appeared in propria personam. The answers of the three last mentioned groups included denials as to the tenth cause of action.

During the progress of the trial, but before the plaintiff had rested his case in chief, the defendants composing groups one and two, as hereinabove designated, moved the court "that the plaintiff be required to elect as to which particular remedy and which particular cause of action in the amended complaint he will stand on." This motion the court granted, over the objection of the plaintiff, who thereupon elected to stand upon his fifth cause of action. No such motion was made on behalf of the other defendants.

Upon the plaintiff resting his case, Mr. Winterer, upon behalf of the fifteen defendants whom he represented, moved for a nonsuit. Mr. Clary, appearing for Schweitzer and Hutton, made a similar motion on behalf of twelve of the defendants represented by that firm, but did not so move on behalf of the defendant Dahl. No such motion was made as to defendants Galloupe and I. N. Thompson, or as to the executor of Nellie M. Thompson. True, the judgment recites that such a motion was made on behalf of said executor, but the bill of exceptions contained in the transcript shows this to be incorrect. These two separate motions were granted and judgment was entered against the plaintiff and in favor of all the defendants represented by Mr. Winterer, the twelve defendants represented by Schweitzer and Hutton on whose behalf the motion had been made, and also in favor of the executor of the last will and testament of Nellie M. Thompson, as to whom the bill of exceptions, certified by the trial judge as correctly setting forth all of the proceedings had during the trial, fails to show that any such motion was made.

Although we have concluded that the nonsuit was not erroneously ordered, we deem it essential under the special circumstances of the instant cause to discuss and determine the assignments of error.

[1] The first point relied on by appellant for a reversal of the judgment is that the court erred in requiring him to elect as between his ten causes of action. This point is well taken, and except for the reasons later stated in this opinion would require a reversal of the judgment.

As we have noted, the first eight causes of action all count upon the note, the allegations of the nature of the original indebtedness which it evidenced, as arising upon a quantum meruit, a promise to pay, an account stated or a book account, being but matters of inducement. For the purpose of this discussion these eight causes of action may be grouped together and treated as one, namely, a cause of action on a promissory note. The ninth cause of action is not upon the note, which is neither pleaded therein by direct averment or by reference to other causes of action, but is upon a book account as to all the defendants, and the tenth is like the ninth except that it is upon an account stated. Assuming that these several causes of action are based upon the same transaction and involve the same amount of money, a fact which is conceded by all parties to this appeal, the plaintiff had a right to set them forth in varied or even in inconsistent counts (Keller v. Hicks, 22 Cal. 457, 83 Am. Dec. 78; Wilson v. Smith, 61 Cal. 209; Stockton Combined Harvester, etc., Works v. Glen Falls Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 167, 53 P. 565; Froeming v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., 171 Cal. 401, 153 P. 712, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 408; Tanforan v. Tanforan, 173 Cal. 270, 159 P. 709, 711; Turner v. Turner, 173 Cal. 782, 161 P. 980; Cameron v. Ah Quong, 175 Cal. 377, 165 P. 961), nor could he properly be compelled to elect as to which count or cause of action he relied on. Cowan v. Abbott, 92 Cal. 100, 28 P. 213; Rucker v. Hall, 105 Cal. 425, 38 P. 962; Estrella Vineyard Co. v. Butler, 125 Cal. 232, 57 P. 980; Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 141, 73 P. 820; Figlietti v. Frick, 203 Cal. 246, 263 P. 534; Van Lue v. Wahrlich-Cornett Co., 12 Cal. App. 749, 108 P. 717; Rand v. Columbian Realty Co., 13 Cal. App. 444, 110 P. 322. As said in Tanforan v. Tanforan, supra: "Since, then, inconsistent causes of action may be pleaded, it is not proper for the judge to force upon the plaintiff an election between those causes which he has a right to plead. Plaintiff is entitled to introduce his evidence upon each and all of these causes of action, and the election, or in other words the decision as to which of them is sustained, is, after the taking of all the evidence, a matter for the judge or the jury." In that case the court held that the order compelling the plaintiff to elect was erroneous, but that the plaintiff was not injured thereby since at the time it was made all of the plaintiff's evidence had been submitted and "not one word of it substantiated" the count which, pursuant to the order to elect, he was compelled to abandon. But in the instant case the order was made before the plaintiff had rested, and he was therefore precluded from offering evidence, if any he had, which might have substantiated the allegations set forth in the causes of action, or one of them, which he was compelled to abandon by reason of the erroneous ruling. Moreover, the court's order was not restricted to the plaintiff's various causes of action as against the defendants on whose behalf the motion for an election was made, but required him to elect as to all defendants whether joining in the motion or not.

[2-4] We do not, however, intend what we have said as to the right to plead inconsistent causes of action to be deemed a statement or even an implication that the counts in which the note is pleaded are inconsistent with those in which it is not. Ordinarily a promissory note is but an evidence of indebtedness. Gregory v. Williams, 106 Kan. 819, 189 P. 932. It "does not discharge the debt for which it is given unless such be the express agreement of the parties; it only operates to extend until its maturity the period for the payment of the debt" The Kimball, 3 Wall. 45, 18 L. Ed. 50. "Nothing is better settled than that accepting a note is not payment of an account" Black v. Sippy, 15 Or. 574, 16 P. 418, 419. The creditor, therefore, has his option either to sue on the original indebtedness or upon the note given as evidence thereof, except that he may not pursue the former remedy until the expiration of the time of maturity as extended by the note. Holley v. Smally, 50 App. D. C. 178, 269 F. 694; Lake v. Fletcher, 52 App. D. C. 46, 280 F. 1020; Schreyer v. Turner Flouring Mills Co., 29 Or. 1, 43 P. 719; Savage v. Savage, 36 Or. 268, 59 P. 461; Sullivan v. Rudisill, 63 Iowa, 158, 18 N. W. 856; Stalnaker v. Tolbert, 121 S. C. 437, 114 S. E. 412; First National Bank v. Larsen, 146 Wis. 653, 132 N. W. 610. Having his option to sue either on the original indebtedness or on the note given and received as evidencing it, it is proper under our practice for him, if so advised, to join in the one complaint a cause of action on the former with a cause of action on the latter; and it being proper for him to plead his case in this manner, it follows that it is improper for the court to compel him to elect to proceed on the one count and to abandon the other.

[5, 6] Turning our attention next to the point that the court erred in granting the motions for nonsuit, we shall first consider the question thus presented with respect to the defendants represented by Schweitzer and Hutton. The answer interposed by this group failed, as we have already noted, to in any way mention the tenth cause of action set up in the amended complaint. As to the seventh cause of action the answer was as follows: "That these defendants have no information or belief upon which to base an answer to the allegations contained in the seventh cause of action, and on that ground deny each and every allegation thereof." The eighth and ninth causes of action were treated in the same manner. As to these three causes of action the answer was entirely insufficient to raise an issue. The amended complaint was verified, and hence under section 437 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it stood during the period of the pendency of this case in the court below a specific denial of each allegation intended to be controverted was required in order to raise an issue thereon. This has always been the rule in this state. Hensley v. Tartar, 14 Cal. 508; Levinson v. Schwartz, 22 Cal. 229; People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 171; Fish v. Redington, 31 Cal. 185; Gay v. Winter, 34 Cal. 153. In the absence of such specific denial the truth of the allegation is deemed admitted. Section 462, Code Civ. Proc.; Pico v. Colimas, 32 Cal. 578; Kinney v. Maryland Casualty Co., 15 Cal. App. 571, 115 P. 456; Hirons v. Clare, 38 Cal. App. 608, 177 P. 291. The case therefore stood, as to the defendants in the first group, in exactly the same position as if they had actually in terms admitted the truth of the allegations contained, either by direct averment or by reference to paragraphs in preceding causes of action, in the last four counts. A motion for nonsuit made by a defendant may be granted only "when upon the trial the plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury" (section 581, Code Civ. Proc.). These causes of action being thus deemed admitted, the plaintiff was not required to offer proof as to any of them. Schwartz v. DeWit, 1 Cal. Unrep. 40.

The provisions of section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure above cited are but a restatement of those of section 65 of the Practice Act, which was the predecessor of the Code. In Hensley v. Tartar, supra, decided under the provisions of the Practice Act, the defendant had thus answered the allegations of the verified complaint: "And now comes Nicholas Tartar, one of the defendants, and makes his separate answer and says, that he denies generally and specifically each and every material allegation in the complaint, the same as if such allegation were herein recapitulated." This was followed by a separate denial of each allegation in the same form (subject to certain qualifications and exceptions). The court held that these denials raised no issue upon any fact stated in the complaint. We quote from the opinion: "The point in the present case is this: The plaintiff was nonsuited for failing to introduce evidence in support of certain allegations of the complaint. This he assigns as error, and contends that under the pleadings these allegations were to be taken as true, and that the evidence was therefore unnecessary. Sec. 65 of the Practice Act, provides that 'every material allegation of the complaint, when it is verified, not specifically controverted by the answer, shall, for the purpose of the action, be taken as true.' (Wood's Dig. 175.) In this neither of the answers contains a specific denial of any material allegation in the complaint. The denials are in the most general form, and their legal effect is not changed by expressions showing that they were intended to be specific." Because of this error the judgment was reversed. Except for the reasons later discussed it would have been erroneous for the court in the instant case to have granted a nonsuit as to the last four causes of action: Adams v. Tucker, 6 Colo. App. 393, 40 P. 783; Darlington v. Hamilton Bank (Sup.) 112 N. Y. S. 1097.

The order here involved may be treated as a general order of nonsuit as to the whole of the plaintiff's case, including all causes of action set up in his amended complaint, since, as we have held, the order to elect was erroneous. The situation is similar to that in Pacific Vinegar Works v. Smith, 152 Cal. 507, 93 P. 85, 87, where it was urged that the trial court had erred in refusing to grant a nonsuit as to one of the plaintiff's twelve causes of action as to which the proof had failed. Passing on this contention the court said: "But the motion was directed 'to all the causes of action mentioned in the complaint,' and was not tenable unless, as to all, there was a failure of evidence." The same reasoning might well apply to the order compelling an election, heretofore discussed.

As to the defendants who appeared by Mr. Winterer (not including Apostol and Arnis, who had filed a separate answer) the situation is somewhat different, due to the fact that their answer does not omit reference to any of the causes of action and does contain specific denials of the matters alleged therein. Most of these denials, however, are on information and belief, and it is the contention of appellant that as to certain of these such form of denial was insufficient and raised no issue; that therefore this group of defendants must also be regarded as having admitted many of the facts alleged in the complaint, and hence are in the same category with the defendants in the first group. In discussing this point we shall confine our attention to matters which are specifically pointed out in the appellant's briefs.

[7] First: Paragraph seven of the first cause of action, which by reference is also incorporated in all other causes of action except the ninth and tenth, specifically alleges an agreement between the partnership known as Morante Comedy Company and all the other defendants, whereby the former sold, transferred, and conveyed all its business and properties to the latter, who "promised, assumed and agreed to pay" the amount due to the Laboratories. As these eight causes of action are actually upon the note, this allegation is but a matter of inducement, and not material, and for that reason the form of the denial is also immaterial.

[8] Second: Paragraph nine of the first cause of action, similarly incorporated in the following seven counts, alleges the execution of the note and its delivery to Morante Comedy Company by all other defendants. This is met by a denial, on information and belief, "that on the 9th day of February, 1921, or at any other time, as evidence of any obligation at all of the said defendants, or any of them, the defendants, other than said Milburn Morante and Morante Company, or any of the said defendants, made, executed, and delivered, or made, executed or delivered, * * * that certain alleged promissory note set forth in said paragraph." Inasmuch as the note which is set out in hæc verba shows on its face that it was executed only by "Drascena Productions, by Charles M. Conant, President," it may be deemed that the note itself is contradictory of the allegation as to its execution by the defendants, in which case the note would govern as against the allegation, since specific averments must be given precedence over general averments in case of an inconsistency between the two. Horton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 462, 187 P. 1070. Drascena Productions as an entity was not a defendant. We may, therefore, disregard the allegation as to execution of the note by the individual defendants and with it the form of the denial of its execution.

[9, 10] There still remains to be considered, however, the allegation that the note was delivered and that such delivery was as evidence of the obligation of the defendants. This allegation is met only by denial on information and belief, and it will be observed that even this is merely a denial that the note was delivered "as evidence of any obligation at all of the said defendants or any of them," and that it does not deny the fact of delivery. This is not a sufficient denial to raise an issue as to the delivery of the note. Whether or not the defendants delivered the note was a matter presumably within their own knowledge, and one, therefore, which they were called upon to deny positively if they wished to raise an issue on that point. Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 35 P. 144; Zany v. Rawhide Gold Mining Co., 15 Cal. App. 373, 114 P. 1026; Jensen v. Dorr, 159 Cal. 742, 116 P. 553.

[11] Third: Paragraph ten of the first cause of action, made a part of the other causes of action, alleges that Bloom Laboratories had filed the certificate required by sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code. This was a matter of record which the defendants could not put in issue by denial on information and belief. Santa Barbara Lumber Co. v. Ross, 183 Cal. 657, 192 P. 436, and cases cited in 21 Cal. Jur., p. 150.

[12] Fourth: The tenth cause of action alleges that an account was stated between the defendants and the Laboratories "wherein and whereby it was shown that the defendants and each of them were indebted to said Bloom Film Laboratories in the amount of $3,000, which amount the defendants and each of them promised and agreed to pay. * * *" Whether or not an account had been stated, and whether or not the defendants had promised to pay the $3,000, were most certainly matters within their knowledge and which they were called upon to positively deny unless they desired to be deemed to have admitted them. A denial on information and belief as to these allegations is tantamount to an admission (see cases cited under "Second" above).

[13] Thus we find that the answer of these defendants, like that of those in the first group, raises no issue whatever as to certain material allegations, and the latter being therefore deemed admitted, the plaintiff was required to offer no proof thereon and the court was not justified in granting a nonsuit against him on the theory that the answer was sufficient if, as the record indicates, there was evidence tending to support those material allegations which were properly denied.

Some of the grounds advanced in the motion for the nonsuit were not sufficiently stated, but one of them was based on the theory of the defendants that the declaration of trust under which Drascena Productions was created did not constitute a partnership and that the defendants holding interests therein were not liable personally as partners.

The "Agreement and Declaration of Trust" is set out in full as an exhibit attached to the answer of the defendants represented by Schweitzer and Hutton, and the same was by stipulation admitted in evidence. At the outset it recites that it is an agreement and declaration of trust made and entered into by and between certain named persons "and all other parties who may become parties to this agreement, herein designated as the 'subscribers,'" and certain others designated as trustees. It then witnesses that the subscribers "are now engaged in the business of producing motion picture films under the title and designation of Drascena Productions," have acquired the ownership of certain picture rights, leaseholds, and contracts, and have paid into a common fund the sum of $25,000, "to be used in defraying the costs and expenses of said business," and that they have individually signified their intention to form a permanent organization under the same name to carry on the said business and to transfer to such organization all their monies, properties, etc. It then provides, among other things, that the five trustees shall have full authority and control; that title to the property shall be vested in them; that they shall fill vacancies and name successors; that they shall have full authority to borrow money and to execute notes therefor, and that they are authorized to issue 2,500 shares of trust certificates each of a par value of $100 to the several subscribers, and from time to time issue and sell up to 2,500 additional shares. There is also a provision as to liability of trustees and subscribers. The beneficiaries or certificate holders have no control of the affairs of the organization.

Appellant very frankly admits his inability to define the legal relationship between the subscribers to this agreement. Respondents insist that it constitutes what is known as a "Massachusetts Trust" and argue that, as held by the courts of that state with regard to such entities, the unit or certificate holders, or, as they are called in the instrument here involved, "the subscribers," are not individually liable for the debts of the trust as in the case of members of a copartnership. To this point they cite the cases of Williams v. Milton, 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355, 357; Frost v. Thompson, 219 Mass. 360, 106 N. E. 1009, and Bouchard v. First People's Trust, 253 Mass. 351, 148 N. E. 895, as well as a number of cases from other jurisdictions, all of which support their contention. On the other hand, the appellant relies upon Stitzinger v. Truitt, 81 Cal. App. 502, 253 P. 971, 972, and Old Rivers Farms Co. v. Roscoe Haegelin Co. (Cal. App.) 276 P. 1047, 1050. For reasons we shall point out, these cases do not assist in a solution of the present problem. In the Stitzinger Case it is said: "It is pointed out that, when the members of a so-called business trust reserve to themselves such a large measure of power and control over the trustees as is done in this case, then the trustees are merely agents of the members and the members are personally liable for debts as general partners. Appellants have not replied to these authorities, having filed no closing brief; but in their opening brief appellants claim the articles constitute a joint-stock company. 'At common law joint-stock companies were regarded as commercial partnerships, and in the absence of express provisions, statutory or otherwise, the rights and liabilities of their members are to be determined by substantially the same rules.'" In the present instance, the absolute and entire control of the affairs is vested in five trustees without power of removal or election of new trustees by the members. There is, therefore, no question such as is mentioned in the first part of the quotation. Further, it is not contended that the organization is a joint-stock company. The perfected arrangement has every indication of being a valid trust and the question reduces itself to this: Can a trust be organized in this state for the purpose of engaging in business? If it can, then the law respecting the liability of beneficiaries would seem to answer the remaining question. There is a statement in the second case relied upon by appellant which, taken by itself and separated from the facts upon which it is predicated, seems to answer the question asked in the negative. It follows: "The law has anticipated that individuals may desire to embark in business ventures without risking their entire capital, and has provided for just such cases by ample statutory enactments and by direct constitutional provisions. Appellants, however, attempt to disregard all of these wise and salutary laws, and ask us to hold them as naught. This we decline to do." When applied to the question in that case the language is unobjectionable and apt, but we are not ready to accord to the statement an unlimited application. The argument advanced by appellant in that case was, that "Roscoe Haegelin Company is a corporation as such term is defined in section 4 of article 12 of the Constitution of the state of California." The section referred to reads: "The term corporations, as used in this article, shall be construed to include all associations and joint-stock companies having any of the powers or privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships." It was argued that the Haegelin Company was a joint-stock company, hence a corporation under the quoted section. The language employed by the court in its application to the questions before it simply means that the state, in the exercise of its legislative function, has adopted wise and salutary laws providing for the method of organizing a corporation by those who desire to engage in business under a corporate form for the purpose of avoiding the risk of their entire capital in the enterprise, which laws we are asked to set aside by a declaration that the steps there outlined are not prerequisite to the lawful organization of a corporation. And the court concludes: "This we decline to do." When interpreted in the light of the questions involved in that case, the statements have quite another meaning from the one which might ordinarily attach if they were unrelated thereto. In other words, we do not read the words of the District Court of Appeal to mean that it is impossible in California for men to intrust their capital to one or more trustees in whom they have implicit confidence and over whom they seek to exercise no control without assuming any greater risk than the loss of the funds placed in the trust. Our laws expressly recognize the right of men to relieve themselves of the burden of personally supervising their affairs by placing their capital in the hands of trustees for management, reserving, to themselves or others, income therefrom. It is true that until the legislative session of 1929 certain limitations were placed upon the purposes for which estates in real property might be held in trust by section 857 of the Civil Code, but no such restrictions were laid against the creation of trusts in personal property, such as we are dealing with in the present action. Section 2220 of the Civil Code authorizes the creation of express trusts in personalty for any purpose for which a contract may lawfully be made. And our courts have recognized the right there declared. In Re Walk-erly, 108 Cal. 627, 656, 41 P. 772, 778, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97, we find the following: "The essential difference in this state between trusts in real property known as 'express trusts' and those in personal property are: First, the former can only be of the kinds permitted by the statute, and no others (Civ. Code, § 857), while the latter may be created generally for any purpose for which a contract may be made (Civ. Code, § 2220);" and in Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457, 482, we read: "Here, as in New York, 'trusts in personal estate are subject to no statutory restriction; in other words, the Legislature has never attempted to define and enumerate the lawful occasions for such trusts.' (Gilman v. Red-dington, 24 N. Y. 12.) They stand, therefore, as at the common law, subject only to the statutory rule of section 715, and to the direction against accumulations. (§§ 724, 2220.)" In Toland v. Toland, 123 Cal. 140, 55 P. 681, 682, it is said: "A trust in personal property may be created for any purpose for which a contract may lawfully be made (Civ. Code, § 2220), and the creation of a trust does not of itself suspend the power of alien-ation, unless a trust term in the property is created, within which a sale or other alien-ation by the trustee would be in contravention of the trust." The same principle is again recognized in Stephens v. Lemoore Canal & Irrigation Co., 22 Cal. App. 579, 135 P. 707. See, also, Hellman v. McWilliams, 70 Cal. 449, 11 P. 659; 25 Cal. Jur. p. 302.

It is obvious, therefore, that the settled leg-islative policy of this state is to lay no re-strictions against the formation of trusts in personalty, but rather to leave open to such organizations the conduct of any lawful en-terprise.

[14] Having established the proposition of law that individuals have the right to for-mulate a trust in personalty for any legiti-mate purpose, can it be doubted that the ar-rangements here perfected constitute a trust rather than a partnership or joint stock as-sociation? We have already noted that the authorities relied upon by respondents sup-port their contention. In view of the im-portance of the question under consideration, we deem it proper to quote at some length from Williams v. Milton, supra, the reason-ing of which is in accord with the other au-thorities mentioned and a portion of which has been quoted with approval in the case of Crockett v. Malley, 249 U. S. 223, 39 S. Ct.

270, 63 L. Ed. 573, 2 A. L. R. 1601. The ex-cerpt follows: "Williams v. Boston, 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808, was a similar case. The trust agreement in that case provided that the trust was established 'for the pur-chase, development and disposition of' the former site of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. The property was to be held by trustees, but the shareholders had a right to remove the trustees, and meetings of the shareholders were to be held at which the shareholders might authorize or instruct the trustees in any manner and alter or amend the declaration of trust, or direct the trustees to end the trust, sell the property and dis-tribute the proceeds. The original papers in the case show these to have been the facts in the case, although they are not stated in the report of that decision. The property of this association was held to be taxable as partnership property.

"In Mayo v. Moritz, 151 Mass. 481, 24 N. E. 1083, on the other hand, it was held that certificate holders under the declara-tion of trust there in question were not part-ners. In that case an inventor transferred his invention to trustees to whom by the terms of the trust indenture the patent was to be issued when it was issued. The trust indenture provided for the issue of scrip to those who should furnish to the trustees the money necessary for the more advantageous disposition of the invention. The trust on which the trustees were to hold the inven-tion and the money produced by the issue of scrip was to hold, manage and dispose of the invention or any part thereof or interest therein upon such terms as to them (the trust-ees) or a majority of them should seem best, the net proceeds to be paid one-half to the inventor and the other half to the holders of the scrip or certificates. The scrip, called in the trust indenture scrip or certificates, was transferable. Vacancies in the office of trustees were to be filled by the remaining trustees. It was held that the scrip holders were not partners, and in that respect the case was 'unlike Gleason v. McKay, 134 Mass. 419, and Phillips v. Blatchford, 137 Mass. 510.'

"The difference between Hoadley v. Coun-ty Commissioners, 105 Mass. 519 (involving the same indenture as that in Gleason v. Mc-Kay, 134 Mass. 419), Whitman v. Porter, 107 Mass. 522, Phillips v. Blatchford, 137 Mass. 510, Ricker v. American Loan & Trust Co., 140 Mass. 346, 5 N. E. 284, and Williams v. Boston, 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808, on the one hand, and Mayo v. Moritz, 151 Mass. 481, 24 N. E. 1083, on the other hand, lies in the fact that in the former cases the certificate holders are associated together by the terms of the 'trust' and are the principals whose instructions are to be obeyed by their agent who for their convenience holds the legal title to their property, the property is their property, they are the masters; while in Mayo v. Moritz, on the other hand, there is no association between the certificate holders, the property is the property of the trustees and the trustees are the masters. All that the certificate holders in Mayo v. Moritz had was a right to have the property managed by the trustees for their benefit. They had no right to manage it themselves nor to instruct the trustees how to manage it for them. As was said by C. Allen, J., in Mayo v. Moritz, 151 Mass. 481, 484, 24 N. E. 1083: 'The scrip holders are cestuis que trust, and are entitled to their share of the avails of the property when the same is sold,' and that is all to which they were entitled. In Mayo v. Moritz the scrip holders had a common interest in the trust fund in the same sense that the members of a class of life tenants and the members of a class of remaindermen (among whom the income of a trust fund and the corpus are to be distributed respectively) have a common interest. But in Mayo v. Moritz there was no association among the certificate holders just as there is no association although a common interest among the life tenants or the remaindermen in an ordinary trust. * * *

"This brings us to the question of the character of the Boston Personal Property Trust. It is plain that it is a trust and not a partnership. By the terms of the indenture of trust the property contributed by the certificate holders, or that bought with money contributed by them (the original trust property could be acquired in both ways by the terms of the indenture of trust), was to be held by the trustees in trust to pay the income to the holders of the certificates, and on the termination of the trust to divide the trust fund or the proceeds thereof among them. The certificate holders are throughout called 'cestuis que trustent.' The certificate holders, or 'cestuis que trustent,' are in no way associated together, nor is there any provision in the indenture of trust for any meeting to be held by them. The only act which (under the trust indenture) they can do is to consent to an alteration or amendment of the trust created by the indenture or to a termination of it before the time fixed in the deed. But they cannot force the trustees to make such alteration, amendment or termination. It is for the trustees to decide whether they will do any one of these things. All that the certificate holders or 'cestuis que trustent' can do is to give or withhold their consent to the trustees taking such action. And the giving or withholding of consent by the cestuis que trust is not to be had in a meeting, but is to be given by them individually. As we have said, no meeting of the cestuis que trust for that or any other purpose is provided for in the trust indenture. The trustees of the Boston Personal Property Trust have a right to sell the trust securities and reinvest the proceeds, and also a limited power to borrow on the security of the trust property. The certificate holders, or 'cestuis que trustent,' as they are called in the trust deed, have a common interest in precisely the same sense that the members of a class of life tenants (among whom the income of a trust fund is to be distributed) have a common interest, but they are not socii, and it is the trustees, not the certificate holders, who are the masters of the trust property. The sole right of the cestuis que trust is to have the property administered in their interest by the trustees, who are the masters, to receive income while the trust lasts, and their share of the corpus when the trust comes to an end." (Italics ours.) The reasoning here employed meets with our approval. The sum and substance of the declaration of trust under consideration is, that the certificate holders are not associated together for the purpose of carrying on business in accordance with the definition of a partnership as found in section 2395 of the Civil Code as it existed prior to its repeal in 1929; they have no control or direction over the investment of the corpus of the trust; the trustees are the masters; the cestuis que trustent are entitled only to receive the net income not required for the operation of the trust and the proportion of the corpus of the trust upon its termination. Were we to hold that such an arrangement of affairs made of the certificate holders copartners, we would be assuming a function which belongs exclusively to the legislative department of government.

[15] The appellant seeks to fasten liability upon the defendants solely by reason of their ownership of certificates of beneficial interest. Not only one, but all of his causes of action are founded upon this theory. It would constitute a perversion of justice for us to say, under such circumstances, that the failure of the defendants to properly answer some of the counts of the complaint demanded that we should reverse the judgment. There can be no doubt that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution of California applies in this instance as well as in others, and not only authorizes but also requires us, in accordance with our own sense of natural justice, to refrain from making a mockery of the law by an over-indulgence in the refinements of pleadings with an attendant loss of substantive fairness. For like reasons the failure of counsel for the executor of the last will and testament of Nellie M. Thompson to join in the motion for nonsuit is of no serious import.

There are other reasons advanced by the respondents why the judgment should be affirmed. We are of the opinion that they are not well taken, and in view of the conclusion to which we have come it is not necessary to discuss them.

Judgment affirmed.

I concur: CRAIG, Acting P. J.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem. (dissenting).

I dissent. I am unable to concur with the majority of the court in the view that the error which they concede was committed in forcing the plaintiff to elect as between his causes of action does not necessitate a reversal of the judgment.

As stated in the majority opinion, in its most clear and able resumé of the issues as made by the pleadings, the answers of the defendants represented by the firm of Schweitzer and Hutton do not in any way mention, much less do they deny, the allegations contained in the tenth cause of action, and, as further pointed out therein, the answers of this group of defendants to the seventh, eighth, and ninth causes of action were so drafted as to amount to admissions of the allegations thereof. As well and clearly stated by my learned brethren, "The case therefore stood, as to the defendants in the first group, in exactly the same position as if they had actually in terms admitted the truth of the allegations contained, either by direct averment or by reference to paragraphs in preceding causes of action, in the last four counts." The answer of the group represented by Mr. Winterer, as held in the majority opinion, "raises no issue whatever as to certain material allegations, and the latter being therefore deemed admitted, the plaintiff was required to offer no proof thereon." Among the material allegations thus held by it to be admitted the majority opinion points out the allegation in the tenth cause of action that an account had been stated "between the defendants" and the plaintiff's assignor, "wherein and whereby it was shown that the defendants and each of them were indebted to (the assignor) in the amount of $3,000, which amount the defendants and each of them promised and agreed to pay. * * *" (Italics are my own.) At the time, therefore, when the court below forced the plaintiff to elect to stand upon but one of his ten causes of action and to abandon the remaining nine, there were four causes of action which in contemplation of law were as much admitted by one group of defendants as though they had filed a written stipulation admitting the truth of the facts alleged, while as to the other main group of defendants the situation was the same with respect to the tenth cause of action. It is indulging in mere judicial jugglery to say that plaintiff had but one real cause of action and that that depended upon the theory of the liability of the defendants by reason of their membership in and ownership of certificates of the organization known as "Drascena Productions." It goes even, in my opinion, beyond this, since, as to the tenth cause of action at least, the complaint alleged as a fact—which the majority opinion rightly holds was admitted by all the defendants of these two groups—that an account had been stated between plaintiff's assignor and all of the defendants and that each and all of the individuals named as defendants had promised and agreed to pay the amount so stated. Irrespective of their legal liability as subscribers to the agreement under which Drascena Productions was organized, the defendants might, and it is an alleged and admitted fact as held by my learned associates that they did, severally and individually, "promise and agree to pay" the $3,000 representing the indebtedness assumed by their organization when it took over the business, assets, and liabilities of the Morante Comedies and for which there had been an account stated. How, then, can it be said that the plaintiff was not prejudiced by being forced to abandon a cause of action based upon a statement of facts sufficient to warrant a judgment in his favor, which facts were not denied but were in contemplation of law admitted by his adversaries?

I am also compelled to disagree with the majority opinion as to the ruling of the court below on the motions for nonsuit. What has just been said with respect to the order compelling plaintiff to elect applies with equal force to this branch of the case. It seems to me self-evident that where a cause of action states facts sufficient to support a judgment, and those facts are admitted by the defendants to be true, it is error of the most flagrant and prejudicial character to grant a nonsuit. The order granting the nonsuit applied to each and every one of the plaintiff's causes of action, including the tenth the allegations of which were, as the majority opinion so clearly points out, admitted to be true by the defendants of both the Schweitzer and Hutton, and Winterer groups. The prevailing opinion so holds in the unmistakably clear language which I now quote: "The order here involved may be treated as a general order of nonsuit as to the whole of the plaintiff's case, including all causes of action set up in his amended complaint, since, as we have held, the order to elect was erroneous." * * * Pacific Vinegar Works v. Smith, 152 Cal. 507, 93 P. 85." (Italics mine.)

Confining the discussion to the tenth cause of action, does it allege facts sufficient, if proved or as in this case admitted, to have supported a judgment for the plaintiff? That, it seems to me, is an absolute test of the correctness or prejudicial erroneousness of the order granting a nonsuit as applied to the instant case. As pointed out, the tenth cause of action alleges an account stated and the promise of "the defendants and each of them" to pay the amount thereof, an allegation as to which, as the majority opinion correctly holds, "the plaintiff was not required to offer proof," since its truth was admitted. Suppose that a judgment on the pleadings had been given as to this cause of action. Bearing in mind that each cause of action must be separately stated (Code Civ. Proc. § 427; Cosgrove v. Fisk, 90 Cal. 77, 27 P. 56) and must be complete in itself (Hopkins v. Contra Costa County, 106 Cal. 566, 39 P. 933; Reading v. Reading, 96 Cal. 4, 30 P. 803), could this court hold on an appeal from such judgment that the admitted fact that an account had been stated and that the defendants and each of them had promised and agreed to pay the amount thereof was insufficient to warrant and support such judgment? Would the fact that the pleading also contained an averment that the defendants were members of a so-called trust, of the Sons and Daughters of I-Will-Arise or of the Hole-in-One club be regarded as having any bearing on the question of the liability of those who had admittedly promised and agreed to pay a certain sum? As to that cause of action, regarded, as it must be, as though it were the only cause of action set up, would not the averment of membership in Drascena Productions necessarily be treated as mere surplusage—as a statement which could not have the remotest bearing on the admitted fact that the defendants and each of them had promised and agreed to pay a certain sum of money? Or if not so regarded would it not be deemed, as to this cause of action, a mere matter of inducement, explanatory, possibly, of the reason for the promise of the individual defendants to pay? In attempted justification of their attitude on this question the majority of the court says: "The appellant seeks to fasten liability upon the defendants solely by reason of their ownership of certificates of beneficial interest (in Drascena Productions). Not only one but all of his causes of action are founded upon this theory. It would constitute a perversion of justice for us to say under such circumstances that the failure of the defendants to properly answer some of the counts of the complaint demanded that we should reverse the judgment." (Italics are mine.) And this in the face of their positive statement that one group of defendants did not answer the tenth cause of action at all and that the answer of another group amounted to an express admission of the truth of its allegations! We are not concerned here with answers that merely failed to traverse averments of the complaint with scrupulous adherence to the rules of perfect pleading, but with answers which, to again quote the words of the majority opinion, placed one group of defendants "in exactly the same position as if they had actually in terms admitted the truth of the allegations" and another group in the position of having raised "no issue whatever as to certain material allegations." I cannot agree that, at least as to the tenth cause of action, the appellants sought to fasten liability upon the defendants solely or at all by reason of their ownership of certificates in Drascena Productions. As I have pointed out, the gravamen of that cause of action was the promise and agreement of each and all of the defendants to pay the amount of the account stated. Is this court to hold as a matter of law that the allegation of the complaint which it says was admitted as true by the defendants is in fact false? And without proof, or the opportunity for proof, is it to rule that the individual defendants did not nor did any of them promise and agree to pay? If this is the law it certainly was not the law until the majority of this court spoke. Having ruled in effect that persons engaged in a common business enterprise, without complying with those provisions of our law which enable individuals to escape full personal liability, may render themselves immune from their obligations by signing a paper called a trust agreement, are we to further hold that the fact of membership in this extra-legal organization negatives the admitted fact that the individual members and each of them "promised and agreed to pay"? The "perversion of justice," in my humble opinion, consists of the affirmation of a judgment of nonsuit as to a cause of action alleging facts sufficient to support a judgment in the face of the admission of those facts by the defendants, and in the assumption, in the face of the pleaded and admitted promise and agreement of the defendants and each of them to pay the amount of the account stated and without one word in the record to support such assumption, that the plaintiff, at least as regards the tenth cause of action, relied solely upon the membership of the defendants in Drascena Productions. Even if the defendants had not placed themselves as the majority opinion puts it, "in exactly the same position as if they had actually in terms admitted the truth of the allegations" as to the promise of each and all of them to pay the $3,000, had the court below the right to assume, without allowing an opportunity for the plaintiff to offer proof as to this cause of action, that he would have been unable to substantiate the truth of his averments therein contained? In my opinion the question answers itself.

I am convinced that the errors of the trial court, first in forcing the plaintiff to elect to proceed on one of his causes of action and to abandon the others and second in granting the motion for nonsuit, absolutely demand a reversal of the judgment irrespective of all question as to the liability of the defendants as members of Drascena Productions. Upon that question, which I do not admit is necessarily involved in the decision of the appeal

I again find myself not in accord with the opinion of my learned brethren.

The majority opinion clearly and succinctly describes the provisions of the instrument under which Drascena Productions was organized, although it fails to note that this "Agreement and Declaration of Trust," in addition to the provisions reviewed, contains the following, which it seems to me somewhat negatives the apparent theory of my associates that the subscribers or members retained no control whatever over the business of the organization, namely, a clause reading: "Any changes, additions or alterations in any way affecting the rights, privileges, and interest of the 'Cestui,' shall only be made by the consent of the owners and holders of two-thirds of all the outstanding shares of trust certificates;" a clause providing for the termination of the trust by a two-thirds vote of all of the members at a meeting called for that purpose, in which event the assets are to be liquidated and the proceeds distributed in cash to the members "pro rata to each, according to their respective interests thereon [sic]," and a provision requiring the written consent of the holders of two-thirds of the issued certificates before any except a purchase-money mortgage can be placed on the property of the trust.

The agreement itself recites the fact that the subscribers had theretofore been engaged in a certain business, to wit, the production of motion picture films, and that they had been carrying on this business under the same name as that under which they were to continue to operate after signing the agreement. It further recites their acquisition of ownership in certain personal property and the existence of a common fund of $25,000, contributed by the subscribers, "to be used in defraying the costs and expenses of said business." It seems evident that these subscribers were previously and at the time of their execution of the so-called trust agreement engaged in a joint adventure, a common business enterprise, each being individually liable under the law for the debts incurred in carrying out such enterprise. Leake v. City of Venice, 56 Cal. App. 462, 195 P. 440. That is made clear by the recitals of their agreement, as follows: "Whereas, the subscribers are now engaged in the business of producing motion picture films under the title and designation of 'Drascena Productions' * * * and whereas the said subscribers at a meeting held on the 25th day of August, 1920, individually signified their purpose to form a permanent organization to be known as 'Drascena Productions,' and to engage in and carry on the business of producing motion picture films. * * *" (Italics mine.) Individuals engaged in a business venture and charged by law with liability to the creditors of the business may not, by the terminology they elect to employ or by any agreement among themselves, divest themselves of the obligations imposed by law with regard to their dealings with those who are not members of their organization or parties to their agreements. Streeter v. Bacon, 49 Cal. App. 327, 193 P. 285. Had these associates desired to continue to carry on their business under conditions whereunder their individual liability might have been legally limited, the Constitution and laws of the state provided the means whereby this end could have been attained, as, for example, by forming a corporation. The policy of our law has always been, as I understand it, that when two or more persons are engaged in a common business enterprise, under whatever name they may choose to label it, each is charged with liability for the debts incurred in its prosecution unless they see fit to organize their enterprise pursuant to and in accordance with laws which provide for a limited liability. In Old River Farms Co. v. Roscoe Haegelin Co. (Cal. App.) 276 P. 1047, 1050, a case in which this identical question was presented to this court, it was said of the subscribers to or members of just such a trust agreement: "The law has anticipated that individuals may desire to embark in business ventures without risking their entire capital, and has provided for just such cases by ample statutory enactments and by direct constitutional provisions. Appellants, however, attempt to disregard all of these wise and salutary laws, and ask us to hold them as naught. This we decline to do." It may be here noted in passing that the Supreme Court denied a hearing in the case just referred to, after judgment in the District Court of Appeal. The liability of such persons under the law is recognized by section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "When two or more persons, associated in any business, transact such business under a common name, whether it comprises the names of such persons or not, the associates may be sued by such common name, the summons in such cases being served on one or more of the associates; and the judgment in the action shall bind the joint property of all the associates, and the individual property of the party or parties served with process, in the same manner as if all had been named defendants and had been sued upon their joint liability." Here the members of Drascena Productions were named as defendants, and the transcript shows that they not only were served with process, but that most of them appeared and answered.

My brethren pro tempore lay particular stress upon the proposition that a trust may be formed in personal property. This may readily be granted, but the question of the legal liability to creditors of the associates engaged in, and forming a permanent organization for the purpose of continuing to engage in, a certain business is what we are dis-curring, not the legality of their organization. We may concede that these associates in a common business venture could form a trust without violating any statutory law of the state and transfer the legal title to their common property used in such business to the trustees thereof, and still leave undetermined the question of the power of such associates to escape from their obligations to the creditors of their business by agreement among themselves that sole liability should rest with the fictitious entity thus evolved. I can find no authority in the decisions of the courts of this state, whatever conclusion those of other jurisdictions may have arrived at, which sanctions such facinorous vermiculation toward the destruction of the foundation of the bulwark which the law has erected for the protection of those who in good faith pay over their money, deliver their goods, or furnish the labor of their hands, or the work of their brains to an enterprise organized for the enrichment of others, unless those others bring their organization within the purview of statutory provisions expressly providing for limitation of their individual liability. On the contrary, I find that our courts have heretofore uniformly set the seal of their disapproval upon such attempted evasions. Thus in Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 446, certain individuals had, to quote from the opinion, "associated themselves together for the purpose of uniting in one owner certain lands and water rights, some of which they then owned, and some of which were to be obtained from other parties, for the purpose of developing and selling the same, and dividing the proceeds of the sales between themselves, according to * * * their agreements in writing." For this purpose they agreed to form a corporation to which should be conveyed the property above referred to. Looking through the shadow thus projected by these associates to the substance behind it, the Supreme Court said: "That the corporation was formed as a mere agency for more conveniently carrying out the agreements between Temple, Beaudry, and Wilson, is sufficiently apparent. As a corporation, it paid nothing, incurred no liability, and was not to receive any part of the proceeds of the sales of land, except for the purpose of developing and improving the property held by it. All the profits were to be distributed among the three members of the association, in the proportion fixed by their contract. * * *

The relation which the corporation sustained to Wilson, Temple, and Beaudry was substantially, if not technically, that of a trustee. As was said by this court in Chater v. S. F. S. R. Co., 19 Cal. 246, 247: "The truth is, the corporation, under our system, following such an agreement, would be the mere agency of the associates, created for the sake of convenience in carrying out the agreement, as between those who made the bargain, the different characters or forms in which or by which the bargain was made, and the order in which the several parts of it were executed, making no substantial difference in the obligation." Substantial justice can be administered in this case by treating the parties in the light of their agreements between themselves, independently of their incorporation, and in no other way that we have been able to discover can this be done. Laying aside the act of incorporation, their relations to each other were those of partners. * * *

If this can be said where the persons engaged in carrying on a business and desirous of forming a permanent organization through which to continue to carry it on have gone through the form of organizing a corporation, how greater the application to those who have not even attempted to take refuge behind the skirts of a constitutional provision for limited personal liability! Shorb v. Beaudry has frequently been cited as authority in later decisions, among which are Conover v. Smith, 83 Cal. App. 227, 256 P. 835, 836, holding that "equity will look through form to substance where corporations are but the mere instrumentalities through which the associates acted"; Wittmann v. Whittingham, 85 Cal. App. 140, 259 P. 63; Conway v. Citrus Belt Land Co. (Cal. App.) 271 P. 525, 527, and Continental Securities, etc., Co. v. Rawson (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 954. In Conway v. Citrus Belt Land Co., supra, the court held that the "assumed corporate personalities" of corporations may be regarded as those of the individuals of which they may be composed, where the rights of creditors are involved, and quoted this language from Hunt v. Davis, 135 Cal. 31, 66 P. 957: "The corporation was formed as a mere agency for more conveniently carrying out the agreements of the parties; and the relation sustained by it to them is 'substantially, if not technically, that of a trustee.'" I fail to see in what way or by what magic the individual liability that may exist, even where the form of a corporation is erected as a screen and the relation of the corporation is, as to its members, "that of a trustee," can be made to vanish into thin air by the selection by those associated in a business enterprise of five of their number to act as their trustees in a continuation of the same business.

Approaching the question from a somewhat different angle, a well-established principle of law is well stated in Wenban Estate, Inc., v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 675, at page 696, 227 P. 723, 731: "While it is the general rule that a corporation is an entity separate and distinct from its stockholders, with separate, distinct liabilities and obligations, nevertheless there is a well-recognized and firmly settled exception to this general rule, that, when necessary to redress fraud, protect the rights of third persons, or prevent a palpable injustice, the law and equity will intervene and cast aside the legal fiction of independent corporate existence, as distinguished from those who hold and own the corporate capital stock, and deal with the corporation and stockholders as identical entities with identical duties and obligations. Accordingly it has been held that upon a sufficient showing that a corporation is but the instrumentality through which an individual, who is the sole owner of all of the corporate capital stock, for convenience transacts his business, equity, looking to the substance rather than the form of the relation, and the law as well, will hold such corporation obligated for the acts of the sole owner of the corporation to the same extent and just as he would be bound in the absence of the existence of the corporation. Llewellyn Iron Works v. Abbott Kinney Co., 172 Cal. 210, 155 P. 986; Commercial Security Co. v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 184 P. 964; Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 P. 673. Thus proof that an individual owns all of the stock of a corporation and that the corporation is in truth and in fact but the corporate double of the owner of the stock will, in conjunction with a further showing that as a result of the double relationship fraud or injustice will inure to a third person, suffice to dissipate the separate identity of the corporation. Minifie v. Rowley, supra. In such a situation, where, as here, the rights of third persons are involved, the law will have no compunction in holding the contract of the owner of the corporation dealing with the corporate assets to be the contract of the corporation. Porter v. Lassen County Land Co., 127 Cal. 261, 59 P. 563; Schuyler v. Pantages, 54 Cal. App. 83, 201 P. 137; Swartz v. Burr, 43 Cal. App. 442, 185 P. 411." I submit that the same principle applies where the entity, be it in the guise of a corporation or a "trust," under which the business is carried on, is but the alter ego of a group of associates instead of but a single individual.

In the opinion of the majority much stress is placed upon the fact that the subscribers to the trust agreement retained little or no control over the management of the business, that being delegated, as they say, entirely to the board of trustees by the terms of the agreement. But was this not also true as to the form of corporate organization employed in the cases above referred to?

There is much, although not unanimous, authority outside of the state for holding that the beneficiaries of a trust of the character commonly referred to as a "Massachusetts Trust" are not personally liable where, by the terms of the declaration of trust, all title to the assets and all control of business is vested in the trustees with no reservation of control power in the membership at large. See Rand v. Morse (C. C. A.) 289 F. 339; Simson v. Klipstein (D. C.) 262 F. 823; Baker-McGrew Co. v. Union Seed, etc., Co., 125

Ark. 146, 188 S. W. 571; Thompson v. Schmitt, 115 Tex. 53, 274 S. W. 554; Marchionis v. Adams, 97 W. Va. 517, 125 S. E. 340; Roller v. Madison, 172 Ky. 693, 189 S. W. 914; Hollister v. McCamey, 115 Tex. 49, 274 S. W. 562; Howe v. Keystone Pipe & Supply Co., 115 Tex. 158, 274 S. W. 563, 278 S. W. 177, and Medlin v. Ebenezer Methodist Church, 132 S. C. 498, 129 S. E. 830, which hold members of such associations individually liable. But even if we were to concede that individuals initiating a new business venture and starting, so to speak, with a clean slate, might contribute money or other property into such a trust without incurring personal liability for debts thereafter incurred by the trustees, a different case is presented when those already engaged in the conduct of a certain business venture, for the debts incurred in the prosecution of which they are individually liable as partners or as joint adventurers, merely continue the same business under a different label.

Reverting to Old River Farms Co. v. Roscoe Haegelin Co., supra, I am unable to follow the reasoning of my associates in their construction and application of the decision in that case. As I read the opinion of the majority of the court it seems to be based upon the theory that the question under discussion here was not involved there, and that the factor of absolute control in the hands of the trustees was not presented to the court. The reverse is true. The "Agreement and Declaration of Trust" under which the Roscoe Haegelin Company was organized was before the court, being included in the appendix to appellants' opening brief. Irrespective, therefore, of the name by which the parties to the appeal referred to that organization, whether as an "unincorporated association," a "joint stock company," a "Massachusetts Trust" or a "corporation," its exact nature and legal status was ascertainable to the court from an inspection of the instrument of its creation. Parenthetically it may be noted that such business organizations seem to be referred to indiscriminately in the digests and decisions either as joint-stock companies or as Massachusetts trusts. For instance, the heading under which the cases relating to them are collated in the American Digest, Decennial Edition, is "Joint Stock Companies and Business Trusts." Moreover, the question of the individual liability of the members was directly presented to the court, both upon the appeal and upon the petition for hearing in the Supreme Court, which petition the last-named tribunal denied. One of the four points urged by appellants is thus stated in bold-faced capitals in their opening brief: "Defendants' articles of association and the evidence without contradiction show that the shareholders of the association, other than the trustees had no voice in the management of the company and no title or interest in the property of the association. The trustees, therefore, were without power to create a personal liability against the shareholders, of which fact plaintiff had notice." (The trust agreement was recorded and the lease on which the action was brought was signed "Roscoe Haegelin Company, No personal liability, by Roscoe Haegelin, President.") In their petition for a hearing in the Supreme Court after the judgment of the District Court of Appeal, the appellants, under the caption "Question Presented," said: "The chief question presented by this appeal is one that has never been answered by this Honorable Court so far as research of counsel has been able to determine. We therefore believe that we are justified in asking the court to pass upon it. That question is, what is the liability of a stockholder of a joint stock association, who is not one of the trustees or directors of the association, to a creditor of the association?" * * * The Honorable District Court of Appeal * * * has held that such stockholder is liable as a general partner for the entire debt of the association, not for his proportionate share." And the petition points out that according to the terms of the trust agreement "The trustees held the legal title to all property at any time belonging to the company and had the absolute control, management and disposition thereof and of the business; they had a right to adopt a seal, elect their own officers, appoint their own agents, etc.; they were required to keep a record of their meetings and other records as in the case of corporations; to issue certificates for shares and transfer the same. As to the shareholders, it was provided that the owners of shares held no title in or to the trust property or had they any right in or to a partition, or division of the same, or to an accounting, and it was further provided that the trustees had no power to bind the shareholders personally." (Italics mine.)

Turning to the trust agreement which the court had before it when preparing its decision in the Haegelin Case, it will be found that it corresponds in all respects to that under which the business which had been theretofore known as Drascena Productions was to be carried on under the same name. The Roscoe Haegelin agreement first recites that the parties to it are five named persons "together with their successors herein designated as 'Trustees'" and certain other named individuals "together with their legal successors or assigns, hereinafter called 'Subscribers.'" It provides that there shall be five trustees who shall be designated as the Roscoe Haegelin Company and under that name shall "conduct all business and execute all instruments in writing, in the performance of their trust," and that "The trustees shall hold the legal title to all property at any time belonging to this trust, and subject only to the specific limitations herein contained, they shall have the absolute control, management and disposition thereof and shall likewise have the absolute control of the conduct of all the business of the trust." (Italics mine.) The "specific limitations" on the otherwise absolute authority of the trustees are the following, and these only: The number of shares "with the consent of not less than two-thirds of such of the shares as are represented and voted upon at any meeting called for that purpose" may be increased or diminished; the consent of the holders of at least two-thirds of the outstanding shares is required before the trustees can mortgage or pledge any of the property of the trust (the Drascena Productions agreement contains an almost identical provision); the trust agreement may be amended "except as regards the exemption from personal liability of the trustees, officers and shareholders" and "the priorities of the preferred shares, if any," at a special meeting of the shareholders, called for that purpose, with the consent of the holders of at least two-thirds of the outstanding shares. (The Drascena Productions agreement requires consent of the holders of two-thirds of all the outstanding certificates as a prerequisite to any change in the trust agreement which shall in anywise "affect or change the status of the cestuis qui trust in any particular manner.") The trustees are authorized: "(a) To purchase, lease or otherwise acquire lands and holdings in the State of California, or elsewhere, for the erection and establishment of a pickling, preserving and canning plant, together with the necessary appurtenances, engines and machinery, with a view to manufacture, buy, sell, import or otherwise deal in, either directly or indirectly, green, dried, pickled, preserved and canned meats, fruits, vegetables or other food products, through medium of agents or otherwise, and to purchase or otherwise acquire patents, patent rights, copyrights and privileges, improvements or secret processes of whatsoever nature or in anywise relating to all or any of the subjects aforesaid and to grant licenses for the use of or to sell or otherwise deal in any patents, patent rights, copyrights and privileges, improvements or secret processes, acquired by the company. (b) To engage in horticulture, viticulture or agriculture, and conduct and manage experimental farms for the encouragement of the growing of various food products necessary in said business in such localities in the state of California, or elsewhere, as they deem proper. To erect, maintain, purchase or rent, hire, lease, let or otherwise acquire or dispose of all real or personal property necessary or convenient to such business, in the manner provided in the eleventh paragraph hereafter. To acquire the good will, rights and property of any person, firm, association or corporation, and pay for the same in cash or stock of this company, bonds or obligations of this company, or otherwise, and to hold or in any manner dispose of the whole or any part of the property so acquired. (c) To engage in any business similar in character to that above mentioned which the trustees may deem expedient and to acquire, hold and dispose of the stocks, shares or securities of corporations, associations or persons doing business of a character similar to any business above described." It is provided that the enumeration of specific duties and powers "shall not be construed in anywise as a limitation upon the general powers intended to be conferred upon them." Among the specific powers conferred are: "* * * to adopt and use a common seal; to make all such contracts as they may deem expedient in the conduct of the business of the trust; from time to time to release, sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of, at public or private sale, any or all of the trust property, whether real or personal, for such price and prices, either in cash or in the stocks, shares or securities of corporations or associations, and upon such terms as to credit or otherwise as they may deem expedient; to guarantee the obligations of corporations or associations, and to enter into such agreement by way of indemnity, or otherwise, as they deem expedient in connection with the acquisition of property from the subscribers as hereinafter provided, or otherwise, to confer, by way of substitution such power and authority upon the president, treasurer and secretary and other officers and agents appointed by them, as they may deem expedient; to borrow money for the purpose of the trust, and give the obligations of the trustees therefor; to loan any money from time to time in the hands of the trustees, with or without security, on such terms in the furtherance of the business of the trust as the trustees may deem expedient; to subscribe for, acquire, own, sell or otherwise dispose of real and personal property, including the stocks, shares and securities of any corporation, trust and associations as they may deem expedient, in connection with the purpose of the trust; to vote in person or proxy on all shares of stock at any time held by them, and to collect and receive the income, interest and profits of any such stock or securities, to collect, sue for, receive and receipt for all sums of money at any time becoming due to said trust; to employ counsel and to begin, prosecute, defend and settle suits at law, or in equity, and to compromise or refer to arbitration any claims in favor of or against the trust; and in general, to do all such matters and things as in their judgment will promote or advance the business which they are authorized to carry on, although such matters and things may be not specifically authorized."

They are further empowered to adopt, amend, and repeal by-laws, to elect from among their number a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, and "to appoint such other officers, agents and attorneys as they may deem necessary or expedient in the conduct of said business," to fix the compensation thereof and to "remove any officer or agent elected or appointed by them." Transferable shares were to be issued to the subscribers as in the case of Drascena Productions, and the agreement provided: "The ownership of shares hereunder shall not entitle the shareholders to any title in or to the trust property whatsoever, or right to call for a partition or division of the same or for any accounting, and no shareholders shall have any right or further rights than the right of a stockholder in a corporation so far as the same may be applicable. The trustees shall have no power to bind the shareholders personally, or to call upon them for the payment of any sum or sums of money or any payment whatever other than such sums as they may at any time personally agree to pay by way of subscription to any new shares or otherwise. All persons or corporations extending credit to, contracting with or having any claim against the trustees shall look only to the funds and property of the trust for the payment of any such contracts or the claim or claims, or for the payment of any debt, damage, mortgage, judgment or decree or any money that may otherwise become due or payable to them from the trustees. In every written order, contract, or obligation which the trustees or officers shall give, authorize or enter into, it shall be the duty of the trustees and officers to stipulate or cause to be stipulated, that neither the trustees, officers nor shareholders shall be to any personal liability under or by reason of such order, contract or obligation, and on all statements, letter-heads, stationery, used by the trustees in the conduct of the business of said trust, shall be printed the words 'No personal liability.'" The duration of the trust was to be "for the term of ten years after the death of the last survivor of the persons whose names are signed hereto," at which time the trustees were required to liquidate its assets and distribute the proceeds to the then shareholders. (The Drascena Productions trust was to continue during the natural life of the subscribers who signed the agreement, with a like provision as to liquidation and distribution.)

I have quoted at length from the trust agreement of the Roscoe Haegelin Company in order to make it plain, to the point of demonstration, that the court was considering the liability of the members of an organization identical in every way with Drascena Productions. There are other clauses in one trust agreement that are almost word for word like those in the other, as for example those dealing with "Strangers to the Trust," declaration of dividends, trustee's liability for errors of judgment, and trustee's lack of power to bind shareholders personally.

The court in deciding the case of Old Farms Company v. Roscoe Haegelin Company squarely and unequivocally passed on the precise question here presented, and in closing its opinion with the language which I have quoted held that those choosing to conduct their business ventures under the guise of a trust could not limit or escape from their liability to the creditors of the business. The point was an important one, never before squarely presented in this state and with authority on both sides of the question in other states. Are we to place no importance at all in the fact that the highest court of the state, its attention called to the novelty and importance of the point at issue, declined to accord a further hearing after reading and considering the ruling of the District Court of Appeal?

For the reasons herein set forth, the judgment should be reversed.

ADAMS v. KAISER et al. ★

Civ. 6933.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 25, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 27, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 24, 1930.

1. Evidence ⇨528(2)—Sustaining objections to questions asked of medical witness to determine whether prior ailments or automobile accident shortened plaintiff's life held error.

In pedestrian's action for personal injuries sustained when struck by automobile, sustaining objections to questions asked of medical witness as to whether he had any opinion as to how many years injured pedestrian would have lived with diseases and troubles which existed before accident, disregarding accident, and whether he had opinion about how long she would live in her present condition, held error.

2. Evidence ⇨528(2)—Medical experts may give opinion as to probable expectancy of life of injured party who is suffering from ailment or disability.

Where plaintiff, in action for personal injuries, is suffering from ailment or disability which has tendency to shorten his life, medical experts may properly express an opinion as to probable expectancy of life of plaintiff.

3. Automobiles ⇨245(72)—Evidence in pedestrian's action for injuries sustained when struck by automobile held not to establish contributory negligence as matter of law.

In pedestrian's action for injuries sustained when struck by automobile while crossing street, where there was evidence that motorist passed another machine moving in same direction on its right-hand side in violation of statute at speed of 35 to 40 miles per hour, and that pedestrian was struck as she stepped out from in front of other machine, evidence held not to establish that pedestrian was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

4. Damages ⇨173(2)—Admission of evidence that injured party had been teacher in other states, and was qualifying herself to become teacher in state, held not error.

In pedestrian's action for injuries sustained when struck by automobile while crossing street, admission of evidence that pedestrian had been school teacher in other states, and was qualifying herself to become teacher in schools of state, held not error, since jury is entitled to know, not only what occupations pedestrian was able to engage in, but also any occupation which she might have reasonable probability of engaging in in future.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Action by Sally C. Adams against Edgar Kaiser and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, and Crosby & Crosby, of Oakland, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, while crossing the street in the city of Piedmont was struck and injured by an automobile driven by defendant and appellant Edgar Kaiser. She brought suit against Kaiser, who was a minor, and his parents, and after a jury trial recovered a judgment, from which this appeal was taken.

[1] Respondent was a woman about 57 years old, and mortality tables were introduced to show her expectancy of life. Appellants, after introducing testimony that prior to the accident respondent had been suffering from certain functional disorders, asked the following questions of a medical witness:

"Have you any opinion as to about how many years this lady would have lived with those diseases and those troubles that you say existed before the accident, disregarding the accident?"

"Have you an opinion, at the present time, about how long this lady will live in her present condition?"

To these questions objections were sustained.

We believe that the sustaining of these objections was prejudicial error. While the question has never been decided in the appellate courts of this state, the weight of authority is in favor of the admission of testimony of this character. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in the case of Fournier v. Zinn, 257 Mass. 575, 154 N. E. 268, said: "A physician called by the plaintiff was allowed, subject to the defendant's exception, to state his opinion of the probable duration of the plaintiff's life. He said that, taking into account the plaintiff's physical condition if he had not received the injury complained of, he would live about nine years; that because of the accident, he would probably live about four years from that time. This evidence was admissible."

The Court of Appeals of the state of New York, in passing upon a similar question in Alberti v. N. Y., etc., R. Co., 118 N. Y. 77, 23 N. E. 35, 37, 6 L. R. A. 765, used the following language: "He [Dr. Lewis] was then asked to state the length of time that the plaintiff may live, in the natural and ordinary course of events. This was objected to, and the court ruled that he might answer if he could speak with reasonable certainty in reference thereto. The doctor answered that he could only give the probability from the history of other similar cases, and this he was permitted to do, under the objection and exception of the defendant. It will be observed that as to the latter answer the answer was as to the probability, and that in the former question he was called upon to express his opinion in reference to the result of the disease in the natural and ordinary course. It is claimed that this evidence is objectionable, under the case of Strohm v. New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Co., 96 N. Y. 305. In that case the question was as to what might or may develop, and was not as to what would probably or was reasonably certain to develop. This question was considered in the case of Griswold v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co., 44 Hun, 236, affirmed 115 N. Y. 61, 21 N. E. 726, 12 Am. St. Rep. 775, and was again considered by us in the case of McClain v. Brooklyn City R. Co., 116 N. Y. 459, 22 N. E. 1062, and under the rules laid down in these cases we consider the evidence competent."

In Buell v. Park Auto Transportation Co., 132 Wash. 92, 231 P. 161, at page 164, the Supreme Court of Washington, in holding admissible testimony of physicians that the injuries received by respondents had a tendency to shorten their lives, said: "Such testimony is of the ordinary nature of opinion evidence of medical experts." To similar effect see Larsen v. Home Telephone Co., 164 Mich. 295, 129 N. W. 894, 905; Moses v. Mathews, 95 Neb. 672, 146 N. W. 920, 922, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 698; Memphis St. R. Co. v. Berry, 118 Tenn. 581, 102 S. W. 85, 90.

It has been recognized by our own Supreme Court in Townsend v. Briggs, 99 Cal. 481, 34 P. 116, that mortality tables are only prima facie evidence of the expectation of life of a particular person, and that evidence of conditions tending to decrease the expectation of life of such person is admissible. Respondent in her briefs and on oral argument cited only one case in support of the ruling of the trial court excluding this evidence, Chicago, etc., v. Long, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 601, 65 S. W. 882, and our independent research has not discovered any other. This case apparently stands alone, and is further weakened as an authority by the fact that the same court which decided it, in Houston Electric Co. v. McDade, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 497, 79 S. W. 100, 101, held that a medical witness was properly allowed to testify that the injury to plaintiff would probably shorten her life expectancy one-half. The court, without referring to its previous decision relied on by appellants here, disposed of this point by saying: "The objection that this evidence was only the conclusion of the witness is not tenable, as against expert testimony."

[2] We are satisfied with the rule laid down generally in other jurisdictions that, where the party to an action is suffering from some ailment or disability which has a tendency to shorten his life, medical experts may properly express an opinion as to the probable expectancy of life of such party. As said by the Supreme Court of Michigan in Denman v. Johnston, 85 Mich. 387, 48 N. W. 565, 568: "Such testimony must necessarily be problematical, but perhaps it is the best that is attainable to establish the probability."

The judgment recovered by respondent was a large one, and, in view of the fact that the amount of her recovery depended upon her expectancy of life as determined by the jury, the error in excluding the testimony herein discussed was prejudicial.

[3] We find nothing in appellants' claim that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. While the evidence was to the effect that respondent did not look in the direction from which appellants' automobile was coming while she was crossing the street, there is evidence from which the jury could reasonably find that appellants' machine passed another machine moving in the same direction on its right-hand side, in violation of the statute, at a speed of from 35 to 40 miles per hour, and struck respondent as she stepped out from in front of the other machine. Under these circumstances, conceding respondent's failure to look was negligence, the jury could find that, if she had been looking, she would not have been able to avoid the automobile which appeared suddenly and unexpectedly at a place where it was not entitled to be. Under such a finding respondent's negligence, if it existed, would not be a proximate cause of her injury. The court properly instructed the jury as to the speed at which an automobile may be driven in a residential district; there being sufficient evidence to support a finding that the place at which she was injured was such a district.

[4] Appellants complain of the admission of evidence that respondent had been a school teacher in other states, and that, while she was not qualified to teach in the public schools of California, she was at the time of her injury qualifying herself to become a teacher in the schools of this state by taking summer school courses at the University of California. We cannot find error in the admission of this evidence, since the jury is entitled to know, not only what occupations the respondent was able to engage in, but also any occupation which she might have a reasonable probability of engaging in in the future.

The failure of the court to give two proposed instructions as to certain admissions in the pleadings was apparently erroneous (Tevis v. Hicks, 41 Cal. 123, 126), but this error is not likely to recur on a second trial. Because of the error first herein discussed, the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. OSGOOD et al.
Civ. 6915.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 19, 1930.

1. Limitation of actions ⇨11(1)—It is not policy of commonwealth not to be bound by any statute of limitations, but commonwealth when consenting to be sued will claim protection thereof (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 315, 317, 345; St. 1893, p. 57; St. 1929, p. 890).

It is not policy of commonwealth not to be bound by any statute of limitation, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 315, 317, 345, but commonwealth will, even when it consents to be sued, claim protection of certain statutes of limitation, in view of St. 1893, p. 57 and St. 1929, p. 890.

2. States ⇨192, 208—State generally when suing is bound by rules for administration of justice between individuals, and pleadings are governed by ordinary rules.

Generally when state as plaintiff voluntarily comes into court and invokes its aid, state is bound by all rules established for administration of justice between individuals, and pleadings in action by state are generally governed by ordinary rules of pleading.

3. Executors and administrators ⇨91, 222(1), 288—Representatives of decedents must proceed immediately after decedents' death to administer estate, request presentation of all claims, and distribute estate.

On death of decedents, representatives are under duty to proceed at once with administration of estates and complete administration as speedily as possible and to ask for presentation of all claims arising on contracts whether same be due, not due, or contingent, and, after liquidating claims and after full settlement of affairs of estate had been effected, to obtain decree distributing estate to those entitled thereto.

4. Executors and administrators ⇨231—State failing to assert claim on bail bond executed by decedents within statutory time for presenting claims held barred by statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1490-1514, 1500).

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1490-1514, 1500, providing that no holder of claim against estate shall maintain action thereon, unless claim is first filed with clerk or presented to executor, read in connection with other statutes germane to subject, cannot be said to not expressly include state, and hence state failing to assert claims on bail bond executed by decedents within time specified in section 1491 was barred from presentation of claims by statute of limitations.

5. Executors and administrators ⇨228(5), 231—Claims not duly presented after administrator gives due notice are barred, and bar cannot be waived (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1490 et seq., 1500).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1490 et seq., providing for presentation of claims due, not due, or contingent, against estate, if administrator complies with statute and gives due notice, claims not duly presented are barred, and bar cannot be waived, nor action maintained, under section 1500.

6. Executors and administrators ⇨529—State as holder of valid claim against deceased may bring action on bond against administrator failing to give due notice (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1645, 1648, 1650).

If administrator does not give due notice and does not comply with statute, state, as holder of valid claim against decedents, may bring action against administrator on bond, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1650, or pursue other remedies granted by sections 1645, 1648.

7. Courts ⇨200—Superior court, in exercising probate powers, is administering certain statutes, and its jurisdiction is limited, and refusal to exercise power not granted is not error.

In exercising probate powers, superior court, a court of general jurisdiction, is but administering certain statutes, and its jurisdiction is limited and special, and court does not err in declining to exercise power not granted to it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by the People on bail bond in criminal case against Priscilla A. Osgood, as executrix of the estate of F. S. Osgood, also known as Fred S. Osgood, deceased, and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Earl Warren, Dist. Atty., and James H. Oakley, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for appellant.

Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for respondent Beatrice L. Rohan.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover a judgment against the defendants as the representatives of two decedents who had executed a bail bond in a criminal case. The plaintiff pleaded its claim in two separate counts. In one count it pleaded that it had presented its claim to the defendant executrices. In the other count it omitted all allegations regarding presentation. The defendants demurred to each count, both generally and specifically. The demurrers were sustained, and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

The plaintiff does not assert that the claims were presented within the times specified in section 1491, Code of Civil Procedure, but the plaintiff contends that the statute on the subject of times for the presentation of claims against the estates of deceased persons does not expressly include the state, and therefore the state is not included. The defendants contend that the statute is written in such broad language that it applies to all persons, both natural and artificial, including the state.

[1, 2] Before we turn to the particular sections of the Code of Civil Procedure it is very necessary to construe the general body of the laws of which those sections are a part. That it is not the policy of this commonwealth not to be bound by any statute of limitations is made clear by certain enactments which date back to the first session of the state Legislature. Code Civ. Proc., §§ 315, 317, 345. Moreover, it is the policy of this commonwealth that it will, even when it consents to be sued, claim the protection of certain statutes of limitation. St. 1893, c. 45; St. 1929, c. 516. As said in People v. Kings County Dev. Co., 48 Cal. App. 72, 75, 191 P. 1004, 1005: "The general legislative policy of California is that the state shall be bound by its statute of limitations with respect to the bringing of actions for the enforcement of any and all such rights as may accrue to the state." There is another proposition that is equally well settled, "As a general rule subject to certain exceptions in matters touching the sovereignty of the state, when a state, as plaintiff, voluntarily comes into court and invokes its aid, she is bound by all the rules established for the administration of justice between individuals and the suit is governed by the same rules as private suits; * * * The pleadings in an action by the state are in general governed by the ordinary rules of pleading. Thus the declaration or complaint must set forth such facts as constitute a cause of action or it will be demurrable. * * *" 36 Cyc. 907, 909.

[3] If during the life of the decedents the bail bond had been forfeited and the action had been commenced, there is not a doubt but what under a certain set of facts the decedents would have been entitled to plead the statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. § 340. On the death of the decedents it became the duty of their representatives to proceed at once with the administration of the estates and complete the administration as speedily as possible, and in this behalf to ask for the presentation of all claims arising upon contracts, whether the same be due, not due, or contingent, and, after liquidating the claims and after a full settlement of the affairs of the estate had been effected, to obtain a decree distributing the estate to those entitled thereto. If, however, the contention of the plaintiff is sound, then it is possible for the plaintiff by reason of its delays and laches to indefinitely delay the settlement of estates or to request that the probate proceedings be opened and additional proceedings be had even after the estate has been distributed. If such is the law, we may reasonably expect to find clear expressions on the subject. In the case of State v. Certain Lands in Redwood County, 40 Minn. 512, 42 N. W. 473, an analogous controversy was before the court. On page 478 of 42 N. W., the court said: "It is elementary that time never runs against the state unless there is an express provision or necessary implication to that effect; but our statute provides 'that the limitations prescribed for the commencement of actions shall apply to the same actions when brought in the name of the state or in the name of any officer, or otherwise for the benefit of the state, in the same manner as to actions brought by citizens.' * * * The legislature having adopted the policy of making the statutes of limitation applicable to the state, we ought to give them as liberal construction against the state as against citizens."

[4] Claims against the estates of deceased persons are provided for in the Code of Civil Procedure, §§ 1490-1514. Section 1500 provides: "No holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon, unless the claim is first filed with the clerk, or presented to the executor or administrator. * * *" The language is very broad, and, when read in connection with the rest of the statutes germane to the subject, it may not be said that the state is not expressly included.

The point has never been directly ruled upon in this state. In the state of Washington the statutes are very much the same as ours. The point was before the court in State v. Evans, 143 Wash. 449, 255 P. 1035, 53 A. L. R. 564. It was held that the language of the statutes included the state. A similar ruling was made in State v. Crutcher's Adm'r, 2 Swan (Tenn.) 504; Hill, Ex., v. State, 23 Ark.

604; State v. Edwards, 11 Ind. App. 226, 38 N. E. 544; Mahone v. Central Bank, 17 Ga. 111; In re Mitchell, 2 Watts (Pa.) 87; In re Jacob's Estate, 119 Iowa, 176, 93 N. W. 94.

[5-7] The plaintiff earnestly contends that the state is not included within the terms of the general language used in a statute. Miller v. Pillsbury, 164 Cal. 199, 204, 205, 128 P. 327, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 886. That proposition may be conceded, but it is beside the point. There is no statute which gives to the superior court sitting in probate the jurisdiction to entertain in behalf of this plaintiff or in behalf of any other litigant such a claim at such a time. Our statute commands that claims for debts " * * * due, not due, or contingent * * *" be presented. Code Civ. Proc. § 1490 et seq. If the administrator complies with the statute and gives due notice, claims not duly presented are barred. The bar cannot be waived. Harp v. Calahan, 46 Cal. 222, 232. If, nevertheless, a court allows the claim, its action is reversible error. Morrow v. Barker, 119 Cal. 65, 66, 51 P. 12. No action may be maintained. Code Civ. Proc. § 1500. Hence no court would have jurisdiction. Modoc v. Superior Court, 128 Cal. 255, 60 P. 848. If the administrator does not give due notice and does not comply with the statute, the holder of a valid claim is given an action against him on his bond. Code Civ. Proc., § 1650. But the section last cited contains a proviso to the effect that it does not cover claims "not due or contingent." As to claims presented, but not due or contingent, the statute provides a complete remedy. Code Civ. Proc. § 1648. The same remark may be made as to claims due. The administrator is authorized to pay in the following order: (1) Funeral expenses; (2) the expenses of the last illness; (3) debts having preference by the laws of the United States; (4) judgments rendered against the decedent in his lifetime and mortgages and other liens in the order of their date; (5) all other demands against the estate. If the estate is insufficient to pay all the debts of any one class, each creditor must be paid a dividend in proportion to his claim, and no creditor of any one class shall receive any payment until all those of the preceding class are fully paid. Code Civ. Proc. § 1645. The state may claim under any one of the foregoing statutes. If it does not do so, the statute is silent as to any other remedy. If it be asserted that the statute thus fails to protect the state, the clear reply is that there is a legislative omission. San Francisco, etc., L. Co. v. Banbury, 106 Cal. 129, 39 P. 439. But that fact is for the consideration of the Legislature. In exercising probate powers a superior court, a court of general jurisdiction, is but administering certain statutes, and its jurisdiction is limited and special. 7 Cal. Jur. 698, § 81. It does not err in declining to exercise a power not granted to it.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

FORISTIERE v. ÆTNA INS. CO., HARTFORD, CONN.★

SAME v. CALIFORNIA INS. CO., OF SAN FRANCISCO.
S. F. 13176.

Supreme Court of California.
March 12, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 10, 1930.

- 1. Insurance ⇨378(1)—Insurers against fire held charged with knowledge as to condition of title of insured property in view of agent's admissions as to his knowledge.

Where agent of fire insurance company admitted applications for loan through him as broker to lift mortgage on insured property and knew foreclosure proceedings were threatened, insurers were charged with knowledge of condition of title or at least of all facts shown by records of court respecting mortgage and sale.

- 2. Insurance ⇨393—Insurer against fire, by executing consent to assignment of policy with knowledge policy was void at its option, was estopped to assert such defense.

Where insurer against fire with full knowledge of facts, actual or imputed, and especially with knowledge that policy was void at its option, executed consent to assignment thus allowing original insured and assignee to alter positions to their prejudice in event insurer should assert such defense, insurer held estopped to assert such defense.

- 3. Insurance ⇨282(1)—Provisions of fire policy requiring unconditional and sole ownership speak of date of issuance.

In policy of fire insurance, such provisions as that requiring unconditional and sole ownership of property by insured speak only of date of issuance of policy.

- 4. Insurance 282(6)—Fire policy could not be held invalid because of foreclosure proceedings or notice of sale under mortgage or trust deed.

Invalidity of fire policy could not be asserted because of foreclosure proceedings commenced, or notice of sale by virtue of mortgage or trust deed, since applicable provisions of policy relate to matter arising subsequent to issuance of policy, which at most comes under head of "Matters Suspending Insurance."

- 5. Insurance ⇨393—Insurer against fire having approved transfer of property cannot show, as defense to action on policy, that transfer was mortgage.

Where property insured by fire insurance company has been transferred by assignment duly approved by insurance company, such company cannot show, as defense to action on policy, that quitclaim deed under which assignee claimed ownership was in reality mortgage and not conveyance.

Action in assumpsit on a policy of insurance for a loss by fire. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Two causes are presented on one record. Both policies are of the standard form. The facts in each case are identical except as to the name of the defendant and the amount of insurance, together with an immaterial difference as to the date of the beginning of the period of insurance. We shall, therefore, deal with the facts of but one cause.

One Catania owned four adjoining city lots in Fresno upon which was situated an olive oil factory with fixed and movable machinery therein. Certain buildings thereon were also used for mercantile and residence purposes. Two of the lots were mortgaged to the Bank of Italy. On August 6, 1924, foreclosure proceedings were instituted. On October 22, 1925, judgment in foreclosure was entered and a sale of the property ordered. On November 18, 1925, the bank purchased the property at the sheriff's sale. Prior to sale and on November 6, 1925, defendant issued to Catania, as owner, its policy of insurance, not to exceed $5,000, against loss by fire, upon said buildings, said machinery and said merchandise, the term to be one year from and after September 1, 1925. The policy recited: "It is understood and agreed that the within described property is mortgaged without prejudice to this insurance."

On March 1, 1926, Catania executed and delivered to the plaintiff a quitclaim deed conveying the four lots. No bill of sale or written transfer was made of the movable machinery. On April 15, 1926, Catania assigned said policy of insurance to plaintiff by indorsing on the policy the usual written recital as to the transfer of ownership of the property and the assignment for value received of all interest in the policy subject to the terms and conditions therein mentioned. Beneath the above assignment appeared the following: "The ownership of the property herein insured having actually passed to A. Foristiere this Company hereby consents that the interest of Santa Catania in the within policy, subject to all the terms and conditions herein mentioned and referred to, be assigned to A. Foristiere. April 27, 1926. Madison-Yurk Co. by D. J. Yurk, Agent."

On July 9, 1926, the buildings and their contents were destroyed by fire. On October 5, 1926, plaintiff redeemed said property from said sale. Due proofs of loss were made, followed by this suit. Touching the foreclosure proceedings and the sale thereunder, as recited above, the court found: " * * * all of which was done without the knowledge of the defendant herein and that no redemption of said property so sold was made until on or about October 5th, 1926."

[1] Touching the knowledge of the defendant respecting the title and condition of the property on April 27, 1926, at the time of the assent to the assignment of the policy, the court made no finding. But the evidence is such that had a finding been made upon this issue, it would have been that defendant knew or had imputed knowledge of the exact condition of the title. Both Catania and plaintiff testified positively that they discussed it frequently with Mr. Yurk, the agent of defendant in the matter, and told him of the foreclosure proceeding and sale thereunder.

The agent admits applications by plaintiff and Catania for a loan through him as broker to lift the mortgage, and also admits that foreclosure proceedings were threatened, but he testified: "I had assumed right along that Mr. Foristiere had just come to Mr. Catania's rescue and settled the thing before they ever got a foreclosure." This must be held sufficient to have charged the defendant with knowledge of the condition of the title on April 27, 1926, at least of all the facts shown by the records of the court respecting said mortgage and sale. Sharp v. Scottish Union, etc., Co., 136 Cal. 542, 545, 69 P. 253, 615; Raulet v. Northwestern, etc., Ins. Co., 157 Cal. 213, 228, 107 P. 292; Kavanaugh v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co., 185 Cal. 307, 314, 197 P. 99. Whether knowledge of the existence of the mortgage alone would impute knowledge of the records of the court as of the day the policy was issued to defendant need not be determined (see authorities last above cited), as we are of the mind that such knowledge on April 27, as the time of the consent to the transfer, creates an estoppel against the defendants as to the two points relied upon by it to sustain the judgment of the court below.

[2-4] These points are: First, that the record shows that at the time of the loss the title was in the Bank of Italy by virtue of the sale under foreclosure; hence neither plaintiff nor Catania was the sole and unconditional owner of the property as required by this and all other standard forms of policy; hence the policy was void or at least suspended at the time of the loss by fire. The second point is that from any standpoint plaintiff cannot maintain the action because, as the court found, Catania, in fact, never had transferred said property to plaintiff, the effect of the finding in this behalf being that it was a conveyance as security and not a sale of the property.

As above indicated, it is our view that defendant, by the written consent given, estopped itself to assert either of these contentions. It stood by and allowed the rights of plaintiff to accrue without an objection and without a cancellation of the policy or a rebate upon the premium paid. With full knowledge of the facts, actual or imputed, and especially with knowledge that the policy was void, at its option, it executed its consent to the assignment, thus allowing both Catania and plaintiff to alter their positions to their prejudice in the event that it should assert such defense.

Invalidity of the policy could not be claimed because the interest of Catania was not that of "unconditional and sole ownership." Such provisions speak only of the date of issuance, and this requirement existed on that day. Neither could invalidity be asserted because of foreclosure proceedings commenced, or notice of sale by virtue of a mortgage or trust deed for these provisions relate to matter arising subsequent to the issuance of the policy. At most, this contention comes under the head of "Matters Suspending Insurance," for example, subdivision g: "While the interest in, title to or possession of the subject of insurance is changed excepting: (1) by the death of the insured; (2) a change of occupancy of building without material increase of hazard; and (3) transfer by one or more several copartners or coowners to the others."

Respondent reduces its position largely to a reliance upon Breedlove v. Norwich, etc., Ins. Soc., 124 Cal. 164, 56 P. 770, which contains a discussion of the effect of a sale under foreclosure and the location of the title during the period of redemption. It must be admitted that such case is authority for the proposition that the owner of a mere right of redemption from a sale under foreclosure is not the sole and unconditional owner of the property involved. See, also, Pollard v. Harlow, 138 Cal. 390, 71 P. 454, 648; 11 Cal. Juris. 127. But this pronouncement does not control the question before us.

The real question is: May an insurer waive the suspension of the policy due to a foreclosure or execution sale? The above-cited cause is express authority for an answer in the affirmative, for in that case the owner of the equity of redemption, with only eighteen days left to redeem, collected full value of buildings on the property destroyed by fire during said period upon the ground that the local agent knew of the condition of the title at the time the policy was issued. In this case, too, the redemption from the foreclosure sale was never made.

Ample authority for our conclusion may also be found elsewhere. Speaking of a similar situation, the court in Mortt v. Liverpool

& London, etc., Co., 192 N. C. 8, 133 S. E. 337, 340, 47 A. L. R. 645, 650, said: "Defendant, with knowledge that the entire policy was void on June 19, 1924, consented to its assignment to plaintiff, and retained the unearned portion of the premium. It cannot be supposed that defendant consented to the assignment of a policy which it knew to be void and retained the unearned portion of the premium on a policy under which it had no liability to the assignee, the owner of the property insured by the policy." Citing Forward v. Continental Ins. Co., 142 N. Y. 387, 37 N. E. 615, 25 L. R. A. 637. See, also, 20 R. C. L., § 372. The rule is stated in 5 Cooley Briefs on Insurance (2d Ed.) p. 4313, as follows: "By consenting to an assignment of a policy with knowledge of facts violating the terms of the policy, an insurance company waives the invalidity of the policy."

[5] What has been said applies as well to the contention that the quitclaim deed under which plaintiff claimed ownership was in reality a mortgage and not a conveyance. Defendant is clearly estopped by its own act in certifying to the contrary with knowledge or presumed knowledge of the existing facts. As against the claim of respondent, the deed must be held sufficient to pass title to the property involved. In addition to the authorities cited above the case of Clark v. Svea Fire Ins. Co., 102 Cal. 252, 36 P. 587, seems to be in point. The syllabus correctly states the holding, as follows: "Where the property insured by a fire insurance company has been transferred by an assignment duly approved by the insurance company, the company cannot show, as a defense to an action upon the policy, that the property was transferred for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the party originally insured."

These views require a reversal of both judgments and it is so ordered.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. v. RICHARDSON
BUILDING & ENGINEERING CO.,
Inc., et al.
L. A. 10031.

Supreme Court of California.
Feb. 28, 1930.

I. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Where evidence conflicted, finding that plaintiff received and accepted note was conclusive on appeal.

Where finding that materialman received and accepted note, alleged to constitute extension of time of payment, was based on conflicting evidence, such finding was conclusive on appeal.

2. Subrogation ⇨31(1)—Surety is entitled to benefit of securities held by creditor upon satisfying obligation of principal (Civ. Code, §§ 2848, 2849).

Upon satisfying obligation of plaintiff, a surety is, under Civ. Code, §§ 2848, 2849, entitled to benefit of securities held by creditor.

3. Account stated ⇨1—"Account stated" is unperformed promise of one party to pay stated sum to another.

An "account stated" is unperformed promise of one party to pay a stated sum to another and, if complete, it contains a signed and written acknowledgment of present, unqualified indebtedness or liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Account Stated.]

4. Account stated ⇨4—Execution and acceptance of note for balance of unsettled account constitutes "stating of account."

Execution and acceptance of note for balance of an unsettled account constitutes stating of an account between parties.

5. Mechanics' liens ⇨315—Execution and acceptance of note as account stated did not release sureties on contractor's bond.

Execution and acceptance of note as account stated did not release sureties on contractor's bond given for materials furnished to contractor.

6. Sales ⇨82(2)—Where contract was silent as to time of payment, presumption arose that it was due immediately or on demand when contract was completed.

Where contract to furnish material was silent as to time of payment, presumption arose that it was due and payable immediately or on demand when plaintiff's contract was completed.

7. Mechanics' liens ⇨315—Materialman's acceptance of note held not extension of time so as to release sureties on contractor's bond (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Where contract to furnish material was silent as to time of payment, taking of ninety-day note was not an extension of time so as to release sureties on contractor's bond given for payment of material under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, but merely established maturity of obligation which theretofore had been indefinite.

8. Principal and surety ⇨112—Sureties are not entitled to reduction of liability on account of payments made to creditor on another contract.

Sureties on one contract are not entitled to a reduction of their liability on account of partial payments made to their creditors on another debt.

PER CURIAM.

In this case petition for hearing after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, was granted so that this court might have an opportunity to carefully consider the questions involved. After a study of the record, we are satisfied with the opinion of the District Court of Appeal (280 P. 158), written by Finch, P. J., and hereby adopt the same as and for the opinion of this court, as follows:

This action was brought against Richardson Building & Engineering Company, a building contractor, and Ella W. Richardson, E. Will Richardson, and W. C. B. Richardson, the sureties on the contractor's bond, given pursuant to the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for materials furnished by the plaintiff to the contractor and used in the construction of a building for Edward A. Geissler. The plaintiff was given judgment against the contractor, but was denied any relief against the sureties. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment.

As required by section 1183, the bond provides that "the same is hereby expressly made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor upon or furnish materials to be used in the work described in the said contract, or in any modification thereof; and any and all such persons shall have and are given a right of action to recover upon this bond against the said principal and sureties, or either of them, in any suit brought to foreclose mechanic's liens, which may be filed by such persons, or any of them upon the property mentioned in said contract, or in a separate suit brought upon this bond, and may recover in such action or actions the value of such labor done or materials furnished, or both, not exceeding, however, in the aggregate of such recoveries, the amount of this bond as above specified."

The only defense relied on by the sureties is that they were discharged from liability by alleged acts of the plaintiff, found by the court, substantially in the language of the answer, to be as follows:

"That on the 26th day of December, 1923, said defendant Richardson Building and Engineering Co. Inc., as contractor, was indebted to said plaintiff for and on account of building materials furnished by said plaintiff to said Richardson Building and Engineering Co. Inc. for use in various buildings theretofore constructed by said contractor, including the materials furnished by said plaintiff for use in the building described in plaintiff's complaint; that to evidence said entire indebtedness said Richardson Building and Engineering Co. Inc., did on the 26th day of December, 1923, execute to said plaintiff and said plaintiff did accept and receive from said Richardson Building and Engineering Co. Inc., a promissory note for the sum of $23,192.82 payable on or before 90 days after date thereof, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum; and said note by its terms provided that the execution and acceptance of said note constituted evidence of said debt as a stated account.

"That said note was secured by an assignment to said plaintiff of certain securities belonging to said contractor; and since said time said note and securities have been and are now retained by and are in the possession of said plaintiff.

"That prior to the 26th day of December, 1923, the indebtedness referred to in plaintiff's complaint and sued on in this action was an ordinary book account and the same was and had been payable on or before the 28th day of September, 1923; that subsequent to the execution of said note there was a novation of indebtedness sued on herein and said book account was closed, discharged and liquidated and the same was, subsequent to the 26th day of December, 1923, merged into and became and was an account stated, which account stated included debts other than the one herein sued on.

"That at the time of the execution of said note, it was agreed between said plaintiff and said contractor that five per cent. should be added to said book account of $4,756.03, making a total of $5,003.40, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, and said sum of $5,003.40 became and was made a part of said promissory note hereinbefore referred to and described.

"That the extension of time given by said plaintiff to said contractor for the payment of said original debt, under and by virtue of the execution of said note, and the substitution of said new account for said original book account, as aforesaid, were given and made by the parties thereto, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant sureties, or either of them; that said defendant sureties did not at any time assume, promise or agree to pay said account stated or said note or any part thereof."

The promissory note referred to in the findings contains the following: "This note is not given or accepted as payment of said amount due said payee, but as evidence of said debt as a stated account only." It is not found that the note was given or accepted as payment, and the note itself states that it was not so given or accepted. "In the absence of an agreement to this effect, the acceptance is not a payment of the debt." National Lumber Co. v. Whalley, 162 Cal. 224, 226, 121 P. 729, 730.

[1] The finding that the plaintiff received and accepted the promissory note is based on sharply conflicting evidence, and is therefore conclusive on appeal.

[2] The collateral securities referred to in the findings consisted of a large number of shares of preferred stock of the Jennings Corporation and the contractor's promise to deliver in pledge a large number of shares of the common stock of the First Mortgage Corporation "when, and only when, permission has been received from the corporation commissioner." Such permission has never been given. It appears without contradiction, from affidavits used on plaintiff's motion for a new trial, that "on or about December 26, 1923, preferred stock of Jennings Corporation * * * was absolutely worthless"; that "soon after December 26, 1923, the Jennings Corporation became defunct and went out of business"; that "the common stock of the First Mortgage Corporation was valueless on December 26, 1923"; that, "In fact, it was a liability at that time"; and that "since then, the First Mortgage Corporation was acquired by another corporation and the common stockholders realized nothing for their stock." Upon satisfying the obligation of his principal, a surety is entitled to the benefit of securities held by the creditor. Civ. Code, §§ 2848 and 2849. The sureties in this case, however, tendered no such issue, and if the alleged securities are of any value the sureties still may enforce their right of subrogation. Cawston Ostrich Farm v. Salomon, 72 Cal. App. 550, 237 P. 808.

[3-5] It is not perceived on what theory it can be held that the sureties were discharged by the alleged stated account between the plaintiff and the contractor. The obligation of the sureties is not to pay the purchase price of the materials originally agreed upon by the plaintiff and the contractor, or the amount agreed upon in the stated account, but the reasonable value of such materials. "An account stated is a mere unperformed promise by one party to pay a stated sum to another." Bennett v. Potter, 180 Cal. 736, 744, 183 P. 156, 159. "It is a complete account stated if it contains a signed and written acknowledgment of a present, unqualified indebtedness or liability with a promise to pay a named sum." Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 570, 574, 150 P. 994, 995. The execution and acceptance of a promissory note for the balance of an unsettled account constitute the stating of an account between the parties. Kinley v. Thelen, 158 Cal. 175, 183, 110 P. 513; Bledsoe v. Stuckey, 47 Cal. App. 95, 98, 190 P. 217. If stating an account in a case such as this discharges the sureties, then they would be discharged in all cases where a promissory note is accepted for the balance of an account, contrary to a long line of decisions, a few of which are hereinafter cited.

[6, 7] Respondent contends that the giving and acceptance of the note constituted an extension of the time of payment and that by reason thereof the sureties were discharged. It is neither alleged nor found that the plaintiff and the contractor made any specific agreement as to the time of payment for materials prior to December 26, 1923, when the note was executed. The finding, in the language of the answer, that the indebtedness "was an ordinary book account and the same was and had been payable on or before the 10th day of August, 1923," the day on which the plaintiff's contract was completed, does not imply a specific agreement to make payment at any particular time. Neither does the evidence show that any definite agreement as to the time of payment was made prior to the execution of the note. The time of payment not being fixed, the presumption arises that it was due and payable immediately or on demand when plaintiff's contract to furnish the materials was completed. Civ. Code, § 1657; Newhall v. Sherman, Clay & Co., 124 Cal. 509, 511, 57 P. 387; Sunset Lumber Co. v. Smith (Cal. App.) 272 P. 1038. This presumption applied, of course, in the cases hereinafter cited, where the time for payment had not been specifically agreed upon prior to the acceptance of notes payable at a future date. In construing statutory provisions similar to those of Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, it is said:

"Decisions of this court have made it clear that the statute and bonds given under it must be construed liberally, in order to effectuate the purpose of Congress as declared in the act. In every case which has come before this court, where labor and materials were actually furnished for and used in part performance of the work contemplated in the bond, recovery was allowed, if the suit was brought within the period prescribed by the act. Technical rules otherwise protecting sureties from liability have never been applied in proceedings under this statute." Illinois Surety Co. v. John Davis Co., 244 U. S. 376, 37 S. Ct. 614, 616, 61 L. Ed. 1206.

In the leading case of United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. United States, 191 U. S. 416, 24 S. Ct. 142, 144, 48 L. Ed. 242, the Circuit Court of Appeals had certified to the Supreme Court of the United States the question whether the act of the company which had furnished materials in taking two promissory notes of the contractor for the amount of its account, "then due and payable, one of said notes running for thirty days and the other for sixty days," operated to discharge the surety. In answering the question in the negative the court said:

"In an ordinary guaranty the guarantor understands perfectly the nature and extent of his obligation. * * * In such cases he contracts in reliance upon the exact terms of his principal's undertaking, and has a right to suppose that no change will be made without his consent; and the courts have gone so far as to hold that any change will exonerate him, though it really redound to his benefit.

"This covenant, however, is inserted for an entirely different purpose from that of securing to the government the performance of the contract for the construction of the building. * * * The guarantor is ignorant of the parties with whom his principal may contract, the amount, the nature, and the value of the materials required, as well as the time when payment for them will become due. These particulars it would probably be impossible even for the principal to furnish, and it is to be assumed that the surety contracts with knowledge of this fact. Not knowing when or by whom these materials will be supplied, or when the bills for them will mature, it can make no difference to him whether they were originally purchased on a credit of sixty days, or whether, after the materials are furnished, the time for payment is extended sixty days, and a note given for the amount maturing at that time. If a person deliberately contracts for an uncertain liability, he ought not to complain when that uncertainty becomes certain. * * * The rule of strictissimi juris is a stringent one, and is liable at times to work a practical injustice. It is one which ought not to be extended to contracts not within the reason of the rule, particularly when the bond is underwritten by a corporation which has undertaken for a profit to insure the obligee against a failure of performance on the part of the principal obligor."

In First Congregational Church of Christ v. Lowrey, 175 Cal. 124, 126, 165 P. 440, 441, it is said:

"Neither our statute law nor our decisions under it have ever recognized that there is any distinction between a compensated and uncompensated surety or guarantor, nor between a corporate surety and an individual surety, nor between a corporation or an individual engaging in the business of suretyship or guarantyship for compensation and a corporation or individual who enters into a like contract without compensation."

The decision in United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. United States, supra, has been followed generally by federal and state courts. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Ohio River Gravel Co. (C. C. A.) 20 F.(2d) 514; United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. United States (C. C. A.) 178 F. 692; Chaffee v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. (C. C. A.) 128 F. 918; State v. Adams, 187 Ind. 165, 118 N. E. 680; George H. Sampson Co. v. Commonwealth, 202 Mass. 339, 88 N. E. 916; Watanabe v. Ota, 137 Wash. 368, 242 P. 379, 43 A. L. R. 1368. In several of the cases cited stress is laid upon the fact that the surety was not prejudiced by the extension of the time of payment. In an action by the owner against the sureties on a building contractor's bond, it is said that if there has been "a change in the contract in any material respect, the inquiry there ends and the guarantor is exonerated, and that it is not a subject of inquiry whether the alteration has or has not been to his injury." First Congregational Church of Christ v. Lowrey, supra. This holding, however, was expressly limited in its application by the decision in Roberts v. Security Trust & Savings Bank, 196 Cal. 557, 565, 238 P. 673, which also was an action between the owner and the sureties on a building contractor's bond. No case in this state has been cited which holds, in a suit by laborers or materialmen against the surety on a bond in the terms of the one involved herein, that "It is not a subject of inquiry whether the alteration has or has not been to his injury."

In a case similar in principle to this, in which the defendant surety claimed a discharge from liability for the purchase price of grapes by reason of the taking of trade acceptances by the creditor, it is said:

"The bond was given to insure payment of the grapes received by Herman and which he sold on credit. The agreement between the parties with reference to payments to be made by Herman was silent as to any particular due date. At most, the trade acceptances definitely fixed such date. There never was an extension of the time of payment, for without a due date a subsequent agreement fixing such date is not an extension. Such an agreement merely establishes the maturity of the obligation which theretofore had been indefinite." Earl Fruit Co. v. Herman (Cal. App.) 266 P. 592, 594; Tyson v. Reinecke, 25 Cal. App. 696, 145 P. 153.

Respondents rely on American Bonding Co. v. United States (C. C. A.) 233 F. 364, 368. In that case, however, there was a definite agreement as to the time of payment, but the terms of the agreement were not observed. The company furnishing the materials "accepted numerous notes from Wells [the contractor] for such amounts as were agreed upon from time to time * * * and discounted the notes at several banks. These notes were often renewed, the extension sometimes being as much as a "year."

The finding that "subsequent to the execution of said note there was a novation of indebtedness sued on herein" is without support in the evidence.

[8] The answer alleges that the "note was secured by the assignment to plaintiff of certain accounts due and to become due said contractor, * * * and * * * that said plaintiff has collected and received sufficient money from said accounts and securities to pay the claim herein sued on in full." The court made no finding responsive to this allegation, but the evidence in relation thereto is undisputed. As found by the court, the amount of the note was made up of the balances due for materials used "in various buildings theretofore constructed by said contractor." Collections were made by the plaintiff from the owners of two of these buildings and credited in part payment of the balances due for materials used therein. No collection was made by the plaintiff from Geissler. It seems too clear for argument that the sureties on one contract are not entitled to a reduction of their liability on account of partial payments made to their creditor on another contract.

The court found that the reasonable value of the materials furnished by the plaintiff and used by the contractor in the Geissler building is $4,756.03. All other facts are found in the plaintiff's favor except those from which the court concluded that the sureties were discharged from liability. Since the facts found in favor of the sureties are not sufficient to warrant the conclusion reached, there appears to be no good reason to send the case back for a retrial.

The judgment in favor of the plaintiff against defendant Richardson Building & Engineering Company, Inc., is affirmed. The judgment in favor of defendants Ella W. Richardson, E. Will Richardson, and W. C. B. Richardson against the plaintiff is reversed and the trial court is directed to enter judgment on the findings in favor of the plaintiff against said defendants Ella W. Richardson, E. Will Richardson, and W. C. B. Richardson, for the sum of $4,756.03 and costs of suit.

PER CURIAM.

The questions involved in this case are in all respects the same as those in Hammond Lumber Co. v. Richardson Building & Engineering Co., Inc., et al., 285 P. 851, this day decided by this court, except that the court found in this case that the reasonable value of the materials furnished by the plaintiff is $7,936.68.

On the authority of the decision in that case, the judgment herein in favor of the plaintiff against defendant Richardson Building & Engineering Co., Inc., is affirmed. The judgment in favor of defendants Ella W. Richardson, E. Will Richardson, and W. C. B. Richardson against the plaintiff is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment on the findings in favor of the plaintiff against said defendants Ella W. Richardson, E. Will Richardson, and W. C. B. Richardson for the sum of $7,936.68 and costs of suit.

Where no bill of exceptions was proposed or settled pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 650, and no request was filed for preparation of transcript pursuant to section 953a, appeal was dismissed, time for doing those acts having expired.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Fred S. Robbins against William W. Funge, Jr., and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Motion by plaintiff to dismiss appeal.

Motion granted.

W. W. Funge, Jr., for appellants.

William T. Eckhoff, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J.

[1] Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendants in an action for personal injuries in the sum of $750. The judgment was entered September 20, 1929. Defendants filed their notice of appeal and a stay bond on October 19, 1929. No request was ever made to the clerk to prepare a transcript and none has been filed, nor has any bill of exceptions been prepared or filed. No notice of intention to move for a new trial was made. Appellants, who appear in propria persona, attempt to excuse their delay in the preparation of the transcript on the ground that they relied upon their belief that respondent would join in a stipulation granting a new trial, and also that family sickness prevented them from properly attending to the litigation; and they pray that the time to file the transcript be extended to the month of May, 1930. We have no such power. Where an appellant has failed to comply with the essential requirements of either method of appeal from a superior court, and the legal time for doing so has expired, the appeal must be dismissed. General Motors, etc., Corp. v. Holman, 63 Cal. App. 17, 217 P. 1086.

[2] The method of taking and perfecting appeals to the appellate courts is regulated by statute, and the method so prescribed must, in order that the appeal may be effectual, be followed with substantial strictness. If not so followed the right of appeal is forever lost.

[3] There having been no bill of exceptions proposed or settled as provided for in section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and no request having been filed for the preparation of a transcript in accordance with the provisions of section 953a, and the time within which such proceedings might be instituted having long since expired, the appeal must be dismissed. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. LOPEZ.†
Cr. 1114.District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.
March 7, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 22, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court March 31, 1930.

1. Criminal law ⇨884—Verdict of guilty was not invalidated by recommendation that sentence be suspended.

Where defendant was found guilty of driving automobile while he was intoxicated, jury's recommendation that sentence be suspended was mere surplusage, and did not invalidate verdict.

2. Criminal law ⇨884—Jury's recommendation that defendant be sentenced to county jail, without specifying term of imprisonment, sufficiently complied with statute authorizing jury to recommend punishment (California Vehicle Act § 112, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436).

Where defendant was found guilty of driving automobile while he was intoxicated, jury's recommendation "that he be sentenced to the county jail," without specifying term of imprisonment, was sufficient compliance with California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 112, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, which fixes term of imprisonment (including term in county jail), and provides that jury shall recommend punishment, and court shall have no authority to impose sentence "greater" than that recommended.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

P. Lopez was convicted of driving an automobile while intoxicated, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Andrew R. Schottky, of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

The defendant was convicted of the offense of driving an automobile while he was intoxicated. The jury rendered the following verdict: "We the jury in the above entitled cause, find the defendant, P. Lopez, guilty of the crime as charged and recommend that he be sentenced to the County Jail, and further recommend the sentence be suspended." The defendant was sentenced to one year in the county jail.

The appellant contends that the verdict is void for the reason that, (1) the court disregarded the recommendation of the jury to suspend the sentence, and (2) the jury failed to recommend a specific term of imprisonment.

Section 112 of the California Vehicle Act, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, provides in part:

"It shall be unlawful for any person * * * who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor * * * to drive a vehicle on any public highway within this state.

"Any person violating the provisions of this section shall upon conviction be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for not less than ninety days nor more than one year or by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one nor more than three years, or by a fine of not less than two hundred dollars ($200), nor more than five thousand dollars ($5,000), and upon every verdict of 'guilty' under this section, the jury shall recommend the punishment and the court in imposing sentence shall have no authority to impose a sentence greater than that recommended by the jury."

[1] The recommendation of the jury in this case that the sentence be suspended is not authorized by statute, and is an invasion of the province of the court. That portion of the verdict, however, is mere surplusage and may be disregarded. It does not invalidate the verdict. People v. Lee, 17 Cal. 76; People v. Sykes, 10 Cal. App. 67, 101 P. 20; 16 C. J. 1110, § 2601; Freeman v. State, 151 Ala. 10, 44 So. 46.

[2] The recommendation of the jury in the present case that the defendant "be sentenced to the county jail," without specifying the term of imprisonment, is a sufficient compliance with the mandate of the statute. The discretion of determining the extent of the punishment is vested in the court.

The exact question which is presented here was decided in the case of People v. Ray, 92 Cal. App. 417, 268 P. 382, 384, in which a hearing was denied in the Supreme Court. In that case, which was a prosecution under section 112 of the California Vehicle Act, as amended, for driving an automobile while intoxicated, the verdict found the defendant guilty and recommended that he be imprisoned in the county jail, without specifying the term of commitment. The court likewise sentenced him to one year in the county jail. On appeal the judgment was affirmed. The court said: "Had it been intended that the jury should fix the exact term of imprisonment, it seems clear that the provision would have so stated by depriving the court of 'authority to impose a sentence other than that recommended,' whereas a discretion now remains with the trial judge to pronounce a sentence within that recommended by the jury."

Upon the authority of the Ray Case, supra, the judgment and the orders in this case are affirmed.

PEOPLE'S FINANCE & THRIFT CO. OF PORTERVILLE v. PHOENIX ASSUR.
CO., LIMITED, OF LONDON et al.
Civ. 98.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

March 5, 1930.

I. New trial $\S$ 138—Time for notice of intention to move for new trial does not begin to run until notice of entry of judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 659).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring party moving for new trial to file and serve on adverse party notice of intention either before entry of judgment or within ten days after receiving notice of entry of judgment, or within ten days after verdict, time for notice of intention to move for new trial does not begin to run until notice of entry of judgment has been given.

2. Judgment $\S$ 143(1)—Law does not favor setting aside defaults resulting from inexcusable inadvertence, surprise, or neglect of attorneys in performance of duties.

Law does not favor setting aside defaults or judgments resulting from inexcusable inadvertence, surprise, or neglect of attorneys in performance of their duties to clients, such failure being ordinarily imputable to clients unless their default can be excused on statutory grounds as being result of accident or surprise, that which ordinary prudence on their part could not have avoided.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 977(3)—Trial court's discretion in granting new trial will not be disturbed on appeal, except for manifest abuse.

Order granting new trial will not be disturbed on appeal, except in cases of manifest abuse of wide discretion granted to trial court in such cases.

4. Judgment $\S$ 143(11)—Mere negligence of client's attorney to appear at trial does not under ordinary circumstances constitute excusable neglect or inadvertence warranting setting aside default.

Under ordinary circumstances, mere negligence of attorney in failing to appear in interest of client on trial of case does not constitute excusable neglect or inadvertence warranting setting aside of default judgment.

5. Judgment $\S$ 143(11)—Attorneys' complete abandonment of case before trial without defendants' knowledge held to constitute accident and surprise that could not be reasonably guarded against, warranting setting aside default.

Where defendants retained attorneys of established reputation and standing to represent them, but attorneys after filing answer failed to appear at trial or notify defendant thereof, and defendant had no notice or knowledge of trial and rendition of judgment, attorneys' conduct in completely abandoning case held to constitute accident and surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, warranting setting aside default and granting new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by the People's Finance & Thrift Company of Porterville against the Phoenix Assurance Company, Limited, of London, and another. From an order vacating judgment and granting a new trial after judgment for plaintiff, the latter appeals.

Affirmed.

Max B. Jamison, of Porterville, for appellant.

Feemster & Cleary, of Visalia, and Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOANE, P. J.

The appellant in this action presents his case on an unsupported theory as to both the law and the facts. We might be disposed to grant the relief prayed for were it not for the broad discretion given the trial court in the matter of granting new trials.

Appellant in his opening statement treats the judgment vacated by the trial court, from which order vacating the judgment and granting a new trial this appeal is taken, as a judgment by default. There is nothing in the record to show that a default was ever entered or a judgment by default rendered.

On the contrary, the record shows an answer on file, a setting of the cause for trial upon due notice to defendants' counsel of record, and a trial had before the court without a jury, in which evidence oral and documentary was introduced by the plaintiff, and judgment in plaintiff's favor given thereon.

Appellant attacks the proceedings for a new trial on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction to entertain the same for the alleged reason that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not served or filed until nearly sixty days after entry of judgment.

[1] Since it does not appear that notice of entry of judgment was ever served on defendants, the statutory time for notice of intention to move for a new trial did not commence to run, and consequently had not expired when the notice of intention was finally served.

Section 659, Code of Civil Procedure, in force at the time, and applicable to this proceeding, required the party moving for a new trial to file with the clerk and serve on the adverse party his notice of intention either before the entry of judgment or within ten days after receiving notice of the entry of judgment, or within ten days after verdict, if the trial was by jury. The authorities are conclusive to the point that until such notice of entry of judgment has been given the time for notice of intention does not begin to run. Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 61 P. 1123; Steward v. Spano, 82 Cal. App. 306, 255 P. 532; Bates v. Ransome-Crummey Co., 42 Cal. App. 699, 184 P. 39.

The only tenable ground for granting a new trial presented on defendants' motion therefore was that of alleged "accident and surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against," namely, the absolute abandonment of the defendants' case by their attorneys without notice to defendants or knowledge on their part that their attorneys of record were not looking after their interests. Affidavits filed in support of the motion to vacate the judgment and grant a new trial show without contradiction that the defendant assurance company had retained attorneys of established reputation and standing to represent them. That these attorneys after conference with defendants' agents had advised that defendants had a good and valid defense to the action, had filed an answer to the complaint. That notice of the time set for the trial was afterwards served upon the attorneys, but that they and each of them failed to appear at the trial, and failed to notify defendants of the date of trial, and that defendant Phoenix Assurance Company had no notice or knowledge of the trial until long after the date thereof, and the rendition and entry of judgment against them.

That said attorneys failed and refused, after request therefor, to give any explanation of their conduct or to return on demand the records and papers in the case to defendants. Their conduct was a complete abandonment of the case, and was an accident and surprise so far as defendants' conduct was concerned, which they could not in the exercise of ordinary prudence have guarded against. It must be conceded that defendants had every right to assume that their attorneys were attending to their duties and would give them timely notice of the trial.

[2] It is true that the law does not look with favor upon setting aside defaults or judgments resulting from inexcusable inadvertence, surprise, or neglect of attorneys in the performance of their duties to their clients. Such failure on the part of attorneys is ordinarily imputable to their clients, unless their default can be excused on the statutory grounds as being the result of accident or surprise, that which ordinary prudence on their part could not have avoided. McGuire v. Drew, 83 Cal. 225, 23 P. 312; Gray v. Sabin, 87 Cal. 211, 25 P. 422.

[3-5] The rule is well established that an order granting a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal, excepting in cases of manifest abuse of the wide discretion granted to the trial court in such cases, and while it is true that under ordinary circumstances the mere negligence of an attorney to appear in the interest of his client on trial of the case, unless under circumstances of excusable neglect or inadvertence, the question in this case arises, if the entire and unauthorized abandonment of the case by respondent's attorneys does not present circumstances to take it out of the ordinary rule of imputed negligence. A client has a right to assume and rely upon his attorneys of record to make the necessary appearances for the protection of his rights, and counsel cites a number of authorities in this case where in cases of abandonment of the client's interests by the attorney without notice or any ground for anticipating such abandonment by the attorneys exists, has been held to create an exception to the rule, and to excuse the client on the ground of accident and surprise which he could not be expected to reasonably guard against. We think that this case presents such an exception to the rule of imputed negligence. As far as respondent Phoenix Assurance Company is concerned, it is true that the defendant Alec. B. Baird, the duly authorized agent of the insurance company, had notice of the trial, and was present thereat, and was sworn as a witness on the part of the plaintiff and testified. It appears that he was called under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but that he made no appearance, and did not testify in behalf of the respondent Phoenix Assurance Company, and that the respondent Phoenix Assurance Company was entirely unrepresented at the hearing of the case, and that the trial was had without any notice to said respondent or knowledge on their part of the abandonment of their case by their attorneys of record.

It is held in the case of Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 161, 47 P. 1019, 1020: That the discretion of the trial court in granting new trials, "will not be disturbed except upon the disclosure of a manifest and unmistakable abuse, has become axiomatic, and requires no citation of authority in its support. It is true that such discretion is not a right to the exertion of the mere personal or arbitrary will of the judge, but is a power governed by fixed rules of law, and to be reasonably exercised within those rules, to the accomplishment of justice. But, so long as a case made presents an instance showing a reasonable, or even fairly debatable, justification under the law for the action taken, such action will not be here set aside, even if, as a question of first impression, we might feel inclined to take a different view from that of the court below as to the propriety of its action. More especially is this true where, as here, the question rests largely in fact, and involves the proper deduction to be drawn from the evidence. The opportunities of the trial court in such instances for reaching just conclusions are, as a general thing, so superior to our own that we will not presume to set our judgment against that of the former where there appears any reasonable room for difference."

In McLaughlin v. Nettleton, 69 Okl. 74, 183 P. 416, at page 419, the court said:

"The unquestionable weight of authority is that, when an attorney has been employed to conduct legal proceedings, he undertakes to conduct them to their determination, and cannot abandon the services of his clients without cause and upon reasonable notice. The evidence in this case shows that there was no notice given plaintiffs that their local counsel intended to abandon the cause, or terminate his services, or that he had done so, and while we are loath to disturb this verdict, on account of the fact that this is the second proceeding of this kind in this cause, nevertheless we are constrained to believe that, if this judgment should stand, it would have the effect of denying litigants their day in court and arouse an unjust resentment against the approved procedure in our tribunals of justice. It is the policy of the law and courts of Oklahoma to allow each litigant the right to be heard upon the merits of his cause, free from technical pitfalls.

"After a careful consideration of all the evidence, we are of the opinion that the petition to set aside the judgment entered on February 8, 1912, should be sustained, and said judgment set aside and cause heard upon its merits; and it is so ordered."

A number of other citations made by respondents in this case seem to support the rule that the failure of parties to appear at the trial, occasioned by the abandonment of the cause by their attorneys, may be considered as creating conditions of accident and surprise that could not be reasonably guarded against. Among these is the case of the Kentucky Supreme Court in Ray v. Arnett, 106 S. W. 828, 829, from which the following language is quoted:

"* * * If the appellant is entitled to a new trial at all, it must be for the cause mentioned in subsection 7 of section 518, which authorizes the granting of a new trial 'for unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing the party from appearing or defending.' The casualty or misfortune that will authorize the granting of a new trial must be 'unavoidable.' A mere ordinary 'casualty or misfortune' is not sufficient. It must be such casualty or misfortune as could not by the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence have been avoided. * * *

"Tested by this rule, the question is: Was appellant by unavoidable casualty or misfortune prevented from prosecuting her suit? Appellant intrusted her case to an attorney, who brought this suit for her. She depended, and had a right to depend, upon him to look after her interests and advise her of the steps taken in her case; but, without any notice to her or any fault on her part, he abandoned her case. Appellant lived in a part of the county remote from the county seat, was unacquainted with the manner and method of hearing and disposing of cases in court, and did not learn that her suit had been dismissed until 1907, when she at once took steps to have it reinstated. We express no opinion as to the merits of the controversy. It may be that appellant will not succeed; but she is entitled under the circumstances to a hearing, which she has not had. We think that, under the fair meaning of the Code provision, appellant was prevented by 'unavoidable casualty' from prosecuting more diligently her suit, and that she is entitled to a new trial."

To the same effect are cited Peterson v. Koch, 110 Iowa, 19, 81 N. W. 160, 80 Am. St. Rep. 261; Ennis v. Fourth Street Building Ass'n, 102 Iowa, 520, 71 N. W. 426; Hovey v. Halsell-Arledge Cattle Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 176 S. W. 897; Kansas City, M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Imboden (Tex. Civ. App.) 176 S. W. 900; Donnelly v. McArdle, 14 App. Div. 217, 43 N.

Y. S. 560; Adams v. Rathbun, 14 S. D. 552, 86 N. W. 629.

We think these authorities justify the ruling of the court granting a new trial under the circumstances of this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

LANE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR FRESNO COUNTY et al. ★
Civ. 291.

° District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

March 5, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 31, 1930.

1. Divorce ⇨156—Court may exercise discretion in refusing final divorce decree where parties cohabit for considerable time after interlocutory decree.

Where wife has been granted an interlocutory decree of divorce on account of fault of her husband and reconciliation has been effected and cohabitation resumed for considerable length of time, court may exercise discretion in granting or refusing final decree of divorce.

2. Mandamus ⇨51—Mandamus does not lie to compel entry of final divorce decree, where events occur changing status of parties after interlocutory decree.

Where, after rendition of interlocutory decree of divorce, events occur to change status or relation of parties, such as condonation and resumption of marital relation by parties, entry of final decree is not a ministerial act only, and becomes judicial act in performance of which trial court may use its discretion, and mandamus will not lie.

3. Contracts ⇨16—Words of offer accepted by words, actions, or conduct form an express contract (Civ. Code, § 1620).

Express contract under Civ. Code, § 1620, must be expressed in words, but one party may use words and the other party may accept by words, actions, or conduct, and until accepted, words form an offer, but when accepted they form an express contract.

4. Divorce ⇨156—Where husband requested wife, after interlocutory divorce decree, to return, and she lived with him for about eight months thereafter, there was "express agreement to condone" within statute (Civ. Code, §§ 118, 1620).

Where affidavit of wife seeking to compel entry of final decree of divorce stated that upon urgent solicitation, request, and entreaty of her husband, she returned to him and resumed marital relations with him and lived and cohabited with him for about eight months after interlocutory decree, there was express agreement under Civ. Code, § 1620, to condone within meaning of section 118, providing that cohabitation shall not be evidence of condonation unless accompanied by express agreement to condone.

5. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 156—Court held justified in using discretion in refusing final divorce decree, where wife's affidavit indicated condonation, in that she returned and lived with husband for about eight months after interlocutory decree.

Affidavit of wife seeking to compel entry of final divorce decree, stating that upon urgent solicitation, request, and entreaty of her husband she returned to him and resumed marital relations with him and lived and cohabited with him for about eight months, and then alleging acts of cruelty during that time, held to indicate condonation and change in relations of parties since rendition of interlocutory decree of sufficient character to justify court in using discretion in granting or refusing final decree of divorce.

6. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 127(3)—Divorce cannot be granted on uncorroborated testimony of a party.

Uncorroborated testimony of a party is insufficient to support a divorce decree.

7. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 141—In divorce case, equity court has inherent power to do equity.

Court of equity has inherent power to do equity in its decision of cause submitted to it in divorce case.

8. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 171—Final judgment against wife in divorce suit would not affect right to bring another action based on acts of cruelty after interlocutory decree.

If final judgment went against wife in divorce suit, it would not affect her right to bring another action based upon acts of cruelty occurring subsequently to trial and rendition of interlocutory decree of divorce.

Application by Madeline M. Lane against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Fresno, the Honorable S. L. Strother, Judge, for a writ of mandamus to compel the entry of a final decree of divorce.

Writ denied.

B. M. Benson, of Fresno, for petitioner.

Glenn M. De Vore, of Fresno, for respondents.

MARKS, J.

On August 17, 1928, petitioner was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce from Elbert K. Lane, Jr., by the superior court of Fresno county. On October 18, 1929, she moved the respondent court and respondent judge thereof to enter a final decree of divorce, which motion was not granted. She thereupon instituted an original proceeding in this court to secure a peremptory writ of mandate to compel respondents to enter such final decree. On their return to the alternative writ, the respondents filed a general demurrer, thereby admitting the truth of the allegations of the petition for the purpose of this hearing, and upon these pleadings the cause was submitted for decision.

Prior to the motion to have made and entered her final decree of divorce, petitioner served on her husband a copy of her notice of motion and a copy of her supporting affidavit. He did not appear or contest the motion. The material parts of her affidavit are as follows:

"Madeline M. Lane, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: That she is the plaintiff in the above entitled action; that she has read this affidavit and knows the contents thereof and that the same is true of her own knowledge.

"1. That the interlocutory judgment was granted by this court on the 17th day of August, 1928, and entered in judgment book number 61, page 54, on the 17th day of August, 1928.

"2. That since the granting of said interlocutory decree;

"(a) Said parties have attempted a reconciliation, but same has not been successful as hereinafter set forth;

"(b) That said parties have lived and cohabited together since the entry of the said interlocutory decree but are not now living or cohabiting together as is more fully set forth hereinafter.

"(c) Both parties to said action are now living.

"(d) All the requirements therein have been fully complied with on the part of the moving party herein and she is not in default in any thereof.

"(e) No motion to set aside or annul said interlocutory judgment or suit has been brought or is pending or undetermined, and no appeal has been taken or is pending therefrom, and said judgment has become final.

"3. That after the entry of the said interlocutory decree and in the month of January, 1929, this plaintiff, at the urgent solicitation, request and entreaty of the defendant, returned to defendant and resumed marital relations with the defendant and lived and cohabited with defendant until on or about the 15th day of September, 1929.

"4. That this defendant has not treated plaintiff with marital nor conjugal kindness, but since the attempted reconciliation has treated plaintiff in a cruel, harsh, thoughtless and inconsiderate manner, specifically as follows, to-wit:

"(a) That on or about the 15th day of August, 1929, defendant told plaintiff to 'go to hell' in front of the house where plaintiff and defendant were residing at 1315 Olive Avenue, in the city of Fresno, California, and in the presence of neighbors and passers by, and without any just cause or provocation and thereby caused plaintiff great humiliation, sorrow, chagrin and mental anguish.

"(b) That on or about the 5th day of September, 1929, defendant publicly and in a loud and insolent tone of voice, reprimanded plaintiff in a certain grocery store in the City of Fresno, California, for not having money to pay for groceries and thereby caused plaintiff great humiliation, sorrow and chagrin.

"(c) That during the month of September, defendant without just or any cause and in a loud and violent manner reprimanded plaintiff for driving plaintiff and defendant's automobile too much and getting dirt upon the said car, all of which caused plaintiff much sorrow, humiliation and chagrin.

"(d) That during the month of May, 1929, while plaintiff and defendant were entertaining company in their home, defendant upbraided plaintiff in a loud and violent manner and without any just cause, addressed plaintiff in a sarcastic manner and caused plaintiff great humiliation, sorrow and chagrin.

"(e) That defendant on a certain occasion in the month of August, 1929, harshly and violently upbraided plaintiff for returning a certain bathing suit belonging to a lady friend of the plaintiff's, without the knowledge of the defendant, and defendant at said time and place told plaintiff that unless defendant knew where plaintiff was going and the purpose of her errands she could not use defendant's car, but should walk on such errands, all of which caused plaintiff keen sorrow, humiliation and chagrin.

"5. Plaintiff therefore alleges that defendant has by his acts revoked any condonation which plaintiff may have extended to defendant by reason of her return to defendant and attempted reconciliation, and plaintiff alleges that there never at any time, was any express agreement of condonation made by plaintiff to the defendant; plaintiff further alleges that defendant did not accept the conditions of condonation in good faith and has not fulfilled same, for the reason that defendant has not treated plaintiff with conjugal kindness but has continuously since said attempted reconciliation treated plaintiff in a harsh, unkind and inconsiderate manner as specifically set forth above.

"6. That defendant has on many occasions and repeatedly threatened to take the minor child of plaintiff and defendant and deprive plaintiff of its care, custody and control, and has thereby caused plaintiff great sorrow, humiliation and chagrin."

The foregoing affidavit substantially sets forth the material facts before us, and upon these facts we must determine whether or not the writ of mandate shall issue. Two questions immediately present themselves for our consideration, namely: First, is rule 26 of the Rules for the Superior Courts, adopted by the Judicial Council of the State of California, invested with the force and authority of a statute; and, second, under the facts set forth in the affidavit of petitioner, does any discretion exist in the trial court to grant or refuse a final decree of divorce?

The Judicial Council of California, created under section 1a, article 6, of the Constitution of California, adopted by the people at the general election held on November 2, 1926, is given the authority in subdivision 5 of this amendment to "adopt or amend rules of practice and procedure for the several courts not inconsistent with laws that are now or that may hereafter be in force." The rule-making power of the Judicial Council would seem to be limited by any existing law, the Constitution reserving to the Legislature and the people the primary and higher right to provide rules of procedure for our courts, with the secondary right in the Judicial Council, to adopt rules only, when and where the higher authority of the Legislature and the people has not been exercised. It is urged that the rule in question violates the provisions of section 132 of the Civil Code. It is admitted that if the rule is valid, and if it has the force and effect of law, the writ of mandate must be denied, as the affidavit of petitioner did not conform to the requirements of this rule. We do not desire to decide this question here, but will assume for the purposes of this case that the rule does not control and will pass to what we believe is the main issue before us.

[1] The exact question, of whether or not the trial judge had any discretion in acting upon the motion of petitioner under the facts presented here, does not seem to have been decided in this state. The converse of the situation has, however, been decided. It has been held that where a wife has been granted an interlocutory decree of divorce on account of the fault of her husband, and a reconciliation has been effected and cohabitation resumed for a considerable length of time, the court may exercise a discretion in granting or refusing a final decree of divorce upon the application of the husband. McGuinness v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 222, 237 P. 42, 40 A. L. R. 1110; Olson v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 250, 165 P. 706, 707, 1 A. L. R. 1589.

[2] A study of the decisions in the state, upon the question of the right of the trial judge to exercise his discretion in granting or refusing a final decree of divorce, leads to the conclusion that judicial opinion, if not judicial decision, has established two very general rules into which the cases fall. Where an interlocutory decree has been granted, and upon the application for a final decree no intervening facts appear to show a change in the status or relation of the parties, the entry of a final decree becomes something in the nature of a ministerial act on the part of the court, and mandamus may be invoked to compel it to perform its duty; but where, after the rendition of the interlocutory decree, events occur to change the status or relation of the parties, such as condonation and a resumption of the marital relation by the parties, the entry of the final decree ceases to be a ministerial act only, and becomes a judicial act in the performance of which the trial court may use its discretion, and mandamus will not lie. McGuinness v. Superior Court, supra; Gloyd v. Superior Court, 44 Cal. App. 39, 185 P. 995; Olson v. Superior Court, supra; Dell v. Superior Court, 53 Cal. App. 436, 200 P. 85; Carp v. Superior Court, 76 Cal. App. 481, 245 P. 459; O'Connell v. Superior Court, 74 Cal. App. 350, 240 P. 294; Weeks v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 620, 203 P. 93; Stauter v. Carithers, 185 Cal. 160, 196 P. 37; London Guarantee & Accident Co., Ltd., v. Industrial Accident Commission, 181 Cal. 460, 184 P. 864. With these general rules in mind we must next pass to a consideration of the facts set forth in the affidavit of petitioner to determine whether there was such a change in the relation of the parties after the rendition of the interlocutory decree as would give the trial court a right to use its discretion in passing upon the motion of petitioner to enter the final decree of divorce.

There are two major reasons why the law requires a year to intervene between the interlocutory and the final decree of divorce. One is to permit the determination of the paternity of the children, and the other, not less of interest to society, is to permit, if possible, the husband and wife to compose their difficulties and become so reconciled to one another that the marital relations may be resumed and no final decree of divorce become necessary. If the marriage relation found its inception in a civil contract of the two parties in the performance, existence, and termination of which they alone be concerned, our task would be a simple one. But in every such contract there is a third party vitally interested, the society in which we live, and representing it, the government which gives that society the permanence upon which its existence depends. For this reason the rules of marriage are prescribed by law, and the right of dissolution should be jealously guarded.

About five months after the entry of the interlocutory decree in the case of Lane v. Lane the parties resumed cohabitation and lived together as husband and wife for a period of about eight months, when the petitioner here, the prevailing party in the divorce action, left her husband. The exact length of time over which the resumption of the marital relation extended should in principle make no difference. If a reconciliation be effected and a condonation take place, no line should be drawn whether the period be eight months or eight years. The duration of the cohabitation should be merely a circumstance to be considered by the trial judge in weighing the rights of the parties, and a measure to be applied in determining the effect of their acts and conduct.

[3, 4] Petitioner earnestly contends that her affidavit showed no condonation of the former cruelty of her husband. She calls attention to section 118 of the Civil Code and its provisions, to the effect that cohabitation, passive endurance, or conjugal kindness shall not be evidence of condonation unless it is accompanied by an express agreement to condone. She asserts in her affidavit that there was no express agreement to condone.

It will be observed in paragraph 3 of petitioner's affidavit that she states that upon the urgent solicitation, request, and entreaty of her husband she returned to him and resumed marital relations with him and lived and cohabited with him for about eight months. The words in which the solicitations, requests, and entreaties were couched do not appear, but that they were put in words is a necessary conclusion. "A contract is either express or implied." Section 1619, Civ. Code. "An express contract is one, the terms of which are stated in words." Section 1620, Civ. Code. That the husband used language that amounted to a request to petitioner to return to him cannot be doubted. That they were sufficient to effect a reconciliation is shown by the conduct of the parties. That petitioner regarded their legal effect as a condonation is apparent from her affidavit, for otherwise she would not have alleged acts of cruelty in paragraph 4 and 6, in a very patent attempt to escape the results of her forgiveness. She further seeks to be relieved from the results of her actions by stating in paragraph 5 of her affidavit that she herself did not express in words her forgiveness and condonation. In other words, appellant's contention is that if her husband had said, "Let us forgive and forget and go back and live together as a married couple should," and she had replied, "I forgive you, and we will forget what is passed and will start our married life over again," the condonation would have been complete; but if she said nothing, and yet returned to him as his wife, then there would have been no condonation. We do not so understand the law. To have an express contract, its terms must be expressed in words. One party may use the words and the other party may accept by words, actions, or conduct. Until accepted, the words form an offer, but when accepted they form an express contract. Los Angeles Traction Co. v. Wilshire, 135 Cal. 654, 67 P. 1086.

[5, 6] We believe that the affidavit of petitioner indicated a condonation and a change in the relations of the parties since the rendition of the interlocutory decree of sufficient character to justify the court in using a discretion in granting or refusing a final decree of divorce. In fact, it would seem to be the right of the judge presiding, if not his duty, to conduct such a hearing as would enable him to determine the rights and equities of the three parties in interest, the wife, the husband, and society. The court, and not a party, should decide whether or not there was a condonation. A divorce cannot be granted on the uncorroborated testimony of a party. In the proceeding below the only evidence offered in support of the acts of cruelty under which she sought to escape the effect of a seeming condonation was her unsupported, ex parte affidavit.

To grant the relief sought by petitioner, under circumstances which we believe show an express contract to condone, we would have to hold, in effect, that where an innocent husband or wife was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce, such party prevailing in the litigation, could, as a matter of right, secure a final decree at any time after the lapse of one year, without regard to any change in the relations of the parties. We cannot reach such a conclusion. It would strike a serious blow at the sanctity of the marriage relation and disturb the high plane of morals and ethics upon which it is supposed to rest. It would seriously affect the chance of success of a reconciliation, if one were attempted. For one spouse to know that a final and legal dissolution of the marriage relation lay within his or her grasp for the taking, would not tend to promote that feeling of forbearance, charity, and forgiveness necessary to the lasting success of any marriage.

[7] A court of equity has inherent power to do equity in its decision of a cause submitted to it, and in this case the exercise of such power is necessary in order to determine the question pending between the parties litigant in the case of Lane v. Lane. The Supreme Court has recognized this power of the court in divorce actions in many decisions. In the case of Olson v. Superior Court, supra, it was said: "The similar law in the state of New York entitles either spouse to a final judgment after three months 'unless for sufficient cause the court in the meantime shall have otherwise ordered,' and under that statute the court refused a final decree where a reconciliation was effected such as is here shown. Cary v. Cary, 144 App. Div. 846, 129 N. Y. S. 444. But, in the absence from our statute of this express language found in that of New York, the power of our courts is no different. The New York statute but expressed the power which our courts in equity inherently possess. They have under our present statute and without express authorization the power to recognize condonations and reconciliations such as are here shown, and to do justice to the litigants as may be demanded by such events in their lives as have arisen subsequent to the entry of the interlocutory decree and before the expiration of the fixed period of one year."

[8] Appellant complains that if this writ is denied she will be left a married woman with an interlocutory decree, reciting that she is entitled to a divorce without any way of ever obtaining one. We do not so understand her position. We do not understand that any formal order, decree, or judgment has been entered, either granting or refusing a final decree, which would affect her right of appeal if a proper record could be made. Section 936, Code Civ. Proc.; section 963, Code Civ. Proc. If the final judgment went against her, it would not affect her right to bring another action based upon the alleged acts of cruelty, all of which occurred subsequently to the trial and the rendition of the interlocutory decree of divorce as set forth in her affidavit.

The peremptory writ of mandate is denied.

PER CURIAM.

The defendant was convicted in the superior court of Butte county of a felony, to wit, manslaughter.

The transcript on appeal was filed in this court January 23, 1930. No brief has been filed in behalf of appellant. The cause was regularly placed on the calendar for oral argument on March 3, 1930. No appearance was made for appellant at the time the case was called for hearing.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 1253 of the Penal Code, the judgment is affirmed.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is a suit in equity to enjoin the city council of Woodland from making street improvements and levying assessments therefor, on the ground that the proceeding would amount to a confiscation of the property without compensation.

The appellants owned several lots in a sparsely settled portion of the outskirts of Woodland. The trustees of the city duly adopted a resolution pursuant to the City Improvement Act of the state of California (St. 1911, p. 730, and amendments thereto), declaring their intention to construct cement sidewalks adjacent to the property of the appellants. At the time set for the hearing of the resolution to construct public improvements, the plaintiffs appeared in open meeting of the council and filed written protests against the proposed improvements, upon the grounds that the cost of such improvements to the adjoining property owners would exceed the value of the benefits and would therefore amount to a confiscation thereof without compensation. Although the opportunity was afforded, the appellants offered no evidence in support of their protests. The council thereupon overruled and denied the protests and proceeded to advertise for bids for the performance of the work. This action was then brought to declare the proceedings for the acquiring of the improvements void and seeking to enjoin the defendants from awarding a contract for the work. A strict compliance with the statutory proceedings on the part of the council is not challenged.

Upon trial the court found that the plaintiffs duly filed their protests and were present at the time fixed for the hearing thereof; that although they were requested to present evidence in support of their protests, they failed and neglected to do so; that the council thereupon overruled and denied the protests; and that this determination was final and conclusive. Judgment was accordingly rendered against the plaintiffs. The evidence supports these findings.

MITCHELL et al. v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF CITY OF WOODLAND et al.
Civ. 4018.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 26, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing March 28, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 24, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 323(3)—Court cannot presume that cost of municipal improvements will exceed value of property or amount to confiscation of property without compensation.

In absence of evidence adduced in support of protests, court may not presume that cost of municipal improvements to owners of property will exceed value of property, nor that proceedings under such circumstances will amount to confiscation of property without compensation.

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 321(1)—City trustees' decision on protests against municipal improvements was final, in absence of fraud or lack of jurisdiction (City Improvement Act 1911, $\S$ 6, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1465, $\S$ 3).

In hearing of protests filed by property owners against construction of municipal improvements, city trustees acted in quasi judicial capacity, and their decision on protests was final and conclusive, in absence of fraud or lack of jurisdiction under City Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 734) $\S$ 6, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1465, $\S$ 3.

3. Municipal corporations $\S$ 298—Property owners protesting that cost of improvements would exceed value of property must prove to city trustees value of property, as compared with benefit of proposed improvements.

Where property owners protested against construction of sidewalks, on ground that cost to adjoining property owners would exceed value of benefits and would therefore amount to confiscation without compensation, and strict compliance with statutory provisions was not questioned, it was necessary for property owners to prove to city trustees value of property, as compared with benefit of proposed improvements.

with the trustees at the hearing respecting the grounds of protest, but no witnesses were sworn and no evidence was adduced in support of the protests. The record in this regard is quite similar to the proceedings which occurred in the case of Wild Goose Country Club v. County of Butte, 60 Cal. App. 339, 212 P. 711. In the absence of evidence adduced in support of the protests, a court may not presume that the cost of the improvements to the owners of property will exceed the value of the property, nor that the proceedings under such circumstances will amount to a confiscation of the property without compensation. Fraud was neither pleaded nor proved in the present case.

[2] Section 6 of the Improvement Act of 1911, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1465, § 3, provides that "at the time set for hearing protests the city council shall proceed to hear and pass upon all protests so made and its decision shall be final and conclusive."

In the proceeding which is involved in this case the city trustees acted in a quasi judicial capacity and their decision upon the plaintiffs' protests was final and conclusive. In the absence of fraud or a lack of jurisdiction, the action of the city council is conclusive, even though the evidence is conflicting or when the contestants are afforded an opportunity to prove the grounds of their opposition and fail to adduce evidence in support thereof. Lambert v. Bates, 137 Cal. 676, 679, 70 P. 777, 778; Page on California Street Laws, § 415; Blake v. City of Eureka, 201 Cal. 643, 648, 258 P. 945. In the case of Lambert v. Bates, supra, the court used this pertinent language: "By declaring that the determination of the council shall be 'final and conclusive,' it intended that that body should be the final tribunal for the determination of all questions that might be appealed to it, so far as such determination was of a question of fact, or depended upon evidence that might be presented in support of the appeal. Houghton's Appeal, 42 Cal. 35; Bixler's Appeal, 59 Cal. 550. This provision cannot be construed as authorizing a person merely to take an appeal to the council, without presenting to that body sufficient evidence to support his appeal, or any evidence in its support, and afterwards seek to have the grounds of his appeal sustained before another tribunal, and under additional or different evidence."

[3] It is urged that a failure to adduce evidence in support of a protest against street improvements is not a waiver of matters which are jurisdictional in character, and that the council has no jurisdiction to levy a tax for street improvements which amounts to a confiscation of the property without compensation. A number of cases are cited from other jurisdictions, to the effect that a failure to follow the statutory requirements preliminary to the making of street improvements left the council without jurisdiction, and that such a situation rendered it unnecessary to first raise the jurisdictional question before the council. In those cases the failure to comply with the statute appears from the record, and the council was without jurisdiction to hear or make any order that would be binding against the contestants. In the present case strict compliance with the statutory provisions is not questioned, and the council therefore had jurisdiction. While the complaint does allege facts which were intended to charge a confiscation of property, these facts were denied by the answer. No competent evidence was adduced in support of these charges either before the trial court or the council. Since the issue of confiscation raised the question of the value of the property as compared with the benefits of the proposed improvements, it became necessary to present and prove this question of fact to the city council. This the contestants failed to do. The action of the trustees was therefore final.

By an information filed in the trial court on the 5th day of October, 1929, the appellant was charged with the crime of murder, in that she did, on or about the 2d day of October, 1929, unlawfully, willfully, and with malice aforethought, kill and murder Rosaleo Carrillo. Upon the trial had pursuant to said information, the appellant was convicted of the crime of manslaughter. Her motion for new trial having been denied, an appeal was taken to this court.

[1] The record shows that the appellant and the deceased were husband and wife and belonged to a very low stratum of society. It would serve no useful purpose to set forth the testimony at length, and we content ourselves with the statement that the testimony is amply sufficient to support the verdict.

It appears that the deceased and the appellant were living on a small farm, and, while there, had been engaged in unlawfully making wine, and also using the same to a greater or less degree; that on the day of the homicide they had had some controversy over a cask of wine which the deceased, acting apparently under an agreement to discontinue the making of wine and the using thereof, was proceeding to empty, and the appellant, with a saucepan, or some other kitchen utensil, sought to save a portion thereof. It appears that the emptying of the wine was being done at a short distance from the residence of the appellant and the deceased; that, upon taking a saucepan of the wine, the appellant started toward the residence; that the deceased followed, making some remark to the effect that the appellant would not be allowed to drink the wine, or would not live to drink the wine. The appellant proceeded into the house, followed by the deceased at a short distance. The appellant, after entering the house, seized a loaded gun which was close by the entrance door, and, as the deceased approached, the appellant commanded him to halt. Instead of so doing, he advanced toward the appellant, whereupon the appellant shot the deceased, from the effects of which he died within a very short time.

The story of the quarrel preceding the killing, and of the details of the homicide, all rest upon the testimony of the appellant. The record also contains considerable testimony of the past lives of the appellant and the deceased, which we do not need to set out in detail, further than to say it shows the debased character of both the appellant and the deceased. They were both given to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, and numerous fights between them occurred. The testimony also shows that, prior to the marriage of the deceased and the appellant, the appellant had been a woman of "loose" character, and that such practices continued after their marriage.

[2] The chief grounds upon which the appellant seeks reversal are that the district attorney was guilty of improper practices in the asking of questions which necessarily prejudiced the jury against the defendant, and that the court erred in its instructions to the jury. An examination of the record shows that a witness by the name of Norton was asked if he had not had improper relations with the appellant, and answered that he had. No objection was made by the appellant to the introduction of this testimony. While the question appears to be improper as one tending only to degrade the witness, yet, as no objection was urged at the time the question was asked, no motion was made to strike out the testimony, and no request made of the court to instruct the jury to disregard such testimony, we think, in view of what we are about to state, it is too late now to argue that the appellant has suffered any prejudice.

The record shows that, when the appellant herself was on the witness stand, in answer to questions asked by her own counsel, she stated that she had had illicit relations with men since her marriage to the deceased, and that money was paid to the deceased on account thereof. Having voluntarily introduced such testimony, any so-called misconduct on the part of the district attorney in asking improper questions would seem to be entirely waived, or urged upon this appeal as an afterthought.

[3] In its instructions to the jury, the court gave the first and second subdivisions of section 197 of the Penal Code, and also section 198 of the same Code. It is now urged that the court should have given subdivisions 3 and 4 of section 197. However, a reference to the transcript shows that, by the giving of an instruction requested by the defendant, the jury was instructed as follows: "If at the time of the alleged killing, the deceased was advancing toward the defendant in a threatening manner, and had the power to do great bodily harm to her, and she knew this to be the case, and was in fear of great injury to herself, and that the circumstances were such as to lead a reasonable person to believe that she was in danger of great bodily harm or injury at the hands of her husband, then I instruct you she had the right to protect herself, even to the extent of killing the deceased; and if you believe from the evidence, the state of facts existed which I have just stated, it is your duty to find the defendant not guilty."

The court also instructed the jury that, if they had any reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, they should find the defendant not guilty, and that the burden of proof was upon the people to establish every fact beyond a reasonable doubt necessary to show the guilt of the appellant.

A reading of the instructions given by the court to the jury shows conclusively that the instructions covered fully and correctly every issue which the jury was called upon to decide.

There being nothing in the record to justify a reversal, the order and judgment of the trial court are affirmed.

1. Evidence ⇨80(1)—There is presumption that effect of foreign statute is same as that of similar local statute (General Corporation Law Nev. § 75).

Where no Nevada decision was cited, giving different effect to General Corporation Law Nev. § 75 (St. Nev. 1925, c. 177), court will presume that effect of Nevada law is same as local law under similar statute, Civ. Code, § 309, as construed by Supreme Court.

2. Corporations ⇨408—Contract to repurchase stock held not invalid on ground general manager was unauthorized to execute it.

Corporation cannot escape force of contract to repurchase stock on ground that general manager was unauthorized to execute contract, where he was only person representing corporation in sale of stock, since buyer had right to

4. Limitation of actions ⇨66(15)—Where demand is necessary before cause of action arises and delay is expressly contemplated, demand need not be made within statutory period for bringing action.

In cases where demand is necessary before cause of action arises, demand must be made within reasonable time, and time coincident with period of statute of limitations will ordinarily be deemed reasonable, but, where delay is expressly contemplated, even though obligation is payable on demand, there is no rule requiring demand to be made within statutory period for bringing action.

Appeal from the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. T. B. Warner, Judge.

Suit by W. B. Kaplan against Reid Bros., Inc., for specific performance of an agreement to repurchase stock. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Modified and affirmed.

B. S. Gregory, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

On January 24, 1921, the respondent purchased from the appellant corporation, acting through its president and general manager, M. L. Reid, ten shares of its capital stock for the sum of $1,000. Contemporaneously and as a part of the same transaction, the following agreement was executed and delivered to respondent:

"This letter will serve to verify our verbal agreement made today as follows:

"Should you, at any time, desire to dispose of the ten shares of the First Preferred Stock in Reid Bros. Inc. which you have this day purchased from the Company, the Company agrees that it will at any time, on thirty days notice, return you the par value of this stock, plus any accrued dividends.

"This letter is to be considered part of the agreement and sale of the ten shares of the First Preferred Stock to you.

"Yours very truly,

"[Signed] Reid Bros. Inc.

"M. L. Reid, General Manager."

On February 10, 1927, respondent demanded of the corporation that it carry out this agreement by repurchasing the stock, and, upon the corporation's failure so to do, this action was brought. Judgment followed for the respondent for the sum of $1,000, the par value of the stock, together with interest from March 10, 1927, and from that judgment this appeal is taken.

[1] Appellant is a Nevada corporation. The claim is made that under section 75 of the General Corporation Law of Nevada (St. Nev. 1925, c. 177) the contract sued upon is invalid. The section relied upon is practically identical with section 309 of our Civil Code, and appellant's contention is put at rest by Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 468, 129 P. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013. Since no Nevada decision has been cited to us giving a different effect to the Nevada statute, we must presume that the effect of the Nevada law is the same as our own as construed by the Supreme Court in the case above cited.

[2] We are not impressed by the contention that the general manager was without authority to execute the contract sued upon. He was the only person representing the corporation in the sale of the shares of stock in question, and respondent "had the right to assume that the salesman was authorized by the corporation to do those legal acts which the nature of his employment seemed to warrant. The agent, in other words, was ostensibly clothed with unlimited authority, and upon familiar principles appellant should not be heard to disavow and repudiate the contract made by him." Tidewater Southern Ry. Co. v. Harney, 32 Cal. App. 253, 257, 258, 162 P. 664, 667; Tidewater Southern Ry. Co. v. Merz, 35 Cal. App. 405, 418, 169 P. 1054.

[3-6] Although the contract sued upon in terms purported to give respondent the option "at any time" to have his stock repurchased by the corporation, appellant insists that the option must none the less be exercised within a reasonable time, and that more than a reasonable time had elapsed before the making of respondent's demand, and that the action is barred by the statute of limitations. The use of the words "at any time" in the contract before us indicated an intention of the parties that the option given respondent was not one as to which there was any necessity or occasion for promptness in its exercise, but quite the contrary. Literally construed, it would give respondent the right to exercise the option in perpetuity, and, even though it will not bear this construction as a matter of law, its inclusion in the contract is to be taken into consideration in determining what is a reasonable time for the exercise of the option under all the circumstances. In cases where a demand is necessary before a cause of action arises, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the demand is made. The demand, however, must be made within a reasonable time, and a time coincident with the period of the statute of limitations will ordinarily be deemed to be reasonable; but, "where delay in making the demand is expressly contemplated, even though the obligation is payable on demand, there is no rule of law that requires that demand shall be made within the statutory period for bringing an action." Wood on Limitations (4th Ed.) vol. I, § 118, p. 617; 37 Cor. Jur. pp. 966, 967; Vickrey v. Maier, 164 Cal. 384, 390, 391, 129 P. 273, 274. In Vickrey v. Maier, the Supreme Court had under consideration a contract for the repurchase of stock "at any time after six months," and held that a delay of more than four years in making a demand after the lapse of the six-month period was not unreasonable. In our case, the delay was somewhat longer, but the question of what was a reasonable time was primarily a question to be decided by the trial court, and we cannot hold that the trial court's determination that the option was exercised within such time as to entitle respondent to recover under the contract was erroneous.

The following language appears among the conclusions of law made and filed by the trial judge: "That upon the payment of said sum of one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars, together with interest and costs to plaintiff, said plaintiff deliver to defendant said ten shares of the first preferred stock of defendant." Through some inadvertence no such provision was made in the judgment. It is clear that, upon the payment of the judgment, appellant is entitled to have the certificate representing the stock and the stock returned to it. The omission of this provision from the judgment, in view of the conclusion of law above quoted, would appear to have been an oversight of court and counsel, and one which might have been corrected by the trial court upon timely application. Apparently no such application was made, and for that reason we feel that respondent should recover his costs on appeal. The judgment is accordingly modified by inserting therein just above the date and signature of the trial judge the language above quoted from the conclusions of law, and, as so modified, it is affirmed, respondent to recover his costs on appeal.

PEOPLE v. THOMAS.
Cr. 13.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 7, 1930.

Indictment and information  137(4)—Sufficiency of evidence to warrant commitment for trial can be raised by habeas corpus, but not by motion to set aside information (Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 7).

It was proper to deny motion to set aside information made on ground that defendant had not been legally committed by magistrate, as required by Pen. Code, § 995, for alleged reason that evidence before committing magistrate was insufficient, since question of whether evidence is adequate to show probable cause for holding defendant for trial can be raised by habeas corpus, but not by motion to set aside information, in view of section 1487, subd. 7.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; G. K. Scovel, Judge.

A. C. Thomas was convicted of the possession of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

D. G. Wettlin, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Z. B. West, Jr., Dist. Atty., and S. B. Kaufman, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Santa Ana, for the People.

MARKS, J.

Appellant was accused, by an information filed in the superior court of Orange county, of the crime of possession of intoxicating liquors, with two prior convictions. A jury trial was waived and he was found guilty and was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail of Orange county for the term of six months, and to pay a fine of $500.

At the time of his arraignment, and before his plea to the information, his counsel moved to set aside the information upon the ground that appellant had not been legally committed by a magistrate, as required by section 995, Penal Code, for the reason, as stated by counsel, that the evidence before the committing magistrate failed to show probable cause of the two prior convictions. The motion was denied. It was renewed at the opening of the trial and again denied. These rulings are now complained of as error. No other question is presented on this appeal.

It is the well-established rule in California that the question of the sufficiency of the evidence taken before a committing magistrate to show probable cause for holding a defendant for trial in the superior court can be raised by habeas corpus, but not by motion to set aside the information. People v. McCurdy, 68 Cal. 576, 10 P. 207; People v. Sehorn, 116 Cal. 503, 48 P. 495; People v. Beach, 122 Cal. 37, 54 P. 369; People v. Creeks, 170 Cal. 368, 149 P. 821, 822; People v. Mitsunaga, 91 Cal. App. 298, 266 P. 1020. In the case of People v. Creeks, supra, the Supreme Court said: "It was further claimed that the evidence adduced on the preliminary examination before the magistrate did not sufficiently show probable cause to warrant a commitment for trial. Such an objection is not available on motion to set aside an information. By reason of an express statutory provision so declaring (Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 7), such an objection may be raised on habeas corpus, if timely made, and we know of no other way in which it can be raised. It is not included in the grounds specified in the statute for the setting aside of an information. The subdivision relied on, that providing for such a motion on the ground that the defendant has not been 'legally committed by a magistrate,' has no reference to the matter of the sufficiency of the evidence upon which a magistrate has acted. See People v. Beach, 122 Cal. 37, 54 P. 369. The trial court did not err in denying the motion to set aside the information."

Judgment affirmed.

GIERSTER v. BERGEVIN.

Civ. 7007.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 3, 1930.

1. Guaranty ⇨26—Nonsuit for want of consideration was improper, in action on written guaranty (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 39).

In action on written guaranty, it was error to grant motion for nonsuit on ground of want of consideration, since consideration is presumed from writing, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 39, and therefore prima facie case was made.

2. Fraud ⇨64(1)—Order of nonsuit held erroneous under evidence, in action for damages for false representations.

In action for damages for false representations, in which plaintiff showed that representations as to facts were false, known to be such by defendant, and made with intent to deceive plaintiff, and that she relied on them to her injury, order of nonsuit was erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Paula Gierster against A. M. Bergevin. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

NOURSE, Acting P. J.

Plaintiff sued under three causes of action—for money had and received, upon a written guaranty and for damages for false representations. A nonsuit was granted as to all causes, and the plaintiff has appealed upon typewritten transcripts. The respondent has not defended the judgment by brief or oral argument.

The evidence discloses that the defendant, who was an experienced dealer in the purchase of stocks and securities, persuaded the plaintiff, who was a young German nursemaid, wholly unfamiliar with such transactions and unlearned in the language and customs of this country, to transfer her savings from the Bank of Italy to the offices of a stockbroker in San Francisco, upon the representation that the brokerage office was in effect a banking institution, and that her money would be there deposited with equal safety but with much greater profit. The defendant then persuaded the brokerage office to purchase certain stocks on margin for plaintiff's account, and, when calls for further payment were made, the defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff the written guaranty in suit, wherein he undertook to repay to her the full sum advanced if she would leave the stock in the hands of the broker until a certain date. Plaintiff performed as stipulated, the stock fell in price on the market and the brokers sold, returning to plaintiff $742 out of $2,000 which she had invested with them.

[1] Though no grounds were stated in the motion for nonsuit, it appears that the motion was granted on the cause of action covering the written guaranty on the ground of want of consideration. The ruling was error because the consideration is presumed from the writing. Section 1963, subd. 39, Code Civ. Proc. Hence a prima facie case was made.

[2] The only ground suggested for the order of nonsuit on the issue of fraud is that the representations as to the "value" of the stock were mere expressions of opinion, and hence not actionable. But these were but a small part of the representations made. The plaintiff made a prima facie case, at least showing all the essential elements of such a cause of action—that the representations as to facts were false, known to be such by defendant, made with intent to deceive plaintiff, and that she relied upon them, believing them to be true, to her injury. The order of nonsuit on this cause of action was error.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY et al.

Civ. 158.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 3, 1930.

1. Infants ⇨20—Justice's court has no jurisdiction to try one accused of contributing to minor's delinquency (Pen. Code, § 1425; Juvenile Court Law, § 21).

Under Pen. Code, § 1425, as amended in 1929, no jurisdiction is conferred on justice's court to try one accused of contributing to delinquency of minor in violation of Juvenile Court Law, § 21 (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3966).

2. Courts ⇨1—"Jurisdiction" is power to hear and determine case.

Court's "jurisdiction" is the power to hear and determine a case.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Jurisdiction," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Courts ⇨26—Court acting under special powers has only jurisdiction especially delegated.

Where a court acts under special powers, it has only the jurisdiction especially delegated to it by law.

4. Infants $\S$ 20—Juvenile court cannot try defendant pleading not guilty of contributing to minor's delinquency (Juvenile Court Law, $\S$ 21).

Juvenile Court Law, $\S$ 21 (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3966), giving juvenile court original jurisdiction to try person accused of contributing to minor's delinquency, prescribing procedure up to time of plea, and then specifically giving additional jurisdiction, if plea of guilty is entered, does not give such court jurisdiction to try a defendant pleading not guilty.

5. Statutes $\S$ 184, 205—All provisions of statute must be considered together and reconciled, if possible, and particular provisions must be so construed as to promote general purposes and policy of law.

In construction of a statute, all its provisions must be considered together and reconciled as far as possible, and particular provisions must be so construed as to promote, rather than defeat, general purposes and policy of law.

6. Infants $\S$ 20—Superior court has jurisdiction to try defendant pleading not guilty of contributing to minor's delinquency in juvenile court (Juvenile Court Law, $\S$ 21; Const. art. 6, $\S$ 5).

Since Juvenile Court Law, $\S$ 21 (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3966), does not give superior court, sitting as juvenile court, jurisdiction to try defendant pleading not guilty of contributing to delinquency of minor, jurisdiction is in superior court as such under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 5.

7. Infants $\S$ 20—Preliminary hearing before some magistrate is sufficient to authorize filing of information in superior court against defendant pleading not guilty of contributing to minor's delinquency in juvenile court (Juvenile Court Law, $\S$ 21; Pen. Code, $\S$ 888).

While judge of juvenile court may sit as committing magistrate where defendant pleads not guilty of contributing to minor's delinquency in violation of Juvenile Court Law, $\S$ 21 (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3966), all that is required is a preliminary hearing before some magistrate in order that information may be filed in superior court, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 888.

8. Infants $\S$ 18—Juvenile court is superior court, with inherent power to transfer case to another department thereof after reaching limits of special powers.

The juvenile court is a superior court, acting in a particular class of cases, and has inherent power to transfer case to another department of same court when limits of its special powers are reached.

9. Infants $\S$ 20—It was juvenile court judge's duty to transfer cases to superior court for trial after entry of pleas of not guilty of contributing to minor's delinquency (Juvenile Court Law, $\S$ 21).

After preliminary hearings had been held, defendants held to answer, and informations filed against them for contributing to minor's delinquency, in violation of Juvenile Court Law, $\S$ 21 (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3966), it became duty of juvenile court judge to arraign them and to transfer cases to superior court for trial after entry of pleas of not guilty.

10. Infants $\S$ 20—Defendant pleading not guilty of contributing to minor's delinquency in juvenile court, should be tried in superior court, in view of purpose of Juvenile Court Law (Juvenile Court Law, $\S$ 21).

Main purpose of Juvenile Court Law being to provide for care and custody of children, who have shown, or from lack of care are likely to develop, criminal tendencies, in order to train them to good habits and correct principles, actual trial of defendant pleading not guilty of contributing to minor's delinquency in violation of section 21 (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3966) should be had in superior court.

Application by the People for a writ of mandate to the Superior Court in and for San Bernardino County and Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge thereof.

Writ granted.

George H. Johnson, Dist. Atty. and James L. King, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Bernardino, for the People.

Duckworth & Harrison, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

BARNARD, J.

This is an application for a writ of mandate, seeking to compel the respondents to accept jurisdiction in certain cases where the defendants have been arraigned in the superior court, sitting as a juvenile court and have entered a plea of "not guilty" to a charge of violation of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law.

The petition alleges that a criminal complaint was filed in the justice's court of Ontario township, in the county of San Bernardino, this being a township wherein the population is less than 30,000, by which complaint a certain named defendant was charged with the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, a misdemeanor, as provided by section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law (Gen. Laws of Cal. 1923, at p. 1568), which offense was alleged to have been committed within the boundaries of that township. It is then alleged that, after a preliminary hearing, the defendant was held to answer upon said charge by a commitment issued by said justice's court; that thereafter an information was filed in the superior court of said county, sitting as a juvenile court, charging said defendant with said offense; that thereafter said defendant appeared before said superior court, sitting as a juvenile court, the honorable Benjamin F. Warmer presiding, and, after being arraigned, entered a plea of "not guilty." That thereafter the district attorney requested that the matter be set down for trial and be tried in said superior court, sitting as a juvenile court. This motion was denied upon the ground that this court was without jurisdiction to proceed further. Thereupon the district attorney moved that the said court transfer or certify the case to the superior court for trial, or for further proceedings. This motion was also denied, upon the ground that said court was without jurisdiction to take any further proceedings in the case. The petition further alleges a similar state of facts with reference to another defendant, also charged with a violation of the same section of the Juvenile Court Act, the only difference being that the justice's court of the township of San Bernardino, which township has a population in excess of 30,000, refused to accept jurisdiction to try the case, and thereafter held a preliminary hearing and issued a commitment which was followed by an information filed in the juvenile court. The petition also sets forth a similar state of facts in still another case, in which the defendant was held to answer by the justice's court of the township of San Bernardino, but in which the information was filed directly in the superior court of said county, and not in the juvenile department thereof. Thereafter the defendant entered a plea of "not guilty" in said superior court, and the court refused to set the case for trial, but transferred said case to the juvenile department of said court. Thereupon the defendant was again arraigned in said juvenile court, and, having again entered a plea of "not guilty," said juvenile court refused to set said case for trial, and also refused to certify or transfer the same back to the superior court. The petition sets forth that the justice's court of San Bernardino township, the superior court of San Bernardino county, and the superior court of said county sitting as a juvenile court, have refused, and do now refuse, to accept and entertain jurisdiction in any of said cases.

The only question presented is what court, if any, has jurisdiction to hear and try a case, after a plea of "not guilty" to a charge of violating the provisions of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law of the state of California has been entered in the juvenile court.

Section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law reads as follows:

"Any person who shall commit any act or omit the performance of any duty, which act or omission causes or tends to cause or encourage any person under the age of twenty-one years to come within the provisions of any of subdivisions one to thirteen inclusive of section one of this act, or which act or omission contributes thereto, or any person who shall, by any act or omission, or by threats, or commands, or persuasion, induce or endeavor to induce any such person, under the age of twenty-one years, to do or to perform any act or to follow any course of conduct, or to so live as would cause or manifestly tend to cause any such person to become or to remain a person coming within the provisions of any of subdivisions one to thirteen inclusive of section 1 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, or may be released on probation for a period not exceeding five years; and the superior court, sitting as a juvenile court, shall have original jurisdiction over all such misdemeanors. The said court shall in all prosecutions under this section, cause the defendant to be duly arraigned and plead to the charge made against him in the manner provided in the Penal Code of the state of California upon an indictment or information; and the said court shall also have jurisdiction in all cases where the defendant prosecuted under this section shall enter a plea of guilty to impose sentence or in its discretion to grant probation upon such terms as it may deem proper. The court may also, as a condition of such probation, require a bond in such sum as the court may designate to be approved by the judge requiring the same, to secure the performance by such person of the condition imposed by the court on such probation. Such bond shall by its terms be made payable to the State of California and any moneys received for the breach thereof shall be paid into the county treasury."

[1] While the Juvenile Court Law has been before the courts a number of times, the question here involved has not been directly passed upon. The question seems to have now arisen in connection with the uncertainty that has followed recent changes in the jurisdiction of justice's courts in criminal matters. It is apparent, however, that under the provisions of section 1425 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1929, no jurisdiction is conferred upon the justice's court to try such cases as those herein involved. Under this section this class of cases is particularly excluded from the jurisdiction of justice's courts in places having a population of 30,000 or more. And in places having a less population the jurisdiction of such courts is limited to cases in which the term of imprisonment does not exceed six months.

[2-4] Section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law, after providing that the superior court, sitting as a juvenile court, shall have original jurisdiction over all such misdemeanors, goes on to provide that said court shall cause the defendant to be arraigned, and to plead in the manner provided upon indictment or information, and then provides that said court shall also have jurisdiction to impose a penalty, where the defendant enters a plea of "guilty." There is, however, no procedure provided, and no jurisdiction given where the defendant, at this stage of the proceedings, enters a plea of "not guilty." Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine a case. Bennett v. Wilson, 133 Cal. 379, 65 P. 880, 85 Am. St. Rep. 207. A court acting under special powers has only the jurisdiction especially delegated. While original jurisdiction is given to the juvenile court, the same section, by providing the procedure up to the time of plea, and then specifically giving additional jurisdiction in the event a plea of "guilty" is entered, has so limited the jurisdiction of the juvenile court that it may not proceed to try a defendant who has thus pleaded "not guilty."

[5-9] Where a plea of "not guilty" has thus been entered in the juvenile court, it does not follow that all proceedings must close and the defendant be freed, for such a construction would nullify the penalty provisions of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Act. In the construction of a statute, "all its provisions must be considered together; they must be reconciled as far as possible, and particular provisions must be so construed as to promote and not to defeat the general purposes and policy of the law." Welch v. Williams, 96 Cal. 365, 31 P. 222. It must not be forgotten that the juvenile court is the superior court acting in a particular class of offenses. Edington v. Superior Court, 18 Cal. App. 739, 124 P. 450, 128 P. 338; Nicholl v. Koster, 157 Cal. 416, 108 P. 302, 303; People v. Budd, 24 Cal. App. 176, 140 P. 714. The misdemeanor in question has been created by section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law. Section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution of California provides that the superior court shall have jurisdiction in all cases of misdemeanor, not otherwise provided for. If the jurisdiction of this misdemeanor, after a plea of "not guilty" in the juvenile court, is not given to the superior court in section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law, it is not provided for, and, under the constitutional provision, jurisdiction is in the superior court. It has been frequently held that the superior court has jurisdiction over this class of cases. In re Sing, 13 Cal. App. 736, 110 P. 693; Edington v. Superior Court, supra; Nicholl v. Koster, supra; People v. Budd, supra. It has also been held that, such a case being triable in the superior court, section 888 of the Penal Code is applicable, and proceedings in the superior court must be based upon an information or an indictment. In re Sing, supra; Gardner v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 548, 126 P. 501. While it has been held that the judge of the juvenile court may sit as a committing magistrate (In re Sing, supra; People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 74, 50 P. 20; People v. Smith, 189 Cal. 31, 207 P. 518), all that is required is a preliminary hearing before some magistrate, in order that an information may be filed in accordance with section 888 of the Penal Code. It has also been held that, where a good information has been filed, the superior court has jurisdiction.

People v. De Leon, 35 Cal. App. 467, 170 P. 173; People v. Young, 44 Cal. App. 279, 186 P. 383; People v. Cohen, 62 Cal. App. 521, 217 P. 78; People v. McDougal, 74 Cal. App. 666, 241 P. 598. The juvenile court is itself a superior court, although acting in a particular class of cases, and has an inherent power to transfer a case to another department of the same court, when the limits of its special powers are reached. In the instant cases, the record shows that preliminary hearings had been held and the defendants held to answer and informations filed. It then became the duty of the judge of the juvenile court to arraign the defendants, and in these particular cases the plea of "not guilty" having been entered, it was the duty of the judge of the juvenile court to transfer the cases to the superior court for trial.

[10] That the actual trial of a person charged with a violation of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Act, after a plea of not guilty, should be had in the superior court rather than in the juvenile court, is in harmony with the whole spirit and purpose of the Juvenile Court Law, and the system and procedure based upon it. As the court said in Nicholl v. Koster, supra: "The main purpose of the act is to provide for the care and custody of children who have shown, or who from lack of care are likely to develop, criminal tendencies, in order to have them trained to good habits and correct principles." To this end, and with this purpose in mind, the juvenile court has appropriately been given an original jurisdiction over cases wherein the defendant is charged with an offense, the very essence of which is a violation, not only of the statute, but of the very principles and purposes forming the foundation of the entire act. On the other hand, while jurisdiction may well be given the juvenile court in a case so closely related to its own particular work, to punish, or to release on probation, upon suitable terms, one who admits his wrong and takes the first step toward retribution and reformation by pleading guilty, where a defendant pleads not guilty, and must be tried by a jury, this trial should take place in a more appropriate forum. From its very nature, and because of necessary qualification for doing the work for which it is intended, the juvenile court is not designed as a trial court in the ordinary sense. Not only is its purpose more reformatory than punitive, but its method of operation is very different from that of a criminal court. Technicalities and formalities are largely done away with, and its simple procedure is designed to gain the confidence of those coming within its operations, and to enable the judge thereof to best guide and control its wards, with more consideration for their future development than for their past shortcomings. The circumstances attendant upon contested jury trials are not only out of place there, but might have an injurious effect, not only upon the methods, but upon the atmosphere and confidence that have been built up around the work of the juvenile court, and which are so largely responsible for its success. We think the general aim and purpose of the Juvenile Court Act should be kept in mind in interpreting the section under consideration, and that these furnish an additional reason for the construction herein placed upon it.

Let a writ of mandate issue out of this court, directed to said superior court, and to said judge thereof, directing said judge to transfer the cases mentioned to the superior court of said county, and directing said superior court to accept jurisdiction thereof, and to hear, determine, and render judgment in the same.

PEOPLE on Complaint of DANE v. CITY OF SAN BERNARDINO.

Civ. 211.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 7, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ☞612(2)—Appeal from order dismissing action cannot be heard upon transcript certified only by county clerk.

On plaintiff's appeal from order dismissing action, appeal cannot be heard upon transcript certified only by county clerk and not certified or authenticated by trial judge.

2. Appeal and error ☞616(1)—Transcript failing to certify that all papers were included and to state documents set forth were used on hearing held insufficient warranting dismissal for failure to furnish requisite papers (District Court of Appeals Rule 29; Code Civ. Proc. § 954).

Where clerk's transcript on appeal from order dismissing action in clerk's certificate failed to certify that all papers used on hearing below were included in transcript and failed to state that any of documents therein set forth were used on hearing of motion, as required by District Court of Appeals Rule 29, appellant held to have failed to furnish requisite papers warranting dismissal of appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 954.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Action by the People, on the complaint of Fred Dane, against the City of San Bernardino, to test the validity of certain annexation proceedings. From an order dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals.

Appeal dismissed.

Raymond E. Hodge, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Fred A. Wilson and Joseph R. Rensch, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

BARNARD, J.

The above-entitled action was one to test the validity of certain proceedings, under which a certain area adjacent to the city of San Bernardino had been annexed to said city. In the trial court a motion to dismiss was heard after notice given and a minute order was entered by the trial court granting the motion and dismissing the action. From this order the plaintiff appealed.

The only record before us is a "Clerk's Transcript." This is certified to by the county clerk, as containing full, true, and correct copies of the original records on file in his office in said proceeding, consisting of the petition, affidavits, notice of motion to dismiss, minute order dismissing action, notice of appeal, notice of appeal and request for transcript, notice of entry of judgment. The respondent on this appeal has moved for its dismissal, one ground of said motion being that appellant has failed to furnish the requisite papers.

[1, 2] Where the requisite papers are not furnished by the appellant the appeal may be dismissed. Section 954, Code Civ. Proc. Rule 29 of the rules governing this court provides that, in all cases of appeal from an order of the superior court, the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion, must be authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions, except where otherwise provided by law. In the instant case there is no bill of exceptions and no certificate or authentication of any kind, signed by the trial judge. There is no provision in law permitting the hearing of an appeal in such a matter as this, upon a transcript certified only by the county clerk. Even if there were such provision, the transcript herein would not be sufficient for the reason that the certificate of the county clerk thereto, fails to certify that all of the papers used on the hearing in the court below are included in the transcript. In addition, the clerk's certificate herein fails to set forth or state that any of the documents therein set forth were used on the hearing of said motion, as required by rule 29, above referred to. Appellant has therefore failed to furnish the requisite papers. Muzzy v. McEwen Lumber Co., 154 Cal. 685, 98 P. 1062. No proper record being before us, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the other ground of the motion to dismiss.

For the reasons given, the motion to dismiss is granted and the appeal dismissed.

Where employees, who were injured in course of their regular employment, were sent by employers to certain physician and hospital, employers became liable for reasonable value of medical services, and hence insurance company carrying employers' insurance, having been duly notified, was properly substituted for employers' liability, in view of Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1923, p. 857) § 30, and section 29, as amended by St. 1925, p. 494.

Application for certiorari by the Pacific Employers' Insurance Company to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission fixing the amount to be paid for medical services to J. Rollin French, M. D., and others.

Award affirmed.

F. Britton McConnell, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, J. L. Kearney, of Los Angeles, and G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

YORK, J.

Petitioner raises the point that there was an express agreement between the applicants (who were persons and institutions rendering medical aid) and the defendant (which was an insurance carrier), fixing the amount to be paid for the services that were rendered to the injured employees.

It is conceded that if there was an express agreement, in full force and effect on the date or dates that the various medical services were rendered, the Commission was without power to make the award. Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 846), § 17 (b). The Industrial Accident Commission made a finding that the evidence did not establish that at the time the treatment was rendered there existed an express agreement between applicants and defendant fixing the amount to be paid for the services rendered, and this finding was made upon testimony which showed that there had been such a contract, but that at a time prior to the time of the injuries to the two employees, a general notice, purporting to terminate any employment of the persons and institutions that rendered the medical treatment, had been served upon the respondents, French and Golden State Hospital, by the insurance company. Part of the notice read as follows: "You are hereby notified that on all cases of injured employees of employers insured by this company, where X-rays are desired, the case must be referred to Dr. C. E. Early, 1055 Roosevelt Building, Los Angeles." Dr. Early was a former associate of Dr. J. Rollin French, one of the respondents herein, they apparently having been in partnership at the time of the making of the original agreement.

The second paragraph of the letter is as follows: "On all cases coming under your care of employees of employers insured in this company that, in your opinion, require hospitalization, they must be sent to the Angelus Hospital, 1925 Trinity Street, Los Angeles."

On the one hand, the petitioner is claiming that there was an express and unrevoked agreement between the parties fixing the amount to be paid for such services. On the other hand, the respondents are contending that there never was any agreement between the parties, but that if there was such an agreement, it was revoked by the letter of May 15, 1928.

[1] The Industrial Accident Commission made its finding that there was no such express agreement in effect when the treatment was rendered. Although the evidence as to both of these findings is not very definite or positive, under the rules of evidence laid down covering the taking of evidence before the Industrial Accident Commission, there was sufficient evidence for the Commission to make its findings. That being true, we are of the opinion that there is nothing in any of the points made by petitioner herein, as each of the points raised constitutes merely a repetition in different phraseology of the same proposition.

[2] There was testimony at the hearing that the petitioner herein was the insurance carrier of the two employers of the injured men at the time they sustained their injuries; that Dr. French and the Golden State Hospital rendered treatment to the injured men,

Carpenter and Norgaard. Thereupon the employers, who sent these men to obtain this treatment, became liable for the reasonable value of the services so rendered, since the men were injured in the course of their regular employment. The insurance carrier had agreed to assume and carry this liability, and as we are of the opinion that the insurance carrier assumed such liability, it was therefore properly substituted for the liability of the employers. Section 30, Workmen's Compensation etc. Act, chap. 586, Laws of 1917, and section 29, as amended by chap. 300, Laws of 1925.

The evidence in the given case showed that when the employers sent the injured men to the respondents for treatment, the insurance company for the employers was at once notified that these men were receiving treatment. The insurance carrier, however, made no effort to transfer the cases or to designate other doctors to take care of the injured men. The reason that the injured men went to Dr. French and the Golden State Hospital for treatment was that the employers gave to the injured men cards that had theretofore been furnished by the insurance company to the employers, which cards gave directions as to where the injured employees were to go to receive treatment, and how they were to get there. These printed slips contained the address of the Golden State Hospital, and that place was designated, and Dr. French was designated by the petitioner herein in such printed card.

The award is affirmed.

BUNNELL v. BAKER.*
Civ. 128.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

March 4, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing March 31,
1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 28, 1930.

1. Sales $\S$ 481—"Value" of motortrucks, in determining damages of buyer for wrongful repossession by conditional seller, held to mean resale price, and not worth of buyer's interest (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 16, 1861).

In action on conditional sales contract by assignee of seller to obtain possession of motortrucks sold, value of motortrucks, as fixed by jury in determining damages buyer was entitled to for wrongful repossession by plaintiff, held to mean price at which trucks could have been bought and sold in market, and not worth of special or limited interest of buyer, since under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 16, 1861, "value" could not be given a special or limited meaning, as distinguished from its usual definition, unless intention to so use it appeared, and buyer being only entitled to recover for his limited interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Value," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Sales $\S$ 481—Conditional buyer could recover only value of trucks wrongfully repossessed less unpaid purchase price.

In action on conditional sales contract by assignee of seller to obtain possession of motortrucks in which buyer filed cross-complaint for wrongful repossession of trucks, buyer held not entitled to judgment for full market value of motortrucks, but only to value of his special interest in them, in case delivery of them could not be made; the value of buyer's interest being determined by taking market value of trucks and deducting therefrom amount of purchase price remaining unpaid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by F. O. Bunnell, an individual doing business under the fictitious name of F. O. Bunnell Company, against Earl Baker, in which the defendant filed cross-complaint. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

MARKS, J.

On June 1, 1927, the Mack International Truck Corporation, as seller, entered into a conditional sales contract with respondent, as purchaser, whereby the seller agreed to sell to the buyer four Mack trucks for the sum of $14,081.60, upon which a cash payment of $10,500 was acknowledged. The balance of $3,581.60 was made payable in seven installments, the first six of which were in the sum of $500 each and the seventh in the sum of $581.60. The first installment became due on July 14, 1927, and the balance on the 14th day of each month thereafter. Deferred payments were made to bear interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. The sales contract contained the provisions usually found in such agreements. It reserved title in the seller and gave it the right to retake possession of the trucks in case of a default in the payments by the buyer. The contract was a renewal of former conditional sales contracts for the same trucks which, when new, sold for over $22,000. The buyer defaulted in some of his payments on this renewed contract, but his defaults were all waived by the seller, except, perhaps, that made by his failure to pay the one falling due on December 14, 1927. It is not necessary to decide here the question of whether or not the failure of respondent to make this payment, when due, was waived by the seller.

Appellant was a dealer in trailers and truck equipment. He sold respondent two trailers and some extra wheels for the trucks upon a conditional sales contract and had trouble in making his collections. About December 10, 1927, he entered into negotiations with the Mack International Truck Corporation for its conditional sales contract with respondent, and on December 17, 1927, it was assigned to him. He claims to have paid the Mack International Truck Corporation $2,968.25 for the contract, but the evidence on this point is not very clear.

On the morning of December 27, 1927, the four trucks were attached by the sheriff of Riverside county, in an action filed in Riverside county, entitled Van Rowen against Baker (respondent here). The next case filed was the one at bar in which appellant sought to gain possession of the trucks. The complaint alleges that they were in the possession of respondent, but whether or not this allegation was true when the complaint was filed is not entirely clear from the record. The same attorney acted for both plaintiffs. The writ was issued in the case before us, and five days thereafter the attachment was released and the trucks delivered into the possession of appellant. Respondent filed an answer and cross-complaint whereby the material allegations of the complaint were denied, and possession of the trucks, or their value, which he placed at $15,000, was sought, together with damages for withholding the same and also $10,000 as exemplary damages.

The case was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict against appellant and in favor of respondent and fixed the value of the trucks on the day of the trial at the sum of $10,000 and awarded him actual damages in the sum of $15,000 and exemplary damages in the sum of $1,000. Judgment was entered accordingly.

Respondent had not paid the full purchase price of the trucks on December 17, 1927. It would appear that there was a balance of $1,581.60 on the principal, being the installments falling due on November 14 and December 14, 1927, and on January 14, 1928, and $68.89 interest unpaid on that date. It also appears that there were unpaid balances due from respondent which are referred to in the record as "San Francisco account, $22.60, Oakland account, $490.95, Los Angeles account, $69.75." There was also an unpaid account of $501.47, due from respondent to a garage owner in Fresno which had been assigned to appellant.

The conditional sales contract contained the following provisions: "All bills for repairs done upon, and labor and material furnished by the Seller to or for said personal property before the final payment thereon is made, shall be added to the purchase price of said personal property, and be payable to the seller on or before the 10th day of the next succeeding month, and shall bear interest and be subject to all the terms of this contract, as though an original part of the purchase price of said personal property."

Of course, this provision would not permit the amount of the Fresno account to be added to the purchase price of the trucks as the labor and materials were not furnished by the seller. It does not appear that all of the items of charges composing the other accounts were for "repairs done upon, and labor and materials furnished by the seller to or for" the trucks. While it would seem that some of the charges might properly be added to the contract price of the trucks, it is intimated that others were for gasoline and oil which could not become part of the purchase price under the contract. From the record before us we cannot determine the amount unpaid under the terms of the conditional sales contract at the time suit was instituted by appellant. This makes it impossible for us to determine whether an attempted tender made by respondent to appellant was good in law.

Appellant urges many grounds for a reversal of the judgment, but we find it necessary to consider but one of them.

The court instructed the jury in part as follows:

"It is the duty of the jury to determine from all the evidence herein as to which of the parties were entitled to possession of said property on the 27th day of December, 1927. If you find the defendant was entitled to possession on that date then you shall find from the evidence the reasonable value of the property and also the amount of the damages defendant has sustained by reason of being deprived from the possession which is the reasonable rental value of said property for the stipulated time of 300 days, and if you find that the taking of this property was with intention to cause defendant oppression, fraud or malice, either express or implied; this is for sake of example and by way of punishment."

"The jury is instructed that if you find in favor of the defendant Baker, your verdict must be that the trucks shall be returned to the defendant and if such return cannot be had, then defendant shall recover of and from plaintiff, the value of the trucks on the day of trial, at such sum as you may fix. Your verdict shall then include that defendant Baker shall recover of and from plaintiff, the reasonable rental value thereof since the 27th day of December, 1927. If you find that plaintiff has been guilty of oppression, fraud or malice, actual or presumed, you may also award defendant such damages as you determine him to be entitled to."

The form of the verdict submitted to the jury was as follows:

"We, the jury in the above entitled action, find judgment for the defendant, Earl Baker, that the four trucks mentioned and described in the complaint be returned to defendant and we further find that the value of said trucks on the day of trial was the sum of $ ——. We further find judgment for the defendant as reasonable damages sustained by defendant to be the reasonable rental value of said trucks since December 19th, 1927, to date hereof in the sum of $ ——; and we further find that the defendant is entitled to exemplary damages and fix the same in the amount of $ ——."

[1] It will be observed that the court instructed the jury to find the value of the trucks on the day of the trial, which it did. There were no other instructions given on the question of value. While the word "value" has various shades of meaning, it was undoubtedly used in the instructions in the sense of the sum for which the trucks might be bought and sold in the open market. This is a well-recognized and commonly understood definition of the word, and one which the jury undoubtedly used in arriving at the figure fixed in the verdict. It corresponds to the value placed upon the trucks by respondent and his witnesses. There is nothing in either the testimony of the witnesses or in the verdict to indicate that the term was used in the sense of the value of the interest of respondent in the trucks, as distinguished from their value in the open market. The term cannot be given a limited or special meaning, as distinguished from its usual definition, unless an intention to so use it appears. Section 16, Code Civ. Proc.; section 1861, Code Civ. Proc. We must therefore hold that when the jury fixed the value of the trucks at $10,000, it meant the price at which they could be bought and sold in the market, and not the worth of the special or limited interest of respondent in them. This is especially true in view of the fact that we find it impossible to determine the total amount unpaid on the conditional sales contract from the record before us, and therefore cannot determine the value of respondent's interest in the trucks.

[2] The interest of respondent in the trucks was not the entire estate therein, but was special and limited. The value of his interest should have been determined by taking the market value of the trucks and deducting therefrom the amount remaining unpaid under the terms of the conditional sales contract. In case delivery of the trucks could not be made, he was not entitled to a judgment for the full market value of the trucks, but only to the value of his special interest in them. Lindsey v. Butte (Cal. App.) 274 P.

428; Connell v. Hogg, 181 Cal. 730, 186 P. 134; Conolley v. Power, 70 Cal. App. 70, 232 P. 744; Griffith v. Reddick, 41 Cal. App. 458, 182 P. 984. As the jury evidently followed the instructions of the court and found the full market value of the trucks at the time of trial, and judgment was entered for this amount in case the trucks were not returned to respondent, we must conclude that the giving of the instructions on the question of value was prejudicial error requiring a reversal of the case.

Appellant in both his brief and in oral argument urged that there was misconduct on the part of the trial judge in remarks made by him in the presence and hearing of the jury. We cannot agree with appellant, and find nothing in the record to sustain this contention. He also urged that there is no evidence in the record sustaining the judgment for exemplary damages. Again we cannot agree with him. We would not disturb this portion of the judgment were the record free from other errors.

Judgment reversed.

1. Trial ⇨165—Motion for nonsuit admits truth of plaintiff's evidence and every legitimate inference therefrom, and on such motion evidence should be interpreted most strongly against defendants.

Motion for nonsuit admits truth of plaintiff's evidence and every inference which can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and on such motion evidence should be interpreted most strongly against party making motion.

2. Negligence ⇨93(1)—Guest, riding in rear seat of automobile when struck by train, having no power or control over driver or automobile, cannot be contributorily negligent.

Guest, riding in automobile in rear seat when struck by train at crossing, having no power or control over driver or automobile, and never attempting to exercise any, cannot be held contributorily negligent, since under such circumstances negligence of driver cannot be imputed to guest.

3. Automobiles ⚡224(3)—Railroads ⚡327 (12)—Guest, riding in rear seat and having no power or control over driver or automobile, held not required to warn driver of approaching danger of collision at railroad crossing.

Guest, riding in rear seat of automobile, having absolutely no power or control over driver or automobile, and never attempting to exercise any, held not required to warn driver of approaching danger of collision at crossing.

4. Automobiles ⚡242(8)—Railroads ⚡346(5)—Presumption exists that guest in rear seat of automobile used due care and caution for his own protection.

Presumption exists that guest, riding in rear seat of automobile and killed when automobile was struck by train at railroad crossing, used due care and caution for his own protection, and did all that was reasonably required.

5. Automobiles ⚡245(87)—Railroads ⚡350 (21)—Riding in automobile driven by man with only one eye held not contributory negligence as matter of law.

Riding in automobile driven by man with only one eye held not contributory negligence as matter of law.

6. Automobiles ⚡224(3)—Railroads ⚡327 (12)—That driver of automobile was blind in one eye was mere fact to be considered with all other facts and circumstances in determining contributory negligence of guest.

In action for damages for death in railroad crossing collision of guest, against driver of automobile and railroad, fact that driver was blind in one eye held merely a fact to be considered by jury with all other facts and circumstances in determining whether deceased was guilty of contributory negligence.

7. Automobiles ⚡245(87)—Railroads ⚡350 (21)—Contributory negligence of guest, riding in rear seat of automobile when struck by train at crossing, held for jury.

In action for death of guest riding in rear seat of automobile, which was struck by train at crossing, deceased's contributory negligence held question of fact for jury.

8. Automobiles ⚡245(24)—Railroads ⚡350 (22)—Negligence of driver of automobile, struck by train at crossing, held for jury under testimony showing country was strange, that view was obstructed, and he saw nothing.

In action for death of guest riding in rear seat of automobile, which was struck by train at crossing, negligence of driver held question of fact for jury, where he testified he was unacquainted with country and road, and did not see warning signs or railroad tracks or engine, and heard no signal, and that view was obstructed.

9. Negligence ⚡93(1)—Heirs of guest riding in automobile struck by train could recover against railroad, if negligent, notwithstanding driver's negligence.

Though driver of automobile may have been guilty of negligence as matter of law at time of collision with train at crossing, if railroad was guilty of negligence proximately causing death, heirs of decedent, who was guest in automobile, would not be barred from recovery, since negligence of driver could not, under such circumstances, be imputed to guest.

10. Railroads ⚡350(6)—Negligence of railroad, causing collision with automobile at crossing resulting in death of guest, held for jury.

In action for damages for death of guest, riding in rear seat of automobile which was struck by train at crossing, railroad's negligence held question of fact for jury.

11. Trial ⚡143—Directed verdict is not authorized, where there is any conflict in evidence of a substantial character.

Where there is any conflict in evidence of a substantial character, directed verdict is not authorized.

12. Railroads ⚡350(7)—Whether signals required of train approaching crossing were given held question for jury, where testimony in regard thereto was conflicting.

In action for damages for death of guest riding in rear seat of automobile when struck by train at crossing, conflicting testimony regarding giving of signal by train when approaching crossing held to present question of fact for jury whether signals were given.

13. Damages ⚡96—New trial ⚡74—Amount of damages in personal injury action is within sound discretion of jury, or trial judge on motion for new trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5).

Amount of damages in personal injury action is committed first to sound discretion of jury, and next to discretion of trial court, who, in ruling on motion for new trial, may consider evidence anew, determine anew facts, and set aside verdict, if excessive, under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5.

14. Appeal and error ⚡1004(3)—Decision of trial court and jury on amount of damages cannot be set aside, unless plainly and outrageously excessive, suggesting passion, prejudice, or corruption.

Decision of trial court and jury on amount of damages cannot be set aside, unless verdict is so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice, or corruption.

15. Death ⚡99(4)—$35,000 for death of husband and father 42 years old, in good health, with annual income over $4,000 and life expectancy over 26 years, held not excessive.

$35,000 to two minor children and wife for death of husband and father 42 years of age, in good health, with proven income of from $4,000 to $5,000 per annum, and an expectancy of life of 26.72 years, and contributing from $250 to $300 per month to children and wife held not excessive.

16. Death ⚡11—Right of action against automobile driver for death of guest was statutory (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

Right of action against driver of automobile to recover for death of guest was statutory right depending on Code Civ. Proc. § 377, since no such right of action existed under common law.

17. Automobiles ⇨242(1)—Plaintiffs, suing for death of guest in automobile, were required under statute to prove only lack of ordinary care on part of defendant; "wrongful act or neglect" (Code Civ. Proc. § 377; Civ. Code, § 2096).

In action against driver of automobile for death of guest brought under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, plaintiffs were only required to prove lack of ordinary care on part of defendant, under Civ. Code, § 2096, since "wrongful act or neglect" mentioned in Code Civ. Proc. § 377 was in such case failure to use ordinary care and diligence.

18. Death ⇨9—Statutes respecting actions for wrongful death held amended by vehicle act, in so far as rights of guest in vehicle on public highway are concerned (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 376, 377; Civ. Code, §§ 1714, 2096; California Vehicle Act 1923, as amended, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 376, 377, and Civ. Code, §§ 1714, 2096, respecting right of action for wrongful death, were amended by California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended), § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580, in so far as rights of guest riding in vehicle on public highway are concerned, inconsistent portions of former statute being repealed by implication, since under latter statute plaintiff is required to prove death was proximately caused by intoxication, willful misconduct, or gross negligence of person responsible for operation of vehicle.

19. Death ⇨9—Right to sue for death or injury to guest in automobile is not destroyed by statute, but degree of negligence required to be proved is greater (California Vehicle Act 1923, as amended, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

Right of guest in automobile to sue, or, in case of his death, right of his heirs or personal representative to sue for injury or death, is not destroyed or impaired by enactment of California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended), § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580, but degree of negligence required to be proved by guest is greater under new statute.

20. Statutes ⇨267(2)—Statutes are not to be construed as retroactive so as to affect pending litigation, unless such intent is expressly declared or necessarily implied; "retrospective law."

While Legislature has power to pass retroactive laws which do not impair obligations of contracts or affect injuriously vested rights, statutes are not to be construed as intended to have retroactive effect so as to affect pending litigation, unless such intent is expressly declared or necessarily implied; "retrospective law" being one which operates on matters which occurred or rights and obligations which existed before time of enactment.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem.

Appellant Rarity, in his petition for a rehearing in this court, makes the contention for the first time that the cause of action upon which plaintiffs recovered judgment was abated by the enactment of section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act, which became effective on August 14, 1929. To enable us to consider that question a rehearing was granted. On the other issues involved our original opinion filed December 26, 1929 (283 P. 886), is adopted as the decision of this court, which reads as follows:

This is an appeal by the defendants John W. Rarity and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, a corporation, from a judgment entered against them upon a verdict of a jury in the sum of $35,000. Plaintiffs are the wife and two minor children, who are the sole heirs, of William Krause, deceased, and they brought this action, charging that William Krause's death was due to negligence of the defendants John W. Rarity and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company.

On September 12, 1927, at about the hour of 6 o'clock p. m., said William Krause and one O. E. Orr were guests and passengers of the defendant John W. Rarity in his Jewett coach automobile. Rarity was driving said automobile in a westerly direction along a public highway in Fresno county known as "Central Avenue," which is a rural highway, paved and practically level. Across said highway the appellant Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company owned and operated a railroad track and railroad, extending in a northerly and southerly direction, and known as "Mattie Spur." The country surrounding the place where the collision occurred is practically level. The railway track was about one foot lower than the paved highway. At the time of the accident there was a ditch about 3 feet high on the north side of Central avenue and parallel thereto. Upon this bank there was at the time a growth of foliage, which varied in height from 1 to 5 feet. For a quarter of a mile immediately east of the railway there was at the time of the accident a grape vineyard. The rows in this vineyard, which extended in an easterly direction, were about 6 feet high and the vines were in full foliage.

About 12 or 14 feet east of the railway tracks, and about 12 feet north of the highway, there was a standard railroad crossing sign. It consists of an upright post, approximately 10 feet high, painted white, and at the top of which are two crossarms, painted white, with the words "Railroad Crossing" in large black letters thereon. About 300 feet east of the railroad and 20 feet north of the highway there was a smaller sign, a target sign, consisting of an upright post 6 feet high, at the top of which is a metal disc about two feet in diameter, with the letters "R R" in black on a white background. One of the witnesses testified that this sign, at the time of the accident, was hidden by weeds. There was, at the time of the accident, one tree on the north line of the highway, about 70 feet east of the track. This tree stands 20 feet high and is approximately 12 feet across the spread of its branches. On the south line of the highway, east of the tracks, was a row of olive trees that came within about 28 feet of the railroad tracks.

As said automobile was attempting to cross said spur track it was struck by a locomotive of the appellant Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, and as a result of said collision the said William Krause received injuries from which he died almost instantly.

Plaintiffs allege that the death of William Krause was caused by the negligence and careless operation and handling of the automobile by defendant John W. Rarity, and contributory thereto and concurrent therewith the negligence and carelessness of defendant Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company in so operating and conducting its locomotive as to drive the same toward and upon said highway crossing without giving or sounding any warning whatsoever of the approach thereof, either by sounding a whistle, bell, or otherwise.

The defendants and appellants filed separate answers and have also prosecuted separate appeals.

The appellant railway company in its answer interposed a general denial, and further pleaded as an affirmative defense that the injuries to and death of said William Krause were contributed to and proximately caused by his own negligence in this: That at all times after said William Krause came within 300 feet of said crossing, the locomotive and train of defendant railway company, which was approaching said crossing, were plainly visible, and the noise of the train and engine were plainly audible to said William Krause, and that said William Krause did not look for any train that might be approaching upon defendant railway company's track, and did not warn or caution the driver of said automobile that said automobile was approaching a railway track, and should be operated cautiously and under control, and did not listen for the noise of any train that might be approaching said crossing.

As a further and separate defense to said complaint said railway company alleged that the collision and injuries to and the death of said William Krause were contributed to and proximately caused by his own negligence in this: That he permitted the driver of said automobile to operate the same at a high rate of speed as the same approached the railway crossing and as said William Krause knew that said automobile was so approaching said crossing, and said William Krause so allowed the said automobile to be driven at a high and dangerous rate of speed to and upon the said crossing without cautioning or warning the driver of said machine to approach said crossing with his machine under control, with an opportunity to look for and listen for any train or engine that might be approaching said crossing.

The answer and defense of John W. Rarity was substantially as follows: That at the time of the collision he was operating his automobile with reasonable care and at a lawful and proper rate of speed; that he did not know of the existence of the railway track, or of the fact that a railway track crossed Central avenue; that he did not hear or see the locomotive until it was too late for him to avoid collision with it; that he did not know of the approach of the locomotive, because of the fact that no whistle was blown or bell rung, and because of the fact that the foliage upon the north side of Central avenue obscured the locomotive from his view; that he had only one eye, and that by reason thereof his vision was limited; that, because of the fact that the setting sun was directly in the line of his vision, he watched the highway directly ahead of him, and that because of the position of the sun he could not and did not see the railway sign; and that, as he was at that time driving in a rural district, he was driving at a lawful and proper rate of speed, to wit, 30 miles an hour. Appellant Rarity contended throughout the trial that, because of the conditions outlined, the burden was cast upon respondents to show that he was negligent in operating his automobile, under the circumstances shown by the evidence.

The appellant railway company first contends that the court erred in denying its motion for a nonsuit. In support of this contention it is argued, first, that deceased, William Krause, was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; second, "the accident was solely and proximately caused by the negligence of defendant Rarity."

[1, 2] In considering whether or not the motion was properly denied, it is important to keep in mind the court's power and limitations with reference to the granting of nonsuits. The motion admits the truth of plaintiffs' evidence and every inference which can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and upon such motion the evidence should be interpreted most strongly against the party making the motion, which in the case at bar would be the appellant railway company. Stieglitz v. Settle, 175 Cal. 131, 165 P. 436; Goldstone v. Merchants Ice & Cold Storage Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 P. 776; Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 P. 252; Bloom v. Allen, 61 Cal. App. 28, 214 P. 481; Bakos v. Shell Oil Co. of California (Cal. App.) 271 P. 127; Gregg v. Western Pac. R. R. Co., 193 Cal. 212, 223 P. 533. In the light of the foregoing well-established rules, let us examine first the evidence touching the alleged contributory negligence of the deceased. The evidence is undisputed that William Krause, the deceased, was a guest of John W. Rarity, and at the time of the accident was sitting in the rear seat of Rarity's automobile, and had absolutely no power or control over Rarity or the automobile in which he was riding, and never attempted to exercise any. Under such circumstances alone Krause could not be held guilty of contributory negligence, for the law is well settled in this state that the negligence of the driver of the machine cannot be imputed to a passenger therein, in the absence of any evidence showing that the latter exercised some control over the driver, or that he possessed the power to supervise or direct the manner in which the automobile should be operated. Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 P. 385; Irwin v. Golden State Auto Tour Corp., 178 Cal. 10, 171 P. 1059; Nichols v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 174 P. 319; Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 529, 530. Therefore, if deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, it must have been some act either of commission or omission on his part, other than being a mere guest of Rarity, which of itself constituted contributory negligence. There is, however, no evidence in the record tending to show any such act of negligence on the part of the deceased.

[3] It is argued by the defendant railway company that the railroad signs, track, and engine were open and visible to deceased, and that he should have warned Rarity of the approaching danger, etc. Practically the same contention was made in the case of Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Company, supra, and there the Supreme Court said:

"This argument, we think, is satisfactorily and completely answered by the following statement of the law on this subject, found in 3 Cal. Jur. pp. 853 and 854: 'A passenger in a motor vehicle approaching a railway crossing is under no legal obligation to warn the driver, either of the presence of the tracks or of an approaching train; the view being unobstructed and the driver reasonably competent and vigilant. And, while it is the passenger's duty to look and listen, it is not his duty to stop for a successful observation, since he has no authority over the driver, but is wholly subject to the latter's action. The passenger has a right to suppose that the driver, on approaching a railway crossing with which he is familiar, will exercise due care for the protection and safety of his passengers, and that, even when so near the crossing as to be in apparent danger of collision with an on-coming train, he will or may take some action which will avert an accident. Nor is the passenger obliged, even when the danger of collision becomes suddenly imminent, to displace the driver, seize the operating levers and endeavor to avoid the impending catastrophe. Nevertheless, it has been said that the passenger must look out for himself, and may not, in a place of danger, as on approaching a railway crossing, rely blindly on the driver. But a passenger in a machine operated by another cannot be said as a matter of law to have been negligent in not calling the chauffeur's attention to the danger of a collision.'

The facts of the Marchetti Case are very similar to those in the case at bar, and we deem the foregoing a sufficient answer to the railway company's contention.

[4] Appellant railway company further insists that, if deceased had used ordinary care for his own safety, he would have seen and heard the locomotive and could have warned Rarity of the impending danger in time to have averted the accident, and, having failed to do so, was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. In support of this contention the following cases are cited: Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 156 P. 460; Thompson v. L. A., etc., Railway Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709; Bressee v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 149 Cal. 131, 85 P. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059. These cases, undoubtedly, contain a correct statement of the law upon the subject of a passenger's duty in case of known danger. They have little or no application to the case at bar, for the reason already stated, and for the additional reason that it does not appear that there was anything that could have been done by the deceased which would have averted the collision, had deceased seen the engine or track in time to have warned Rarity of the impending danger, and there is no assurance that the latter could have brought his machine to a stop before reaching the railroad tracks.

Furthermore, Rarity and Orr both testified that they did not see the crossing signs, or hear the engine, and that no bell was rung and no whistle blown. They were seated in the front seat of the automobile, and there is some evidence in the record that Rarity's view was somewhat obstructed. This testimony is some justification for assuming that deceased, who was in the rear seat of the automobile, did not hear the noise of the engine, or hear the bell or whistle, or see the cross signs, and also some evidence that the bell was not rung nor the whistle blown. Another witness, a lady living near by, also testified that no bell or whistle or other warning was given by the railroad engine. There is a presumption that deceased used due care and caution for his own protection, and did all that was reasonably required of him. There is no evidence in this case to overcome or dispel this presumption. See Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co., supra; also Shields v. King (Cal. Sup.) 277 P. 1043.

In Carpenter v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 51 Cal. App. 60, 195 P. 1073, 1075, the court said: "Conceding that deceased did see the approaching train and said nothing to the driver of the automobile or otherwise interfered with his operation thereof, nevertheless we cannot say as a matter of law that by reason of such omission he was guilty of negligence. * * * The sole ground upon which the negligence of deceased is predicated is the fact that he could, had he looked, have seen the approaching train, and therefore, argues respondent, he should in the exercise of ordinary care for his safety have done something to escape the result of the collision. This question, however, in view of the presumptions arising, is one of fact to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances in the case."

[5-7] Appellant railway company contends that deceased was guilty of negligence as a matter of law for riding in a car driven by a man with only one eye. No authority is cited in support of this contention. The only testimony in the case regarding Rarity's eyesight is that he lost his left eye some 16 years before the accident; that he had been driving an automobile for 8 or 9 years prior to the accident, and that so far as he knew his vision was not affected by the missing eye, and that the eyesight of the remaining eye was good. The fact that Rarity was blind in one eye was a fact to be considered by the jury with all the other facts and circumstances in the case, in determining whether deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. We cannot say as a matter of law that deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. In view of all the facts and circumstances in the case, the question of contributory negligence on the part of deceased was one of fact to be determined by the jury.

[8] Neither can we say as a matter of law that "the accident was solely and proximately caused by the negligence of the defendant Rarity." Under the authority of such cases as Koster v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 279 P. 788, Barnett v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Co. (Cal. App.) 278 P. 443, Hoffman v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. App.) 281 P. 681, and Young v. P. Elec. R. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 283 P. 61, and the physical facts as the railway company contends existed at the time of the collision, Rarity was undoubtedly guilty of negligence, as a matter of law. There are, however, several material differences between the facts in the above cited cases and the case at bar, as far as Rarity is concerned. For example: In the instant case, Rarity and Orr both testified they were unacquainted with the country and road, and did not see the warning signs or the railroad track or engine, and heard no signal, and that the view was obstructed in the manner above set forth. We are of the opinion that Rarity's negligence was also a question of fact for the jury.

[9, 10] However, the law is well settled that although Rarity, the driver of the car, may have been guilty of negligence as a matter of law, nevertheless, if the appellant railway company was guilty of negligence proximately causing the death of William Krause, the heirs of Krause, who was a guest of Rarity's in the car, would not be barred from a recovery, as such negligence of Rarity could not be, under the circumstances, imputed to Krause. This was also a question of fact for the jury. Baldwin v. Pacific Electric Railway Co. (Cal. Sup.) 281 P. 380. We conclude, therefore, that the trial court did not err in denying the motion for a nonsuit.

[11] The appellant railway company also contends that the court erred in refusing to direct a verdict in favor of said appellant at the close of all the evidence. We are unable to agree with this contention. The law is well settled that a directed verdict is not authorized, where there is any conflict in the evidence of a substantial character. Kohn v. National Film Corporation, 60 Cal. App. 112, 212 P. 207; Estate of Fleming, 199 Cal. 750, 251 P. 637; Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 P. 267; Young v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., supra.

[12] In this case there is a decided conflict between the testimony of the employees of the railway company and the other witnesses as to whether or not a whistle was blown or a bell was rung at the crossing at the time of the accident. Rarity and Orr both testified that they heard none, and the witness Mrs. Koumarin, who lived near the crossing at the time of the accident, testified that there was no whistle blown or bell rung, and the engineer and fireman in the employ of appellant railway company testified that they blew the whistle and rang the bell. Under such circumstances, it was a question of fact for the jury to determine, and the court was not authorized to direct a verdict in favor of said appellant.

Both appellants contend that the court erred in giving certain instructions and refusing certain other instructions. A great many of the instructions given are severely criticized by both appellants. We have examined carefully all instructions, both given and refused, and we are of the opinion that, when the instructions given are taken as a whole they fully and correctly state the law applicable to all phases of the case. Both appellants offered a large number of instructions, and a great many were refused, and it is entirely unnecessary for us to discuss each refused instruction. Suffice it to say we find no prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in refusing or giving any of the instructions complained of.

[13, 14] The appellants also contend that the amount of the verdict is excessive as a matter of law. We are likewise unable to agree with this contention. A motion for a new trial was made upon several grounds, among them being "excessive damages, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice." Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5. The motion for a new trial was denied. The rule is well established that the amount of damages in this kind of an action is committed first to the sound discretion of a jury, and next to the discretion of the judge of the trial court, who in ruling upon the motion for a new trial may consider the evidence anew, determine anew the facts, and set aside the verdict if it is not just. Upon appeal the decision of the trial court and the jury on the subject cannot be set aside, unless the verdict is so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury. Reneau v. Hirsch, 88 Cal. App. 1, 262 P. 1100, and cases there cited.

[15] We have carefully examined the entire record, including the evidence, and there is nothing in the record to show that the verdict was not the result of a fair and honest judgment of the jury. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the deceased was a man of 42 years of age, in good health, with a proven income of from $4,000 to $5,000 per annum, and an expectancy of life of 26.72 years, and contributed from $250 to $300 a month to plaintiffs. When all the facts and circumstances are considered, we think the award is not disproportionate to the compensation reasonably warranted by the facts.

Many other contentions are made by both appellants for a reversal of the judgment, but we have carefully considered them all, and find none of them of sufficient importance to warrant a reversal of the judgment or require special discussion. We have given the entire case careful consideration, and, as above stated, we have come to the conclusion that the question of negligence on the part of Rarity and contributory negligence on the part of deceased were questions of fact for the jury, and, the jury having determined that both Rarity and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company were negligent, we find no reason to disturb their findings and judgment.

From the facts stated, it will be seen that the present action is one for damages for the death of William Krause, who was killed on September 12, 1927, while riding as a guest in the automobile of appellant John W. Rarity. As far as Rarity is concerned, the action is based upon his failure to use ordinary care. The accident happened, suit instituted, judgment obtained, and this appeal taken and perfected, all before section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act became effective.

[16, 17] The right of plaintiffs to maintain this action was a statutory right, depending upon section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No such right of action existed under the common law. Kramer v. San Francisco Market Street R. R. Co., 25 Cal. 434; Clark v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 527, 150 P. 357, L. R. A. 1916A, 1142; Dickinson v. Southern Pacific Co., 172 Cal. 727-730, 158 P. 183; McLaughlin v. United Railroads, 169 Cal. 494, 147 P. 149, L. R. A. 1915E, 1205, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 337; 8 Cal. Juris. 948, 949, 950 and 951, and cases there cited.

Section 377 gives a right of action for damages for the death of a person, not a minor, caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, to his heirs or personal representatives "against the person causing the death, or if such person be employed by another person who is responsible for his conduct, then also against such other person." This is a general section and gives a right of action for damages for the death of any person, not a minor, caused by any actionable wrong or neglect of another person.

In the case at bar, plaintiffs were only required to prove a lack of ordinary care on the part of Rarity to recover against him (section 2096, Civ. Code); or, in other words, the "wrongful act or neglect" mentioned in section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure was, in this case, the "failure" of Rarity to "use ordinary care and diligence" for Krause's safe carriage. Nichols v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 178 Cal. 630, 174 P. 319; Sheean v. Foster, 80 Cal. App. 56, 251 P. 235; Curran v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., 77 Cal. App. 462, 247 P. 236; Spring v. McCabe, 53 Cal. App. 330, 200 P. 41; Brown v. Davis, 84 Cal. App. 180, 257 P. 877.

[18, 19] Appellant Rarity contends that section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in so far as it formerly authorized an action against the operator of an automobile for damages for the death of a guest caused through a failure to use ordinary care, has been repealed by section 141 $\frac{3}{4}$ of the California Vehicle Act (as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

The Legislature of 1929 added section 141 $\frac{3}{4}$ to the California Vehicle Act (St. 1929, c. 787). This section provides that the representatives or heirs of a deceased person shall have no right of action for damages for death, where the deceased has been killed while riding in a vehicle as a guest, upon the public highway, unless such death proximately results from intoxication, willful misconduct, or gross negligence of the owner, driver, or person responsible for the operation of the vehicle, and, furthermore, provides that in such action the burden of proof is cast upon the plaintiff to prove that such death was proximately caused by intoxication, willful misconduct, or gross negligence of the person responsible for the operation of the vehicle. This section relates to two subjects: (1) The right of recovery against the operator in an action brought by the guest; (2) the right of action by the personal representatives or heirs of a person killed while riding as a guest. It seems clear, therefore, that the Legislature intended to have section 141 $\frac{3}{4}$ of the California Vehicle Act govern all actions by a guest, or in behalf of the heirs of a guest, against the operator of an automobile or other vehicle upon the public highways of this state.

Said section 141 $\frac{3}{4}$ is, therefore, repugnant to sections 1714 and 2096 of the Civil Code, and also to sections 376 and 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in so far as these sections authorize the maintenance of an action for damages for the death or injury of a guest against the operator of an automobile based on ordinary negligence. Such being the situation, the old sections and the new section cannot stand together in their entirety, and, to the extent that sections 376 and 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure and sections 1714 and 2096 of the Civil Code are inconsistent with section 141 $\frac{3}{4}$ of the California Vehicle Act, the latter act will repeal the former sections on the same subject by implication. People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 18 P. 413; City and County of Sacramento v. Bird, 15 Cal. 295; Dillon v. Bicknell, 116 Cal. 111, 47 P. 937; Treadwell v. Yolo County, 62 Cal. 564; Charnock v. Rose, 70 Cal. 192, 11 P. 625; Hanley v. Sixteen Horses, 97 Cal. 183, 32 P. 10; Ex parte Benjamin, 65 Cal. 310, 4 P. 23; Talcott et al. v. Board of State Harbor Commissioners, 53 Cal. 199; Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 58 P. 372; McGranahan v. Police Court, 56 Cal. App. 372-374, 205 P. 98; 23 Cal. Juris. 702.

In Sedgwick on Statutory Law, p. 124, it is said: "Even if a subsequent statute be not repugnant in all its provisions to the prior one, yet if the latter statute was clearly intended to prescribe the only rule which should govern in the case provided for, it repeals the original act."

The right of a guest to sue or, in case of his death, the right of his heirs or personal representatives to sue, is not destroyed or impaired by the enactment of section 141 $\frac{3}{4}$ of the California Vehicle Act. The right is the same under the new section as under the old sections, but the degree of negligence required to be proved by a guest is greater under the new statute than under the old. The right given all other class of persons to sue for torts, and the degree of proof required, is in no way affected by the new section.

Therefore, sections 376 and 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and sections 1714 and 2096 of the Civil Code, are amended only in so far as the rights of a guest riding in a vehicle on the public highways of this state are concerned, and not in any other respect. Said amendment could have been made to each section of the Code above mentioned and accomplished the same purpose, and we think the new section (141 $\frac{3}{4}$) should be considered as an amendment to said sections of the Code with the same force and effect as if each section had been actually amended to include the language of said section 141 $\frac{3}{4}$ of the California Vehicle Act.

[20, 21] Appellant Rarity next contends that section 141 $\frac{3}{4}$ is retroactive in its operation, and, by reason thereof, the action abates and the judgment falls.

We are unable to agree with this contention. "A retrospective law is one which operates upon matters which occurred, or rights and obligations which existed, before the time of the enactment." 5 Cal. Juris. 747; Smith v. Mathews, 155 Cal. 752, 761, 103 P. 199; People v. Allied Architects' Ass'n, 201 Cal. 428, 257 P. 511.

It is a well-settled principle of statutory construction that, while the Legislature has power to pass retroactive laws which do not impair the obligations of contracts or affect injuriously vested rights, it is equally true that statutes are not to be construed as intending to have a retroactive effect so as to affect pending litigation, unless such intent is expressly declared or necessarily implied from the language of the enactment. Williams v. Johnson, 30 Md. 500, 96 Am. Dec. 616; James v. Oakland Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 785, 796, 797, 103 P. 1082; Greer v. Blanchar, 40 Cal. 194, 197; Gates v. Salmon, 28 Cal. 320, 321; Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 P. 48; Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 123 P. 276, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392; Estate of Richmond, 9 Cal. App. 402, 99 P. 554; Montecito County Water Dist. v. Doulton, 193 Cal. 398, 224 P. 747; Vanderbilt v. All Persons, 163 Cal. 507, 126 P. 158; East Bay Municipal Utility Dist. v. Garrison, 191 Cal. 680, 218 P. 43; 36 Cyc. 1205; Bascomb v. Davis, 56 Cal. 152; Estate of Frees, 187 Cal. 150, 156, 201 P. 112; Estate of Parker, 200 Cal. 132, 141, 251 P. 907; State Commission in Lunacy v. Welch, 20 Cal. App. 624, 630, 129 P. 974, 976; Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes, p. 362.

In Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 529, the rule is thus stated: "It is a sound rule of construction that a statute should have a prospective operation only, unless its terms show clearly a legislative intention that it should operate retrospectively."

In State Commission in Lunacy v. Welch, supra, the court said: "It is quite true that the Legislature has power to pass retroactive laws, that do not impair the obligation of contracts or vested rights; but it is equally true that laws are not construed as intended to have a retroactive or retrospective effect, so as to affect pending litigation, unless such intent is expressly declared or necessarily implied in the language of the statute."

Again, in The Matter of Clyde E. Cate, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 279 P. 131, 133, Mr. Justice Richards said: "It is a canon of interpretation that statutes are not to be given a retrospective operation unless it is clearly made to appear that such was the legislative intention."

The rule of construction above announced is not alone supported by the foregoing authorities, and many others that could be cited, but the Legislature of this state has expressly prescribed certain rules of interpretation which reflect the general legislative policy of this state upon the question of the effect of legislation repealing or amending statutes upon rights of action which have accrued prior to the enactment of such legislation. Section 3 of the Civil Code contains the express provision: "No part of it [Civil Code] is retroactive, unless expressly so declared." A similar provision is found in the Code of Civil Procedure, § 3; Penal Code, § 3; Political Code, § 3, and this rule applies to the amendments to the codes as well. Estate of Frees, supra; Sharp v. Blankenship, 59 Cal. 288; Central Pacific R. R. Co. v. Shackelford, 63 Cal. 261; Bank of Ukiah v. Moore, 106 Cal. 673, 680, 39

P. 1071; Estate of Richards, 133 Cal. 524, 527, 65 P. 1034; McKay v. Lauriston, 204 Cal. 557, 566, 269 P. 519; In The Matter of the Application of Cate (Cal. Sup.) 279 P. 131; People v. Allied Architects' Ass'n, 201 Cal. 437, 257 P. 511.

We have carefully read section 141½ and find no language contained therein that would give the slightest intimation that the Legislature intended that said section should have a retroactive operation. The very contrary is indicated by some of the language used. The section, in part, reads: "Any person who as a guest accepts a ride in any vehicle moving upon any of the public highways of the State of California, and while so riding as such guest receives or sustains an injury, shall have no right of recovery. * * * In the event that such person while so riding as such guest is killed * * * then neither the estate nor the legal representatives * * * shall have any right of recovery. * * * If such person so riding as a guest be a minor and sustain an injury or be killed * * * then neither the parents nor guardian nor * * * representatives * * * of such minor shall have any right of recovery. * * * Nothing in this section contained shall be construed as relieving the owner * * * provided, that in any action for death * * * to person or property by or on behalf of a guest * * * the burden shall be upon plaintiff. * * * For the purpose of this section the term 'guest' is hereby defined as being a person who accepts a ride in any vehicle without giving compensation therefor."

"Words used in this code in the present tense include the future as well as the present." Civ. Code, § 14. Under the maxim, "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," it seems to follow that words used in the present tense do not include the past.

Thus it will be seen that said section uses the expression "Who accepts a ride" twice and uses the expression "Shall have no right to recover," or similar language, three times. The word "shall," found in these phrases, while mandatory in meaning, usually refers to the future. Likewise, the expression "who accepts a ride" is directed to rides to be taken in the future. 5 Cal. Juris. 750; People v. Allied Architects' Ass'n, supra.

Therefore, from the language of said section alone, a prospective, and not a retrospective, operation of the statute was undoubtedly intended by the Legislature.

In the case at bar, the trial court instructed the jury in accordance with section 2096 of the Civil Code as it stood when the accident happened. If the court had instructed the jury that it was necessary for plaintiffs to prove that Rarity was guilty of willful misconduct or gross negligence in the operation of his car, or was intoxicated at the time of the accident and while operating the car, it would have been prejudicial error, because the law, as it then stood, only required plaintiffs to show that Rarity failed to use "ordinary care" in the operation of his automobile. The trial judge certainly could not have anticipated a change in the statute as to the degree of negligence required to be proved by plaintiffs.

Rarity places great reliance upon such cases as People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 65, 112 P. 866, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148; Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 P. 90, and Freeman v. Glenn County Telephone Co., 184 Cal. 508, 194 P. 705, in support of his contention that section 141¾ is retroactive. A careful study of these cases will show that there is a clear distinction between all of them and the case at bar. It must be remembered that this action is not for the enforcement of a penalty but for the recovery of compensatory relief only. 8 Cal. Juris., p. 730.

People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo was an action by the Attorney General in the name of the people for a decree declaring the defendant insolvent, etc., prosecuted under the provisions of section 10 of the Banking Act of 1903. St. 1903, p. 368. That section makes it the duty of the Attorney General, under circumstances described therein, to prosecute an action of the kind considered in the decision. It authorizes the entry of judgment in a proper case ordering "such corporation into involuntary liquidation," appoint a receiver, etc. The act of 1903 was repealed pending appeal by the Bank. Act of 1909. St. 1909, p. 87. By section 134 of the latter act the superintendent of banks was authorized to liquidate the affairs of a bank directly, without any action in court. In the San Luis Obispo Bank Case it was not a mere change in the degree of proof required, but the provisions of the old law were entirely repealed, leaving no authority therein to support any judgment.

In Moss v. Smith the judgment was based on section 309 of the Civil Code. Pending appeal the Public Utilities Act went into effect. St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 18. Section 52, subd. b, provided: "The provisions of section 309 * * * of the Civil Code of this state, * * * shall have no application to public utility corporations." There again the whole foundation in law for any judgment against the defendant under section 309 was cut away.

In Freeman v. Glenn County Telephone Company, section 309, as amended (St. 1917, p. 657), contained a saving clause as to all actions: "Excepting only the liability of a director of a corporation heretofore incurred shall not exist in any case where, all of the debts and liabilities of the corporation to creditors having been paid, the capital stock divided, withdrawn, or paid out constituted all of the capital stock of the corporation and the same was paid out, withdrawn, or divided with the consent of all of the stockholders to or among themselves." The effect of this language was to make the amendment expressly retroactive in the one instance named therein.

Furthermore, neither section 3 of the Civil Code, nor other similar sections in the Code of Civil Procedure, the Penal Code, or the Political Code is mentioned in any of these cases.

For the foregoing reasons we are satisfied that said section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act is not retroactive and has no bearing whatsoever upon the case at bar.

Therefore, the judgment will be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

HUSSONG v. BYERS, Sheriff, et al.
Civ. 290.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

March 4, 1930.

Appeal and error $\S$ 370—Appeal will be dismissed on motion, for appellants' failure to arrange for payment of transcript, to reply, or to appear at hearing (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953(b)).

Where parties appealing from judgment did not file an undertaking as required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953(b), or otherwise arrange for compensation of reporter in preparing transcript, and did not file any reply on hearing of motion of appellee to dismiss appeal, and judgment was entered on September 11, 1929, motion to dismiss filed on January 9, 1930, will be granted, as time for filing transcript and points and authorities, including any extensions that were within power of court to make on motion for new trial, had expired without excuse therefor being shown.

AGUILAR v. RIVERDALE COOPERATIVE CREAMERY ASS'N.★

Civ. 6801.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 3, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing April 2, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 28, 1930.

BARNARD, J.

This is a motion by respondent to dismiss an appeal from the judgment, upon the ground that no transcript of the record, or appellants' points and authorities, have been filed within the time allowed by law, and that the time for preparation thereof has expired. It appears from the certificate of the county clerk that judgment was entered in this action on September 11, 1929; that notice of entry of said judgment was served on the attorney for appellants on September 12, 1929; that on September 20, 1929, appellants' attorney filed a notice of appeal, which notice included a request for the preparation of a transcript of the evidence and proceedings at the trial; that thereafter the county clerk demanded payment in advance of the fees for the preparation of said transcript; that the same were not paid and the transcript was not prepared; that no further demand for such transcript was made by the attorney for the defendants; that on the 14th day of October, 1929, the attorney for defendants filed another notice of appeal, no request for the preparation of a transcript being made; that no other attempt has been made by the defendants, or their attorney, to prepare a record for the purposes of said appeal; and that no proceedings are pending in the superior court for a bill of exceptions, and the time therefor has expired. Notice of motion to dismiss was filed in the Supreme Court on January 9, 1930. The matter was later transferred to this court, and thereafter a supplemental notice of motion to dismiss was served on appellants' attorney.

No reply of any kind has been filed by the appellants and no appearance was made at the time set for hearing the motion. Under section 953(b) of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is incumbent upon an appellant to either file an undertaking or otherwise arrange for the compensation of the reporter in preparing a transcript. No attempt to comply with the statute is disclosed by the record here. The time for filing the transcript and appellants' points and authorities, including any extensions that were within the power of the court to make on any possible motion for new trial having expired, and no excuse therefor, reasonable or otherwise, being shown, the motion of respondent must be granted. Sutter County v. Tisdale, 128 Cal. 180, 60 P. 757; Hughes v. De Mund, 195 Cal. 242, 233 P. 94.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed.

1. Negligence $\S$ 32(1), 105—Risks attached to condition of premises, or which are incident to operation of business are assumed by licensee, and owner owes licensee only duty to refrain from willful injury.

Licensee assumes all risks attached to condition of premises or which are incident to operation of business conducted thereon, and owner owes licensee no duty except to refrain from doing him willful or wanton injury.

2. Negligence $\S$ 32(2)—To be "invitee," one must have entered premises at invitation of owner or occupant thereof.

Whether person entering premises of another bears legal status of invitee or of bare licensee depends on nature of business which brings him on premises, and before such person can be given legal standing of an invitee it must appear that he entered premises at express or implied invitation of owner or occupant thereof.

3. Negligence $\S$ 32(2)—Invitation is implied when one enters premises for mutual benefit of owner and himself, or in connection with owner's business.

Where purpose of one in entering premises of another is of common interest or mutual benefit to owner or occupant and himself, or when in connection with business of owner or occupant which is being carried on on premises, an invitation is implied.

4. Negligence $\S$ 32(2)—One entering premises merely for purposes of his own or of third party, having no relation to business of owner, is bare "licensee."

Where one entering premises stands in no contractual relationship with owner or occupant and enters premises merely for purpose purely of his own or of a third person which has no relation whatever to business of owner or occupant and in which they have no interest, beneficial or otherwise, he is deemed to be bare "licensee."

5. Negligence $\S$ 32(2)—Employee of prune grower using drier with permission of drier owner but without charge held licensee, and could not recover from owner for loss of hand severed by revolving fan in drier.

Where prune grower obtained permission of owner of drier to use drier in connection with drying of prunes on condition grower would use his own men and perform work at his own expense, there being no charge to him for courtesy extended and prune grower's employee's hand was severed on coming in contact with blades of revolving fan in drier, employee held mere licensee and not an invitee and could not recover from owner.

PER CURIAM.

[1] Respondent, an employee of one Dr. Goodrich, was performing certain work for his employer in a drier on premises belonging to appellant, and while doing so his hand came in contact with a revolving fan and was severed. Thereafter he brought this action for damages against appellant, claiming that his injuries were proximately caused by the defective and dangerous manner in which the fan was constructed and allowed to be operated. The trial took place before a jury, which rendered a verdict in respondent's favor, and from the judgment entered thereon this appeal was taken. A reversal is sought on a number of grounds, among those urged being that according to respondent's own testimony his injuries were brought about as a result of his own carelessness. But the first question presented for determination is whether respondent was upon appellant's premises as an invitee, as he claims, or as a bare licensee, as contended by appellant; for if his status was that of a bare licensee he is barred from recovery because, in that capacity, he assumed all the risks attached to the condition of the premises or which were incident to the operation of the business conducted thereon, and appellant owed him no duty except to refrain from doing him willful or wanton injury (Lindholm v. Northwestern Pacific R. Co., 79 Cal. App. 3d, 248 P. 1033, and cases cited therein); and no such injury is claimed or established.

Respondent entered the premises under the following circumstances: Appellant was engaged in the business of producing, manufacturing, and selling dairy products. One of its plants was located at Riverdale, and among the different products dealt with was casein, which it prepared for the market by putting the same through a drying process in a drier built for that purpose inside one of the larger creamery buildings on the premises. The drier at this plant had not been operated, however, for about two years. Dr. Goodrich was a grower of prunes, and during the month of December, 1927, had on hand a crop of fresh fruit which he was unable to sun-dry. He therefore phoned to the foreman of appellant's Riverdale plant, a man named Jorgensen, and requested permission to cure the prunes in the Riverdale casein drier. Jorgensen at first declined to grant the request, but finally consented upon the distinct understanding and agreement with Dr. Goodrich that the latter would operate the drier and do all of the work connected with the drying of the prunes with his own men, and at his own expense, and that there would be no charge to him for the courtesy extended. Thereupon Jorgensen left orders with his men to clean out the drier and connect up the electric motor with propelled the drier fan. On the following Friday, Dr. Goodrich's truck, which was being driven by one of his men, arrived at the plant with the first load of prunes. The driver was accompanied by respondent and a fellow employee named Massias. After the prunes were unloaded they were spread on trays by respondent and Massias, and two of appellant's men who happened to be working in the creamery building at the time, but in no way connected with the operation of the drier, voluntarily and without being authorized or requested so to do by their superiors, explained to respondent and Massias how to stack the trays on small hand trucks and wheel them into the drier. It took respondent and Massias until 10 o'clock that night to place all the prunes in the drier, after which they left the premises and did not return until the following Monday morning. During their absence two of appellant's men, observing that all of the trays had been stacked on one side of the drier, voluntarily moved part of them to the other side. On Monday morning more prunes arrived, and, after removing from the drier some of those already cured, respondent and Massias proceeded to place the fresh fruit therein. Shortly after the noon hour they were wheeling the third truck load of trays into the drier, and while going through a passageway five feet wide in front of the fan, which was six feet in diameter and set just beyond a circular opening of the same dimensions in the southerly wall of the drier, but neither guarded nor screened, respondent, who was in the rear of the truck shoving it, stooped to brace his shoulder and knee against the stack of trays, and in doing so extended his hand out behind him and into the blades of the revolving fan, and his hand was completely severed. Respondent admitted that while working in and about the drier he was fully aware of the location of the fan and that it was constantly in operation; that it made a noise while running and that he had passed in front of it twelve times on Friday and no less than six times on Monday before the accident happened; and besides, the revolving fan caused a constant draft through the drier room. His only explanation of the accident was that when he extended his hand behind him he did not realize how close he was to the fan.

[2-4] Whether a person entering the premises of another bears the legal status of an invitee or of a bare licensee depends upon the nature of the business which brings him on the premises, and before such person can be given the legal standing of an invitee it must appear that he entered the premises at the express or implied invitation of the owner or occupant thereof. If it be shown that his purpose in so entering was one of common interest or mutual benefit to the owner or occupant and himself, or was in connection with the former's business which was there being carried on, an invitation is implied. But if it be shown that he stood in no contractual relationship with the owner or occupant, and that he was there for purposes purely of his own or of a third party which had no relation whatever to the business of the owner or occupant, and in which the latter had no interest, beneficial or otherwise, he is deemed in law to be a bare licensee. Means v. Southern California Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 P. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206; Lindholm v. Northwestern Pacific R. Co., 79 Cal. App. 34, 248 P. 1033; Bush v. Weed Lumber Co., 63 Cal. App. 426, 218 P. 618; Herzog v. Hemphill, 7 Cal. App. 116, 93 P. 899; Grundel v. Union Iron Works, 141 Cal. 564, 75 P. 184; Coburn v. Village of Swanton, 94 Vt. 168, 109 A. 854; L. E. Meyers' Co. v. Logue's Adm'r, 212 Ky. 802, 280 S. W. 107; Walker v. Nona Mills Co., 151 La. 738, 92 So. 318; Forbrick v. General Electric Co., 45 Misc. Rep. 452, 92 N. Y. S. 36; 1 Thompson on Negligence, 156; 20 R. C. L. 69.

[5] The application of the foregoing legal principles to the situation in the case before us clearly demonstrates that it possesses none of the elements essential to establish respondent's status as an invitee, for admittedly he did not enter appellant's premises on any mission connected with appellant's business, nor in which the latter had any common interest; nor did he go there as a result of any enticement, allurement, or inducement, nor in response to any invitation, on appellant's part. On the contrary, he was there admittedly as the employee of a third party, and for the purpose of performing work in which the latter alone was interested. His status was therefore clearly that of a bare licensee, and as such he assumed all the ordinary risks and perils attached to the condition of the premises, and the manner in which the same or the business conducted thereon were maintained and operated. Under such circumstances there was no legal duty imposed upon appellant to keep its premises in a safe condition, the measure of its liability for injury to him being limited to a wanton or willful injury (Giannini v. Campodonico, 176 Cal. 548, 169 P. 80; Means v. Southern California Ry. Co., supra), and as stated no such injury is claimed or established. Nor does the fact that appellant granted respondent permission to come upon the premises affect respondent's status as a bare licensee, for it is well settled that mere permission of an owner to enter and use a portion of his premises does not of itself amount to an invitation (Herzog v. Hemphill, supra; 8 Thompson on Negligence, p. 144, § 949, notes 30 and 31; Briscoe v. Henderson Light Co., 148 N. C. 396, 62 S. E. 600, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1116; Coburn v. Village of Swanton, supra).

We have examined the authorities cited by respondent, but find no rule of law stated therein which is at variance with the views hereinabove expressed. Several of the cases cited deal merely with the rule of liability of an owner where the injured party is admittedly an invitee and not a bare licensee, and such is not this case. The others are cases wherein the question arose as to whether the injured party was an invitee or a licensee, but it will be found that in all of those cases wherein such party was held to be an invitee there was present at least one of the elements above mentioned which is essential to establish such status.

The conclusion we have reached upon the issue as to respondent's legal status at the time he was injured makes it unnecessary to discuss or determine the other points raised by the appeal.

The judgment is reversed.

MEDLEY v. HILL.
Civ. 84.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 4, 1930.

1. Limitation of actions § 57(1), 59(1)—Date of act fixes time for running of limitations against sheriff for negligence in performance of official duty (Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 2, and § 340, subd. 1).

In an action against a sheriff for negligence in performance of his official duty, it is the date of the act and fact which fixes the time for running of limitations under either Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 2, or section 340, subd. 1.

2. Limitation of actions § 57(1), 59(1)—Cause of action against sheriff for failure to give proper notice of sale accrued when notice was posted (Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 2, § 340, subd. 1, and §§ 692, 693).

In action against a sheriff to recover damages under Code Civ. Proc. § 693, for alleged negligence in failing to give proper notice of sale as required by section 692, in connection with sale of certain lots previously sold under writ of execution, cause of action accrued as respected limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 2, and section 340, subd. 1, at time notice of sale was posted, and, so far as purchaser was concerned, at time certificate of sale was issued, rather than at time of entry of decree in subsequent action to quiet title.

3. Limitation of actions ⚡95(1)—Failure to discover alleged negligence of sheriff until decree in quiet title action did not prevent running of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 2, § 340, subd. 1, and § 692).

Running of limitation under Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 2, and section 340, subd. 1, as to cause of action against sheriff for alleged negligence in failing to give proper notice of sale, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 692, was not prevented because of failure of purchaser to discover alleged negligence until after entry of decree in action to quiet title.

Action by N. C. Medley against R. L. Hill. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Shishmanian, of Exeter, for appellant.

J. A. Chase, of Visalia, for respondent.

BARNARD, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal, made and entered after a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint had been sustained, without leave to amend.

The action was one against the sheriff of the county of Tulare, seeking to recover certain damages, together with the statutory penalty provided for in section 693 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the alleged negligence of the defendant sheriff in failing to give proper notice of sale, as required by section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in connection with the sale of certain lots previously sold under a writ of execution and purchased by this plaintiff. The plaintiff alleges that he brought a quiet title action after purchasing the lots, in which a judgment was rendered declaring the description used by the sheriff, in the aforesaid notice of sale, to be wholly inadequate and insufficient to identify the lots, and adjudging that the plaintiff received no title under the sheriff's deed. It appears that the notice of the execution sale, containing the insufficient description, was posted on October 3, 1923; that the plaintiff bought in the real property and received a certificate of sale from the sheriff on October 29, 1923; that the plaintiff received a sheriff's deed to the property on October 29, 1924, and that a complaint to quiet the title to the property in question was filed by the plaintiff herein on December 3, 1924, and the judgment therein was rendered on December 2, 1925. The present action against the sheriff was commenced by the plaintiff on February 1, 1926. The demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend on the ground that the action was barred by the statute of limitations.

[1] An action against a sheriff upon a liability incurred by the doing of an act in his official capacity and in virtue of his office or by the omission of an official duty is barred in two years. Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 2. An action upon a statute for a penalty or forfeiture, when the action is given to an individual, is barred in one year. Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 1. In an action against a sheriff for negligence in the performance of his official duty, it is the date of the act and fact which fixes the time for the running of the statute of limitations. Lambert v. McKenzie, 135 Cal. 100, 67 P. 6. Appellant seeks to avoid the application of this rule to the facts in this case, by the argument that the statute of limitations commences to run only when a cause of action accrues, that there can be no cause of action until damage or injury has been incurred, and that the fact of injury to the plaintiff here, and the consequent liability of the sheriff, was first determined by the judgment in the quiet title action rendered on December 2, 1925. He therefore relies upon the general rule of law, as stated in 16 California Jurisprudence, at page 496: "But if a lawful act is committed which does not necessarily result in injury to another, the statute runs only from the time damage is actually sustained by reason of the act."

[2] Appellant is in error in assuming that the injury did not exist, nor the cause of action accrue, until the entry of the decree in the quiet title action. The entry of this decree did not create any injury or damage, or give rise to any cause of action. It did not take from the plaintiff something he previously had, but the decree was itself based upon the fact that the plaintiff had nothing from the beginning, and that he obtained nothing, in the way of title, when he received the sheriff's certificate of sale. The wrong or injury done by the sheriff, if any, occurred, not when the decree was entered in the quiet title action, but when the notice of sale was posted on October 3, 1923, and, so far as the plaintiff herein is concerned, when the certificate of sale was issued, on October 29, 1923.

[3] Nor can the appellant avail himself of the contention that he discovered the alleged negligence of the sheriff for the first time upon the entry of the decree in the quiet title action. In Lightner Mining Co. v. Lane,

161 Cal. 689, 120 P. 771, 774, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1093, the court says: "It was the settled rule in actions at law that the plaintiff's mere ignorance of the existence of the injury complained of, or of the facts constituting such injury, or of the identity of the person liable therefor, until the period of limitation had passed, will not prevent the running of the statute. This rule has been followed in this state in several cases in which the point that there was fraud involved in the cause of action itself, or a fraudulent concealment thereof, was not raised or considered. Gale v. McDaniel, 72 Cal. 334, 13 P. 871; People v. Melone, 73 Cal. 574, 15 P. 294; Paige v. Carroll, 61 Cal. 211; Lattin v. Gillette, 95 Cal. 317, 29 Am. St. Rep. 115, 30 P. 545; Lambert v. McKenzie, 135 Cal. 100, 67 P. 6. In the last-mentioned case the court said: 'It is not true that, where damages result from negligence, the cause of action arises upon the date of the discovery of the negligence, or of the negligent person. It is the date of the act and fact which fixes the time for the running of the statute. * * * And so throughout the law, except in cases of fraud, it is the time of the act, and not the time of the discovery, which sets the statute in motion.'

Having begun an action to quiet his title to the lots involved, on December 3, 1924, the attention of the plaintiff must have been called to the questionable nature of his title at least that early, and he had ample time thereafter, before the running of the statute, to have protected himself in any claim he had against the sheriff. In addition to the general rule of law, as above cited, he had actually been put upon his guard, and the fact that he preferred to rely upon his supposed legal rights, as being tested in the quiet title action, adds nothing to his position after such reliance turns out to have been unjustified.

If the rule contended for by appellant should be applied, the statute of limitations in such a case as this, would mean little, for such an action to quiet title might not be brought for many years. Statutes of limitation are positive rules of law, and they find their justification in reason and experience. The appellant herein had ample time after purchasing the property at the execution sale, and before the running of the statute, to ascertain the true status of the title to the property, and no reason appears why his position is, or should be, any better than that of any other person who has permitted the period of the statute to run.

The order sustaining the demurrer, without leave to amend, was correct, and the judgment is affirmed.

104 Cal. App. 385

McLAIN et al. v. SAME.

Civ. 3850, 3851.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 7, 1930.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1072—Permitting filing of points and authorities after 10 days from filing notice of intention to move for new trial held not prejudicial to defendants' substantial rights (Superior Court Rule 20, subd. 5).

Permitting plaintiffs moving for new trial after judgment for defendants to file points and authorities after expiration of ten days from filing notice of intention to move for new trial, contrary to Superior Court Rule 20, subd. 5, held not prejudicial to defendants' substantial rights, where trial court offered to afford defendants opportunity to file points and authorities in reply to those it permitted plaintiffs to file, and motion for new trial was fully presented and argued.

2. New trial $\S$ 70—Granting new trial in action for damages resulting from automobile accident held not abuse of discretion under evidence.

In action for personal injuries and for death resulting from automobile accident, granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict for defendants held not abuse of discretion under evidence showing that driver of defendant's automobile was negligent in operation thereof at time of accident, and that such negligence was proximate cause of injuries and death.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 979(2)—New trial $\S$ 71—Granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence is not abuse of discretion and not reviewable, where verdict is against weight of evidence, though conflicting.

Though there is a substantial conflict in evidence, trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion in granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict when it has determined that verdict is against weight of evidence, and that there should be new trial, and its order in that respect is conclusive on appeal in absence of abuse of discretion.

Appeals from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Separate actions by Bernedette E. Weinrich and by Mercedes E. McLain and another against the Sacramento Valley Sugar Company and another, consolidated and tried together. From an order granting plaintiffs' motions for new trial after judgment for defendants, the latter appeal.

Affirmed.

Len H. Honey, of Stockton, and J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. W. McGowan and R. M. Rankin, both of Willows, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

These two cases were actions for damages for injuries inflicted upon respondent, Bernedette E. Weinrich, in case No. 3850, and for damages for the death of the mother of respondents Mercedes E. McLain and Bernedette E. Weinrich in case No. 3851, both caused by the alleged negligence of appellant A. M. Gelston in the operation of an automobile, the said Gelston, at the time of said accident, being an employee of appellant Sacramento Valley Sugar Company and engaged in the performance of his duties as such employee. The two cases were consolidated and tried together. They were tried by a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the appellants, and judgment was thereupon rendered in their favor. Respondents thereupon filed a motion for a new trial, which motion was by the court granted, and, from the order granting the same, appellants have appealed.

[1] In their briefs filed in these cases appellants rely for reversal upon the ground alone that the trial court has lost jurisdiction to hear and pass upon the said motion for a new trial. Appellants base their contention upon the failure of respondent to comply with the requirements of rule XX, subdivision 5, of the rules promulgated by the Judicial Council, as said rule stood from August 1, 1928, to February 1, 1929, at which said last-named date the said rule was amended.

This rule, as it stood before said amendment, was as follows: "Within ten days after a notice of intention to move for a new trial shall have been filed, the party seeking the new trial shall serve and file a memorandum of points and authorities relied upon, and within ten days thereafter the adverse party shall serve and file a corresponding memorandum in reply thereto. Said motion for a new trial shall be set for hearing not later than fifty days after service of notice of the entry of said judgment."

The notice of intention to move for a new trial in these cases was filed on November 14, 1928, and the said motion came on for hearing before the court on December 3, 1928. No memorandum of the points and authorities relied upon by respondents had, up to said last-named date, been filed by them as required by said rule. At the said hearing on December 3, 1928, respondents asked permission of the court to file the said points and authorities, and, over the objection of appellants that the court had lost jurisdiction to proceed with the hearing of said motion, it permitted this to be done. Arguments were then had on said motion, defendants reserving their said objection to said hearing, and on December 17, 1928, the court made its order granting said motion.

We are of the opinion that the recent cases of Bellew v. Bellew (Cal. Sup.) 276 P. 573, 574, and Melvin v. Carl, Executrix, etc. (Cal. Sup.)

276 P. 574, have settled the question involved here adversely to appellants' contention. In the first of these cases, in passing upon the effect of noncompliance with the requirement of subdivision 5 of rule XX, that points and authorities had not been filed within ten days after filing notice of intention to move for a new trial, the court said: "We think the existence of the rule and noncompliance with the requirement thereof, as shown, did not have the effect contended for by respondent. Under the rule in force at the time no penalty was prescribed for its violation and its provisions must be deemed to have been directory only. As amended (rule 19, subd. 4, effective February 1, 1929), the rule provides as a penalty for its violation an abandonment by implication of the right to argue the motion."

In the latter of the two cases hereinbefore cited, the Supreme Court in effect again declared that the requirements of section XX, subd. 5, were not mandatory, but directory only.

The trial court offered to afford appellants time and opportunity to file points and authorities in reply to those it permitted respondents to file, and, while it does not appear that appellants took advantage of this offer, yet it does appear, from the order of the court granting the motion, that on December 3, 1928, the said motion was fully presented and argued. Under these circumstances we fail to see wherein any of the substantial rights of the appellants were affected or prejudiced by the action of the trial court in permitting the points and authorities of respondents to be filed after the expiration of the ten days following the notice of intention to move for new trials.

Respondents' motion for new trials was made upon four of the statutory grounds, including insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and in its order granting the same the court gives as one of its reasons for so doing insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury.

[2] An examination of the evidence set forth in the transcript discloses a conflict in the evidence, and will also show that there is substantial evidence to support the allegations of the complaint in each of said cases, to the effect that appellant Gelston was negligent in the operation of the automobile at the time of the accident that inflicted the alleged injuries upon respondent Weinrich and caused the death of respondents' mother; that such negligence was the proximate cause of such injuries and death and that respondents were thereby damaged.

Such being the case, this court cannot say that there was any abuse of discretion by the trial court in granting said motion.

[3] It is the well-settled rule that, even though there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion when it has determined that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, and that there should be a new trial; and its order in that respect is conclusive on appeal, in the absence of abuse of discretion. Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 506, 123 P. 288; Taylor v. Volfi, 86 Cal. App. 244, 260 P. 927; Beckley v. Harris, 84 Cal. App. 557, 258 P. 428.

The order is affirmed.

Civ. 5726.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.
March 4, 1930.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 935(2)—Appellate court, on plaintiff's appeal from order setting aside default, must assume trial court believed defendants' statement of facts.

On plaintiff's appeal from order setting aside a default and judgment, appellate court must assume that trial court believed statement of facts as made by defendants' attorney.

2. Judgment $\S$ 143(17)—Under circumstances leading defendants' attorney to believe litigation would rest pending settlement conference, delay in filing demurrer after service held excusable, warranting setting aside default.

Where, at time demurrer to complaint was served on January 22, plaintiff's attorney suggested that whole controversy be adjusted out of court, and defendants' attorney agreed to interview his clients following week when he finished jury trial, leading defendants' attorney to believe pending litigation would rest without further proceedings, awaiting outcome of settlement conference, delay in filing demurrer until February 1 held excusable, warranting setting aside of default taken on January 28 and consequent judgment.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order of the superior court setting aside a default and judgment.

On January 22, 1927, the attorney for respondents served upon the attorney for appellant a demurrer to the complaint, but did not attempt to file the same until the 2d day of February. Default was taken January 28, 1927, and judgment thereon was obtained on February 1, 1927. The affidavit of the attorney for respondents, in support of the motion to set aside the default and judgment, states, among other things, that at the time the demurrer was served the attorney for appellant suggested that the whole controversy (this case and other matters) between the parties should be adjusted out of court, and requested him to interview his clients to see if the matter could be settled to avoid litigation; that he stated he would do so, but that he had a jury trial set on the following Thursday, which would occupy him all of the following week, but as soon as that was over he would be glad to see if the matter could be settled without further litigation. The counteraffidavit of attorney for appellant denied some of said statements. In the reply affidavit of the attorney for respondents he admitted that it was not agreed in so many words that the demurrer would not be filed, but insisted that they did agree that affiant was to take up the matter with his clients and endeavor to settle the matter in dispute, and that he understood and believed in good faith that pending litigation would rest without further proceedings, awaiting the outcome of such settlement conference.

[1, 2] In view of the order granting the motion to set aside the default, it must be assumed that the court believed the statement of facts as made by the attorney for respondents. This being so, the court was justified in deciding that the delay in the matter of filing the demurrer was excusable. Waybright v. Anderson, 200 Cal. 374, 253 P. 148.

The motion to set aside the default and judgment was accompanied by a sufficient affidavit of merits.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY.*

Civ. 7235.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 27, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 29, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 28, 1930.

1. Taxation $\S$ 80—Leasehold interest is assessable as personalty (Pol. Code, $\S$ 3820).

In state of California, a leasehold interest in real estate is assessable as personal property under Pol. Code, $\S$ 3820.

2. Taxation $\S$ 247—Usufructuary interest alone is subject to tax when land leased is owned by state or municipality.

When there is lease of land owned by state or municipality, reversion is exempt from taxation, and the usufructuary interest alone is subject to tax in proportion to its value.

3. Taxation $\S$ 80—Absent agreement to contrary, tax of usufructuary interest falls on lessee when land leased is owned by state or municipality.

When land leased is owned by state or municipality, the tax of the usufructuary interest falls on lessee, in absence of agreement to contrary; the reversion being exempt from taxation.

4. Taxation $\S$ 535—That assessment is in excess of property's value is not evidence of fraud, hence overvaluations honestly made are not grounds for refund.

Mere fact that assessment not discriminatory or inequitable on its face is in excess of fair value of property assessed is not in itself evidence of fraud, hence mistakes or overvaluations honestly made are not grounds for refund of protested charge.

5. Taxation $\S$ 347—To invalidate tax assessment, there must be conscious failure to exercise impartial judgment or resort to arbitrary assessments.

There must be conscious failure to exercise fair and impartial judgment, or resort to arbitrary methods varying from those employed in assessing other property of like character and situation and resulting in imposition designedly of an unequal burden on property, to invalidate tax assessment.

6. Taxation $\S$ 490—Decision of equalization board, made after due hearing and within limits of reasonable discretion, is final and conclusive on question of reasonableness of assessment.

In case taxpayer feels aggrieved by reason of assessor's valuation, taxpayer must first apply to county board of equalization for relief, and decision of board made after due hearing and within limits of reasonable discretion is final and conclusive.

7. Taxation $\S$ 453—When assessment is not wholly void taxpayer must first apply for relief to equalization board.

In case taxpayer feels aggrieved by reason of assessor's valuation, if assessment is not wholly void taxpayer must first apply for relief to board of equalization.

8. Taxation $\S$ 490—Decision of equalization board will not be rejected on review by court, unless there is proof of actual fraud or such arbitrary action as to amount to constructive fraud.

Decision of board of equalization is an independent and conclusive judgment which abrogates and takes place of judgment of the assessor, and even though there be mistake or error, decision of board will not be rejected on review by court unless there is proof of actual fraud or such arbitrary, unreasonable, or grossly oppressive action in willful disregard of law as amounts to constructive fraud.

9. Taxation $\S$ 543(1)—Function of trial court in reviewing decision of equalization board was to determine whether correct method of valuing property was pursued or whether evidence before board justified assessment made.

In action to recover tax paid in effect proceeding to review decision of county board of equalization as to excessiveness of assessment, function of trial court was to determine whether correct method of valuing lessee's usufructuary interest was pursued and whether there was substantial evidence before board in justification of assessment made.

10. Taxation $\S$ 347—Assessor must exercise prudent discretion in reaching conclusions as to valuation of property.

There is no rigid rule for valuation of property by an assessor, but it is his duty to exercise prudent judgment in reaching conclusions after considering all circumstances and various factors influencing value.

11. Taxation Ⓒ350—In determining value of lease, assessor should consider nature of estate granted, its duration, and profits arising therefrom.

Assessor, in determining value of lease for taxation, should give due consideration to nature of estate granted, its duration, and profits arising from use of leased property.

12. Taxation Ⓒ490—Weight and value of evidence in proceedings for reduction of tax assessment held for equalization board.

In proceedings before county board of equalization for reduction of tax assessment, it was for board to judge weight and value of evidence.

13. Taxation Ⓒ543(7)—Evidence held to support finding that leasehold interest was not assessed improperly or in excess of its cash value.

In action to recover tax paid in effect proceedings to review decision of board of equalization as to equality of tax assessment, evidence supported finding that taxpayer's leasehold interest was not assessed improperly or in excess of its cash value.

14. Taxation Ⓒ543(7)—Burden was on taxpayer to prove that his leasehold interest was assessed improperly or in excess of its cash value.

In action to recover tax paid in effect proceedings before county board of equalization for reduction of assessment, burden was on taxpayer seeking reduction to show that his leasehold interest was improperly assessed and assessed in excess of its cash value.

15. Taxation Ⓒ490—Decision of board of equalization could not be collaterally attacked by new evidence in different tribunal.

In action to recover tax paid in effect proceedings to review decision of county board of equalization as to whether taxpayer's leasehold interest was improperly assessed or assessed in excess of its cash value, decision of board of equalization on evidence adduced before it could not be collaterally assailed by new evidence in different tribunal.

16. Taxation Ⓒ40(8)—Assessment of leasehold estate in exempt property is not discriminatory because similar estates in unexempt property are not separately assessed.

Fact that leasehold estates in property not exempt from taxation are not separately assessed does not make assessment on leasehold estate in property exempt from taxation discriminatory.

17. Taxation Ⓒ543(7)—Charge of willful disregard of law by equalization board, or intentional imposition of unequal taxation, held without basis, where there was no showing of discrimination at hearing before board.

Where there had been no showing of discrimination at hearing before county board of equalization for reduction of assessment, there was no basis for charge of willful disregard of law by board or of intentional or conscious imposition of unfair or unequal burden of taxation.

18. Taxation Ⓒ247—Taxpayer would not be exempt from paying taxes on proper assessment of his leasehold in exempt property, even if other property of like character escaped taxation.

That other property of like character escaped taxation would not release the taxpayer from paying a tax on his leasehold interest in land owned by municipality which was free from taxation, where tax on leasehold was based on proper assessment.

19. Evidence Ⓒ571(7)—Expert witness' testimony in proceedings to review decision of equalization board held entitled to credit, though gained from inadmissible sources, because of added sanction of expert's general experience.

In action to recover tax paid in effect proceedings to review decision of county board of equalization as to excessive assessment of property, where it appeared that witness had wide experience in real estate transactions, he being an expert his testimony, though based on knowledge gained from inadmissible sources, held entitled to credit because of added sanction of his general experience.

20. Constitutional law Ⓒ284(1)—Where taxpayer's property was assessed by approved method and assessment was approved by equalization board and reviewed by court, taxpayer held not deprived of property without due process.

When taxpayer's leasehold interest in land owned by municipality was assessable under laws of state and assessor followed approved method of valuation in making assessment which after ample hearing was confirmed by the board of equalization, and taxpayer further invoked revisory powers of courts of justice, taxpayer held not to have been deprived of his property in contravention of United States Constitution without due process of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by the Hammond Lumber Company against the County of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and W. Sumner Holbrook, Jr., Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JOHNSON, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff has appealed from a judgment in favor of defendant in this action brought to recover the amount of a tax levied on plaintiff's possessory interest as a tenant of real property and paid under protest.

Since May, 1923, the plaintiff has been in possession of certain harbor lands comprising about 25 acres, with a water frontage of about 2,500 feet, owned by the city of Los Angeles and rented by the city to plaintiff for use in plaintiff's lumber business under a permit in the nature of a lease running to June 3, 1951, the annual rental until June 3, 1931, being $8,060.88, payable in quarterly installments, and for succeeding decennial periods to be fixed either by the parties themselves or by arbitration.

In the year 1924 the county assessor assessed plaintiff's possessory interest in the land, apart from plaintiff's improvements, at $234,150, and plaintiff was required to pay as the tax on its possessory interest the sum of $8,780.62, based on the rate for the year 1923. Of this amount $374.64 was returned to plaintiff after a lower tax rate had been fixed for the year 1924.

Plaintiff paid the tax under protest, and thereafter in the month of July, 1924, applied to the board of supervisors, sitting as the county board of equalization, for a reduction of the assessment, on the ground that the possessory interest had been grossly overvalued and that the assessment and tax were discriminatory and inequitable. After hearing all the evidence which was offered, the board denied the application.

Thereafter, on January 7, 1925, plaintiff instituted this action, alleging that the rent designated in the permit was the full rental value of the premises and that the assessment on plaintiff's possessory interest was made, with clear knowledge and intent, grossly in excess of its full cash value and really equalled the value of the fee. The plaintiff averred further that it had presented the facts to the board of equalization, but that board, in disregard of the evidence adduced, had arbitrarily and willfully denied the application, and had intentionally imposed on plaintiff such an unfair and unequal burden of taxation as to amount to constructive fraud.

Upon the trial of the case the court, after hearing the evidence, made its written decision and its judgment in favor of defendant, finding among other things that the rent reserved was not the full reasonable rental value of the lands; that the assessment was not fixed at an amount representing the value of the fee, and was not in excess of the cash value of plaintiff's interest; that the valuation was not made in furtherance of any scheme to impose an excessive tax, or to place an unequal burden on plaintiff, nor was the assessment or tax discriminatory; and that the action of the board of equalization in refusing to reduce the assessment was not arbitrary, oppressive, or capricious, and did not constitute constructive fraud.

The plaintiff contends on this appeal that the evidence does make out a case of constructive fraud under the rules declared in Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 121 P. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277; Southern Pacific Land Co. v. County of San Diego, 183 Cal. 543, 191 P. 931; and Mahoney v. City of San Diego, 198 Cal. 388, 245 P. 189.

[1-3] A leasehold interest is in this state assessable as personal property under section 3820 of the Political Code. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 18, 179 P. 393. When land held in private ownership is leased, both the leasehold and the reversionary interest are ordinarily assessed together to the owner; the value of the lessee's estate being treated as a constituent of the valuation of the larger interest belonging to the owner of the freehold. Instead of splitting the interests, it operates fairly as a rule to make a single assessment against the lessor as the beneficial owner not only of the freehold, but also of all lesser estates, and the incidence of the tax then becomes a matter of agreement between the lessor and the lessee. Usually in the case of short leases the lessor pays the entire tax, and with such charge in view he fixes his rent accordingly. Graciosa Oil Co. v. County of Santa Barbara, 155 Cal. 140, 143, 144, 99 P. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211. When, however, there is a lease of land owned by the state or a municipality, the reversion being exempt from taxation, the usufructuary interest alone is subject to tax in proportion to its value; and in the absence of agreement to the contrary, the tax necessarily falls upon the lessee. While the instrument executed between the plaintiff and the city of Los Angeles is denominated a "permit," it is not, as plaintiff asserts, a mere license. It grants to plaintiff for a fixed period the right to the exclusive use of the premises on prescribed terms. It embodies an agreement having all of the characteristics and qualities of a lease, and entitles plaintiff to the exclusive control and enjoyment of the premises for the full term specified, subject only to fulfillment of the terms and conditions expressed. On the termination of the tenancy, improvements constructed by the occupant are to become the property of the city, but so long as plaintiff complies with its covenants, plaintiff remains secure in its possession throughout the agreed term.

[4, 5] The plaintiff took this grant of the exclusive possessory right in the lands, charged with knowledge that the interest so acquired would be subject to taxation under the laws of the state. The mere fact that an assessment, not discriminatory or inequitable on its face, is in excess of the fair value of the property assessed, is not in itself evidence of fraud. Hence mistakes or overvaluations honestly made are not grounds for refund of a protested charge. To invalidate the assessment there must be a conscious failure to exercise a fair and impartial judgment, or a resort to arbitrary methods varying from those employed in assessing other property of like character and situation, and resulting in the imposition designedly of an unequal burden on the property of the complainant. Los Angeles G. & E. Corp. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 166, 121 P. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277; Miller & Lux v. Richardson, 182 Cal. 115, 128, 187 P. 411; Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. Richardson, 186 Cal. 70, 72, 198 P. 1034; Pierce v. County of Santa Barbara, 40 Cal. App. 302, 305, 180 P. 641; Birch v. County of Orange, 50 Cal. App. 134, 136, 210 P. 57; Wild Goose Country Club v. County of Butte, 60 Cal. App. 339, 342, 212 P. 711; Ambassador Hotel Corporation v. Los Angeles County (Cal. App.) 270 P. 726.

[6, 7] In case a taxpayer feels aggrieved by reason of the assessor's valuation, the law provides for a determination of the facts by a tribunal sitting as a county board of equalization. When the assessment is not wholly void, it is to this tribunal that the taxpayer must first apply for relief, and the decision of the board, made after due hearing and within the limits of reasonable discretion, is final and conclusive. La Grange Co. v. Carter, 142 Cal. 560, 565, 76 P. 241; California Domestic Water Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 10 Cal. App. 185, 191, 101 P. 547; Pierce v. County of Santa Barbara, 40 Cal. App. 302, 304, 180 P. 641; Globe G. & M. Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 62 Cal. App. 297, 299, 216 P. 631.

[8] The decision of the board constitutes an independent and conclusive judgment which abrogates and takes the place of the judgment of the assessor, and even though there be mistake or error, the decision of the board will not be rejected upon review by the court, unless there is proof of actual fraud, or such arbitrary, unreasonable, or grossly oppressive action, in willful disregard of the law, as amounts to constructive fraud. Los Angeles G. & E. Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 170-172, 121 P. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277; Southern Pacific Land Co. v. County of San Diego, 183 Cal. 543, 546, 191 P. 931; Wores v. Imperial Irr. Dist., 193 Cal. 609, 627-629, 227 P. 181; Birch v. County of Orange, 186 Cal. 736, 741, 742, 200 P. 647; Mahoney v. City of San Diego, 198 Cal. 388, 397, 245 P. 189.

[9] Plaintiff followed the requisite procedure in applying to the board of equalization for reduction of the assessor's valuation, but met with no success. No charge is made of any actual fraud or malicious abuse of power on the part of either the assessor or the board of equalization, but it is earnestly contended that the assessment is so grossly excessive and discriminatory as constructively to constitute fraud. The assessment not being wholly void, this action, though cast in the form of an action to recover a tax paid under protest, is properly a proceeding to review the decision of the board of equalization. The function of the trial court, therefore, was to determine whether a correct method of valuing the usufructuary interest was pursued, and whether there was substantial evidence before the board in justification of the assessment made. The plaintiff was represented at the hearing before the board by its attorney and by its general manager, Mr. McLeod, together with its real estate appraiser, C. S. Anderson. The interest of the county was represented by the assessor, E. W. Hopkins, and his deputy, S. R. McClay. Mr. Anderson and Mr. McLeod insisted that the possessory interest had no value in excess of the rent reserved, and that the assessor's valuation was equivalent to the full value of the land to the city. After these witnesses had been heard, Mr. McClay gave his testimony as to the method used by the assessor in making his assessment. The method was that known as the capitalization method. The deputy assessor stated that in arriving at the value of the leasehold interest, the land itself was first taken at a valuation of $13,000 per acre, which corresponded with the value of surrounding property; then the annual average rent per acre, representing the income from the investment, was capitalized on the basis of an annual interest return of 6 per cent., and the difference between the value of the land and the capitalized rent charge or income represented the average value of the possessory interest per acre. This value was then multiplied by the number of acres, and in accordance with the usual practice in assessing property in general, one-half of the amount so arrived at was adopted as the assessed valuation of the leasehold interest.

It appeared also from McClay's testimony that, under a new schedule of rents adopted by the city, leases of similar lands had been made subsequent to plaintiff's lease at much higher rentals.

The assessor admitted that it was not his practice to assess leasehold interests separately when the land itself was subject to taxation, but with regard to other harbor leases made by the city it appeared that they were dealt with in the same manner as plaintiff's lease.

After hearing all the evidence presented, the board refused to make any change in plaintiff's assessment.

The proceedings before the board were rather informal in character, and the plaintiff had, and exercised, full freedom in questioning the witnesses and commenting on their testimony as it was given. No complaint can justly be made of any arbitrary or malicious abuse of power. If the capitalization method is a reasonably fair and accurate method of appraising the value of a leasehold interest, it is apparent that the determination of the board of equalization, as the sole judge of the facts, must be accepted as controlling. Miller & Lux v. Richardson, 182

Cal. 115, 128, 187 P. 411; Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. Richardson, 186 Cal. 70, 72, 198 P. 1034. Hence the question before the trial court was not whether, through some miscalculation, mistake, or oversight, there had been an erroneous valuation, but whether the method pursued had resulted in an overcharge so disproportionate and exorbitant as to produce an illegal assessment and tax.

At the trial the evidence was not limited strictly to this question, and, over the objection of defendant, much opinion evidence was received on behalf of plaintiff as to the fair market value of the lease. The plaintiff called as witnesses a number of real estate brokers, some of whom specialized in leases of industrial sites, but without having had actual experience with water-front properties. These witnesses in general expressed the opinion, voiced by plaintiff's witnesses before the board of equalization, that the rent payable was the full market value of the use and in consequence the lease had no saleable or "bonus" value. One of plaintiff's witnesses, however, W. H. Daum, when asked by the trial judge how he figured the value of a lease, indicated that the capitalization method should be followed. "The value of a lease to my opinion," he said, "can be arrived at only in one way. All of the costs of occupancy to a tenant must be carefully set down on one side of the ledger, the value of that occupancy on the other side of the ledger, and inasmuch as the value of occupancy exceeds the cost of occupancy can we capitalize it; a reasonable sum of all the various conditions of occupancy being taken into consideration, that sum capitalized being the difference between the two.

"Q. What do you mean by 'capitalize'?"
A. Capitalizing at a reasonable percentage in return that is justified by the uses which may be made in the particular business occupancy under consideration."

The witness then went on to say that he attached no "bonus value" to this particular lease, because it limited the use of the land to the purposes of a lumber business instead of extending a privilege for any sort of commercial use.

In support and explanation of the rule applied in the valuation of leasehold interests, the county relied upon the testimony of Milton W. Moore, who became a deputy county assessor in 1925, and began to give his attention to the harbor district in 1926. Between 1903 and 1915 he had acted as right of way and tax agent for railroad companies, some of which had water-front properties in Tacoma, Seattle, and Vancouver. And in 1915 he had entered the service of the interstate commerce commission as senior land appraiser, with duties which had required appraisal of water-front properties in Oakland and elsewhere. He had had practical experience also as a real estate broker, both in Southern and Northern California. His testimony showed that for several months he had given close study to the valuation of the harbor properties of the city of Los Angeles and the leases thereof, as well as other leasehold interests throughout the county. This witness fixed the value of the leasehold interest of plaintiff for purpose of assessment on the first Monday of March, 1924, at $204,650, taking into consideration the limitation of use to plaintiff's lumber business. He described his method of procedure in detail, stating that he first determined what he called a base value representing the present worth of a right in perpetuity to the lands, subject to the privileges and limitations of the lease. He then calculated the annual return that an owner might reasonably expect from property so valued at the rate of 7 per cent., and the difference between such amount and the annual rent represented the annual benefit or saving to the lessee. To ascertain, however, the savings or bonus value on the first Monday of March, 1924, the savings of future years had to be reduced to present worth. So by a process which need not be followed here with particularity, the witness figured the full market value of the leasehold interest at $409,313, one-half of which amount, or roughly $204,650, was taken as the "full cash value" for taxation purposes. The witness in his testimony thus demonstrated the application of the capitalization method, which in Birch v. County of Orange, 59 Cal. App. 133, 138, 139, 210 P. 57, was pronounced to be a fair and reasonable method of valuing a beneficial interest. See, also, Graciosa Oil Co. v. County of Santa Barbara, 155 Cal. 140, 143, 144, 99 P. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211.

In McMichael's "Long and Short Term Leaseholds" it is said (2d Ed., pp. 90, 91): "A property, whether held in fee simple or as a leasehold, is usually worth what it will earn, the net amount of earnings being capitalized at the rate of interest prevailing at the time and place the lease is appraised. That percentage is usually six, but fluctuates up and down, according to the price of money, and other market conditions, such as the demand for that particular type of investment. * * * The value of the lease is the difference between burdens and benefits. The burden of rental is known and the burden as to taxes may be approximated. * * * Strictly speaking, to get at the value of a lease involves striking a balance of theoretical receipts and expenses for each present and prospective year of the lease and taking the present worth of future profits."

Again, Zangerle, inheritance tax appraiser of Ohio for the opulent county of Cuyahoga, in his "Principles of Real Estate Appraising," says (p. 31): "Short term leases such as 20, 30, 40 or 50 years must be appraised on the present worth of an annuity." This is supplemented by the following statement, at page 150: "In other words, the present worth at 6 per cent of an accumulating dollar for a given number of years multiplied by the annual rental gives the full present worth value of the usual lease for a short and definite time." And in chapter 23 on Appraisal of Leasehold Estates, he says further (p. 148): "In a number of cities, as in Cleveland, on the main thoroughfares, few outright sales have taken place during the last ten years. An assessor determining the general property tax, as well as the appraiser for investment purposes, is compelled to obtain his evidence of capital value through a capitalization of land rentals under long-time leases. More and more the inheritance tax appraiser is called upon to appraise the interest of lessor, lessee, sublessee, fees subject to leases, and the like." The books from which we have quoted are standard reference books approved and indorsed by the National Association of Real Estate Boards, and they contain examples of the manner in which various kinds of leaseholds are valued by use of the capitalization method. Since that method is employed in appraising the values of leases in the business world and in determining inheritance taxes, no good reason suggests itself against the adoption of the same rule of procedure, with due regard to other appropriate factors, as a lawful means of arriving at the assessable value of a lessee's possessory interest under the general tax laws of the state.

[10, 11] There is no rigid rule for the valuation of property by an assessor. Different minds may be expected to differ honestly in their judgments. But after considering all the circumstances and the various factors influencing value, it is the assessor's duty to exercise a prudent discretion in reaching conclusions. New Orleans Cotton Exchange v. Board of Assessors, 37 La. Ann. 423, 426. And in determining the value of a lease, due consideration should be given to the nature of the estate granted, its duration, and the profits arising from the use of the demised property. People v. Feitner, 61 App. Div. 129, 70 N. Y. S. 500, 502, affirmed in Memo. 171 N. Y. 641, 63 N. E. 786.

[12, 13] While the opinions of plaintiff's witnesses expressed in their statements to the board of equalization were competent evidence, such evidence was in no sense conclusive, and it was for the board to judge of the weight and value of the evidence on both sides. The board determined that the method pursued by the assessor was a correct method, and that his assessment was a fair and just valuation for purposes of taxation. The evidence before the trial court tends to confirm the judgment of the board, and supports the court's finding that plaintiff's interest was not assessed improperly, or in excess of its cash value, but only in proportion to the value of the possessory right.

[14, 15] The valuation placed on the plaintiff's interest at the trial by the witness Moore was somewhat lower than the amount of the assessment complained of, due mainly to the fact that the witness took into consideration certain additional charges of $1,500 per year that would fall upon the plaintiff partly in 1926 and partly in 1930 for certain wharf franchises. No mention of these future charges was made before the board of equalization; and hence the omission to give consideration to that factor at that time casts no imputation upon the decision of the board. In the proceeding before the board the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, and the decision of the board upon the evidence adduced cannot be collaterally assailed by new evidence on the point in a different tribunal. Wild Goose Country Club v. County of Butte, 60 Cal. App. 339, 341, 212 P. 711.

[16-18] What has just been said applies with equal force to the contention that there was such gross inequality and arbitrary discrimination as to invalidate the assessment. At the hearing before the board it was admitted by the assessor that leasehold interests in land held in private ownership were not separately assessed, a single assessment in such case being made of the freehold with all lesser interests. There was, however, no evidence of any omission to assess separately possessory interests in other property exempt from taxation, and an assessment upon a leasehold estate in exempt property is not discriminatory because similar estates in unexempt property are not separately assessed. Chicago v. University of Chicago, 302 Ill. 455, 461, 134 N. E. 723, 23 A. L. R. 244; Trimble v. City of Seattle, 231 U. S. 683, 34 S. Ct. 218, 58 L. Ed. 435. At the trial the assessor was asked whether in the year 1924 he had assessed the possessory interests of tenants in lands of the municipality other than harbor lands, and he stated that he had assessed all such possessory interests of which he had any knowledge. There was no countervailing evidence, though some unsubstantiated assertions were made by plaintiff's attorney. And there having been no showing of discrimination at the hearing before the board of equalization, there is of course no basis for any charge of willful disregard of the law by the board or of the intentional or conscious imposition of any unfair or unequal burden of taxation. Even if other property of like character escaped taxation, such circumstance would not relieve plaintiff from paying a tax based on a proper assessment of its property. City of Los Angeles v. Western Union Tel. Co., 161 Cal. 204, 207, 118 P. 720.

[19] Regarding the evidence given at the trial by the witness Moore, over the objection of plaintiff, it is insisted by plaintiff that Moore lacked competence to testify as an expert concerning the value of harbor lands, upon the ground that his connection with the assessor's office did not begin until October, 1925, and that the data which he had gathered consisted of information derived from hearsay sources. The witness, who was shown to have had a wide experience in real estate transactions, described in much detail the investigations he had made in gathering his statistics relative to the Los Angeles harbor lands, and it is well settled that testimony as to market values is not incompetent because derived from published reports or from information acquired through others. The expert's testimony, though based on knowledge gained from inadmissible sources, is entitled to credit because of the added sanction of his general experience. Betts v. Southern California Fruit Exchange, 144 Cal. 402, 409, 77 P. 993; People v. Marblehead Land Co., 82 Cal. App. 289, 303, 255 P. 553; Fishel v. Ball & Co., 83 Cal. App. 128, 134, 256 P. 493; Glantz v. Freedman (Cal. App.) 280 P. 704.

[20] In the complaint plaintiff averred that the assessment and tax were in contravention of the federal Constitution, and that plaintiff was deprived of its property without due process of law. The leasehold interest being assessable under the laws of the state, and the assessor having followed an approved method of valuation which, after ample hearing, was confirmed by a tribunal duly constituted by law, and the plaintiff having further invoked the revisory powers of the courts of justice, plaintiff has had its full day in court and has in no way suffered in any of its constitutional rights. In Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 104, 24 L. Ed. 616, it is said: "That whenever by the laws of a State, or by State authority, a tax, assessment, servitude, or other burden is imposed upon property for the public use, whether it be for the whole State or of some more limited portion of the community, and those laws provide for a mode of confirming or contesting the charge thus imposed, in the ordinary courts of justice, with such notice to the person, or such proceeding in regard to the property as is appropriate to the nature of the case, the judgment in such proceedings cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, however obnoxious it may be to other objections."

This is not a suit in equity to enjoin collection of an excessive or illegal tax. And in the federal courts the rule is firmly established that when an action at law is brought to recover a tax, not wholly void, which was paid under protest, the determination of a quasi-judicial body, such as a board of equalization acting within its jurisdiction, operates as a conclusive judgment. Even if such judgment is erroneous, the taxpayer, having had his hearing, can no more recover the amount paid thereunder than if it were money collected under an erroneous judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. Balfour v. City of Portland (C. C.) 28 F. 738, 739; Stanley v. Albany County, 121 U. S. 535, 550, 7 S. Ct. 1234, 30 L. Ed. 1000; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Missouri, 190 U. S. 412, 426, 23 S. Ct. 730, 47 L. Ed. 1116.

There is nothing in the evidence presented to the trial court indicating an arbitrary, discriminatory, or fraudulent assessment on the part of the board of equalization, and the findings in favor of the fairness, correctness, and validity of the assessment have ample support.

The judgment is affirmed.

JOHNSON v. JOHNSON. ★
Civ. 272.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

March 3, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 31, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 28, 1930.

1. Divorce ⇨282—Objection that husband was in contempt of court at time of hearing, on motion to modify decree regarding alimony, could not be urged for first time on appeal.

Where wife did not make objection in trial court at hearing on motion to modify divorce decree, in so far as it provided for payment of alimony, that husband was in contempt of court at time of hearing on motion, such objection could not be urged for first time on appeal.

2. Divorce ⇨245(3)—Husband's motion thirty-three days after discharge from his position, for modification of decree as respects alimony, held not premature.

Where interlocutory decree of divorce decreed that husband pay wife for alimony $100 per month, and up to June 12, 1928, husband was earning salary of $550 a month, and on this date was discharged without any fault on his part, motion filed July 13, 1928, thirty-three days thereafter, while his total income was less than $9 per month and before he had secured another position, for modification of decree, as respects payment of alimony, was not made prematurely, but fact that husband was very prompt in seeking relief from his obligation to support wife merely constituted one of facts to be weighed and considered in deciding controversy.

3. Divorce ⚭286—Appellate court must presume decree, allowing wife support money, was regular and supported by evidence.

In support of decree in superior court in divorce suit allowing support money, there was presumption that judgment was regular and was supported by proper evidence.

4. Divorce ⚭245(1)—Award of alimony to erring wife, if based upon contract as part of settlement of property rights, could not be modified but, if not based on contract, it was unauthorized (Civ. Code, §§ 136, 139, 158).

Where decree of divorce was given to innocent husband, and he was directed to pay $100 per month to wife, if award of $100 per month was based upon contract authorized by Civ. Code, § 158, as part of settlement of property rights of parties, court had no authority to modify it, but if it was not supported by contract, it was not authorized under sections 136, 139, and it did not have sanction of law.

5. Divorce ⚭245(3)—Burden of proof rested on husband moving for modification of divorce decree, as respects alimony.

Where husband moved for modification of decree of divorce, in so far as it provided for payment of alimony, burden of proof rested on husband as moving party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Divorce action by W. P. Johnson against Clara C. Johnson. Plaintiff was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce, and on plaintiff's motion the decree was modified in so far as it provided for payment of alimony, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Strother P. Walton, of Fresno, for appellant.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts, Dan F. Conway, and C. L. Clark, all of Fresno, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

On March 14, 1928, respondent was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce from appellant, which provided in part as follows:

"And it further appearing to the court that the parties hereto have mutually effected a settlement of their property rights wherein and whereby the defendant herein was given the sum of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars in cash as and for a complete settlement and adjustment of her community interest and interests held in joint tenancy between the parties and the defendant having made, executed and delivered to plaintiff deeds to all real property held in joint tenancy between parties hereto or held as community property and having delivered to plaintiff a bill of sale of all furniture and personal property belonging to the parties hereto, save and except a certain bedroom set, a vacuum cleaner and two certain pictures, and the court having determined that said settlement of the property rights was just and equitable as between the parties hereto. Now, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff above named is entitled to a divorce upon the grounds stated in his complaint, to-wit, extreme cruelty, and that the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant should be dissolved, and it is determined that an interlocutory judgment of divorce should be entered in said action and said interlocutory judgment is hereby entered accordingly, and it further appearing to the court that the defendant is physically incapable of earning a livelihood by her own labors. It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that plaintiff pay to the defendant as and for alimony the sum of one hundred ($100.00) dollars per month, payable on the 15th day of each and every month, commencing on the 15th day of March, 1928. It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the provisions hereinbefore recited as to the division and settlement of the property rights between the parties hereto be and the same are hereby confirmed and approved."

On July 13, 1928, respondent served and filed a notice of motion for a modification of the decree in so far as it provided for the payment of alimony to appellant. The motion was heard on July 20, 1928, and on August 15, 1928, the court made its order reducing the monthly payments from one hundred dollars per month to forty dollars per month. The appeal is taken from this order.

The record before us consists of the interlocutory decree of divorce, the notice of motion and two affidavits used at the hearing, the order modifying the decree and a very brief bill of exceptions.

Appellant relies upon three grounds for a reversal of the order, namely: First, that respondent was in contempt of court at the time of the hearing and that, therefore, the trial court should not have considered his application for a reduction of the alimony; second, that the application was prematurely made; and third, that the portion of the decree awarding appellant alimony in the sum of one hundred dollars per month was entered by consent and was based upon contract and, therefore, could not be modified.

[1] Under appellant's first specification of error, it is admitted that respondent had not paid the one hundred dollars falling due on July 15, 1928. It does not appear that this objection was made in the trial court at the hearing of the motion. It cannot be urged for the first time here.

[2] Appellant next contends that respondent's motion was made prematurely. Up to June 12, 1928, he was earning a salary of five hundred fifty dollars a month and on this date was discharged without any fault on his part. His motion was filed thirty-three days thereafter while his total income was less than nine dollars per month and before he had secured another position. It may be admitted that respondent was very prompt in seeking relief from his obligation to support his wife, but still this fact would not deprive the trial court of the right to entertain and decide the motion. It merely constituted one of the facts to be weighed and considered in deciding the controversy.

Appellant's last ground upon which she relies for a reversal of the order, namely, that the award of alimony by the court was by consent of the parties and based upon contract, presents the real question to be decided in this case.

When the court awards alimony to an innocent wife it is not bound by the terms of a contract between the parties, either as to its amount or its duration. The power to make the award is drawn from the terms of the statute and not from the agreement of the husband and wife. It follows that the power to modify the award of alimony, either as to amount, duration, or time and manner of payment, is inherent in the court, unhampered by the terms of any contract which the parties might have entered into providing for the payment of any such alimony, when it is given in the order or decree as maintenance only. Smith v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. App. 177, 264 P. 573; Soule v. Soule, 4 Cal. App. 97, 87 P. 205; Gates v. Gates, 54 Cal. App. 407, 202 P. 151; notes 58 A. L. R. 639.

In the case before us we have an entirely different state of facts to which the general rule we have just stated does not apply. In this case the decree of divorce was given to the innocent husband, and he was directed to pay one hundred dollars per month to his erring wife. There is no authority of law for such an order (sections 136, 139, Civ. Code), and if supported at all, it must find its strength in a contract between the husband and the wife settling their property rights. There is nothing in the policy of our law prohibiting such a contract. In fact, it is authorized by our statutes (section 158, Civ. Code), and if the contract is fair and just it may be approved by the court.

[3] In the instant case, if the award of a monthly allowance to the wife is to be supported at all, it must be based upon a contract. The interlocutory decree of divorce recites that the husband and wife had agreed upon a division of the community property and approved this division in its details. It also makes the award of one hundred dollars per month to the wife for her support and maintenance. It does not in explicit terms declare that this allowance was based upon the contract, but if it were not, the award lacked the authority of law, the transcript of the proceedings at the hearing of the divorce action is not before us, but, in support of the decree allowing the support money, we have the presumption that the judgment of a superior court is regular and is supported by proper evidence. In addition to this, we have excerpts from the testimony of respondent to the effect that at the trial of the divorce case he was asked if he knew that the proposed interlocutory decree contained a provision that he pay one hundred dollars per month to appellant, and he answered that he did, and that it was inserted with his consent.

An affidavit of the attorney for appellant, used at the hearing of the motion to modify the decree, contains the following: "That after the case was set for trial further negotiations resulted in an agreement and property settlement being arrived at between the parties hereto; that said settlement provided that the defendant be given the sum of $5,000.00 in cash; that she deed to plaintiff certain real property in the City of Fresno and that she transfer to plaintiff certain personal property, and that plaintiff pay to defendant for her support and maintenance and by way of alimony the sum of $100.00 per month, and that all of these matters be embraced in the interlocutory decree of divorce; that pursuant to said agreement at the time of the trial of this action the matters involved in the agreement were acted upon and approved by the court, and that the sum of $100.00 per month provided in said decree was an amount agreed upon and stipulated in open court by the attorneys of the parties hereto." This portion of the affidavit is not directly controverted by respondent.

It has been held that, where the innocent husband is awarded a divorce, and there is an agreement between the parties settling their property rights, under the terms of which the erring wife is to receive a monthly allowance from her husband as a part of the settlement, which agreement being approved by the court and its terms incorporated in the decree, the court has no power to relieve the husband of part of the burdens of the decree by its modification as it rested not on the authority of law but on the terms of a contract. Parker v. Parker, 55 Cal. App. 458, 203 P. 420, 421. In deciding this case, the court used the following language:

"If in this case the court had authority to impose a lien in favor of the defendant upon a portion of the community property awarded to the plaintiff, as security for payments thereafter to be made by the plaintiff to the defendant, that authority was derived from the stipulation made, and not from any right of the court to impose upon the plaintiff any duty to provide for the future support of the defendant. Having accepted the benefit of the decree so made in accordance with his own consent, we think that the plaintiff should be held to be estopped to deny the validity and efficacy of the lien thus established. The parties agreed that the provision thus made was in lieu of any other division of the property. If the plaintiff at the time of the award had objected that such payments to be made and such liens securing the same were outside the scope of the stipulation as made, it may well be that the court would have decided that the defendant was entitled to a larger portion of the community property in the division then about to be made. Having accepted the benefits of the stipulation and decree as thus made, the plaintiff should not now be permitted to be relieved from the burdens imposed upon his property by the decree. In the decree of divorce and in the interlocutory decree, the court attempted to reserve to itself the right to modify the decree and the allowance to be paid to the defendant, and the liens declared to secure the payment thereof. If this had been the allowance provided for by the statute to be paid to the wife in a divorce action where she is not the party in fault, it may be conceded that such allowance might thereafter be modified. But since the payments provided for in this decree were a part of and only incidental to the division of the community property, no reason appears why the judgment, when it became final, did not also become unchangeable to the same extent as a final judgment in any other action."

[4, 5] We conclude that if the award of one hundred dollars per month was based upon contract as part of the settlement of the property rights of the parties, the court had no authority to modify it. If it were not supported by contract, it did not have the sanction of law. Under the state of the very limited record before us, we are not prepared to hold that this portion of the decree is supported by contract although the record strongly indicates this fact. The respondent, the moving party in the court below, should have met this question with satisfactory evidence to sustain the burden of proof resting upon him. His notice of motion did not specify the grounds upon which he would base his motion, but the affidavit of respondent filed with the notice set forth financial reverses and the inability of respondent to respond to the terms of that order. It was not attacked in the court below on the grounds of its illegality. The motion to be relieved of the payments because of an inability to make them, assumed a valid existing order.

Under the condition of the record before us, we believe that the order modifying the interlocutory decree of divorce should be reversed, with directions to the trial court to take such future action as may be appropriate under such facts as may be developed at a further hearing.

Order reversed.

LEINER v. ENG-SKELL CO. et al.
Civ. 7186.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.
Feb. 26, 1930.

1. Automobiles $\S$ 246(49)—Giving instruction that driving automobile in violation of ordinance "upon or along" public sidewalk constitutes negligence held not error under evidence.

In action for personal injuries sustained when plaintiff was struck by truck while standing upon sidewalk, giving instruction to effect that driving automobile in violation of ordinance, making it unlawful for any person to drive "upon or along" any public sidewalk, itself establishes negligence, held not error, notwithstanding trial court's failure to explain that words "upon or along," used in ordinance, meant "upon and along," where evidence showed automobile at time of accident was being driven both upon and along sidewalk in violation of ordinance, and there was no contention that automobile was being driven across sidewalk.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Upon and Along," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Trial $\S$ 260(8)—Error, if any, in failure to give instruction regarding when violation of ordinance constitutes negligence, held not available, where defendant's instruction on that point was given.

On defendant's appeal from judgment in action for personal injuries sustained in automobile accident, defendant cannot complain of error, if any, because of trial court's failure to instruct jury that violation of ordinance was negligence only in event that it was not satisfactorily explained or excused, where defendant's instruction on that phase of case was given in full as requested.

3. Damages $\S$ 158(2)—Evidence showing loss of earning power is admissible under general allegations of damage in action for personal injuries.

In action for damages for personal injuries sustained in automobile accident, evidence showing loss of earning power is admissible under general allegations of damage, and special averments of such loss are not necessary.

NOURSE, Acting P. J.

Plaintiff sued for damages resulting from being struck by an automobile, which was driven by the defendants, while plaintiff was standing upon the sidewalk adjoining a public street in the city and county of San Francisco. The cause was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $5,000. From the judgment upon the verdict, the defendant appeals upon typewritten transcripts.

The case made by plaintiff was that, while he was standing upon the sidewalk, the truck suddenly swerved from its course in the street so that the front and rear right wheels thereof came over the curbing and proceeded for a distance along the sidewalk so that the truck struck plaintiff, throwing him against an iron pole and causing the injuries complained of. In defense, evidence was offered that, because of the condition of the surface of the highway, the truck suddenly skidded to the right, so that the front and rear right wheels came flush with the curb, and that the overhang of the truck struck the plaintiff, who, under defendants' theory, was standing too close to the edge of the sidewalk. Plaintiff put in evidence provisions of an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco which made it unlawful for any person, among other things "to drive an automobile upon or along any public sidewalk." The trial court read this ordinance to the jury, and gave an instruction to the effect that, if it were found that the operator of the automobile was driving it in violation of this ordinance, "that in itself establishes negligence on the part of the defendant," provided that it should be found that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, etc.

[1] On this appeal the point is raised that the trial court should have construed the ordinance in question and should have advised the jury that the expression "upon or along" meant "upon and along," so that the inhibition of the ordinance should not go to a driving upon a sidewalk alone such as to prevent a crossing of a sidewalk into a garage or vacant lot. Manifestly the word "or" in the ordinance is incorrectly used for "and," and the clear purpose of the ordinance is the prohibition of driving "upon and along" a sidewalk rather than a driving across a sidewalk for purposes of ingress or egress to or from private property. But, aside from the fact that the defendant did not request an instruction upon these lines, we are unable to perceive how the failure to so instruct has any bearing upon the case. It was the plaintiff's case that the two right wheels proceeded both upon and along this particular portion of the sidewalk. There was no contention by either party that the automobile was being driven across a sidewalk, and there is no contention that the ordinance relates only to a case where all four wheels are upon and along the sidewalk. If the evidence offered by the plaintiff is to be believed, then manifestly the automobile at the time of the accident was being driven both upon and along the sidewalk in violation of the terms of the ordinance.

[2] This brings us to the further contention of the appellants that the court erred in instructing the jury that a violation of the ordinance in the manner just referred to established negligence on the part of the defendants, and that the court should have gone further and instructed the jury that such violation of an ordinance was negligence only in the event that it was not satisfactorily explained or excused. There is no quarrel with the rule as stated in the case of Berkovitz v. American River Gravel Company, 191 Cal. 195, 199, 215 P. 675, 677, that, "if some good excuse appears which would be a sufficient defense to an action for the penalty imposed by the law * * * then the law is not really violated." But whatever application the rule may have to the case at hand, we are confronted by the fact that the only explanation or excuse made by the defendants was that the automobile skidded or sloughed over to the sidewalk, and that this defense was the only explanation or excuse which the defendants requested the court to submit to the jury. Their request for an instruction on this phase of the case was given in full as requested, and the defendant cannot now point to any error on the part of the trial court.

[3] It is argued, with apparent lack of confidence in the point, that the trial court erred in permitting the plaintiff to offer evidence of loss of wages or earning power, in the absence of an express allegation in the complaint specifying such loss as an item of the damage suffered. The rule is settled that evidence of loss of earning power is admissible under general allegations of damage and that special averments of such loss are not necessary. Worden v. Central Fireproof Bldg. Co., 172 Cal. 94, 97, 155 P. 839; Shaw v.

This is an action for wages, claimed to be due the plaintiff. While the complaint sets up four causes of action, this appeal is taken with reference to the first cause alone, and the judgment rendered thereon.

The complaint in the first cause of action alleges that within two years last passed, the defendants became indebted to the plaintiff for labor performed in connection with drilling certain oil wells in the county of Kern, in the sum of $1,312. It further alleges that the plaintiff was employed by the defendants at $12 per day, and that the defendants agreed to pay for this work the sum of $1,312. The answer denied each of the allegations of the complaint. The court dismissed the action as to one defendant, and gave judgment against the defendants Bomke and Roumain. Defendant Roumain alone has appealed, basing his appeal entirely on the contention that the evidence is not sufficient to support the findings of the trial court, to the effect that said defendant became indebted to the plaintiff; that said defendant had agreed to pay for this work; and that said amount was due to the plaintiff from said defendant.

Appellant admits that he and the other defendants employed the plaintiff to assist in drilling what is known herein as well No. 1. He contends, however, that work on this well was completed in February, 1925; that plaintiff was paid in full up to that time and that thereafter other parties went ahead, attempting to drill what is known as well No. 2. Appellant contends that before well No. 2 was started, he notified defendant Bomke that he was through with the proposition, and would go no further. It is contended that Bomke informed the plaintiff of this fact on February 23, 1925. Appellant therefore contends that since he never specially hired the plaintiff, he became responsible to him only through a partnership with the other defendants, in the drilling of well No. 1; and that he is not further liable since that partnership was cancelled, and the plaintiff notified of its termination. Appellant relies upon the following evidence: Roumain testified that he never said anything to plaintiff about employment; that he did not promise to pay him; that he dropped out of the partnership in February; that some time in April plaintiff came to him for the purpose of borrowing money to finish well No. 2, and that he then told him that he had quit and had nothing to do with it. Defendant Roumain's daughter testified that, about the first of April, at her father's house, she heard her father tell the plaintiff that he had nothing to do with it, and had no interest in it. Defendant Bomke testified that he informed plaintiff, on February 23, 1925, that Roumain had refused to put in any more money or have anything to do with further work on the wells. Reliance is further placed upon the fact that defendant Bomke gave the plaintiff a letter reading as follows:

"April 24, 1925.

"I, August J. Bomke, this day appoint J. A. Kibele, as my lawful agent to act for me in all matters pertaining to my oil land."

Appellant further insists that the plaintiff admitted that said defendant had informed plaintiff that he had no further interest, by making the following answer: "A. He said that he had no further interest, he wrote an order, a written order in the contract that you gave me this morning here, should be attached to the contract, he gave me a written order to show the Group Ten people that he owned the property that was on the ground, and the written order * * *—and that plaintiff said this conversation occurred in June, but later admitted it might have been in April. The record, however, shows clearly that the plaintiff testified that he had a conversation with Roumain, at his home, in June, later admitting it might have been as early as April or March, but flatly denied that he had asked Roumain to put money into this proposition, and denied that Roumain had then informed him that he had quit, and had no further interest in the well. On further questioning, the plaintiff then stated that he had had more than one conversation with Roumain, at his home, and told of two others in July and August. While testifying as to the last conversation he had with Roumain, he made the answer above quoted.

The plaintiff testified: "I was employed by Mr. Roumain to drill the property in the Temblor, that was known as the Kerr Permit." Further, that during the same conversation defendant Bomke entered the room and he was employed to work for them, as driller, at $12 per day; that after work stopped on well No. 1, appellant came out to the property and helped step off the location for well No. 2; that he then told plaintiff he had sufficient money on hand to go ahead and complete the work in accordance with his agreement with Mr. Bomke, and that he was to pay for the drilling of so many wells; and that he had the money on hand for at least five wells, and by the time they were in, he would probably drill the other wells. Plaintiff testified that he worked on well No. 2, seven days in March, thirty days in April, thirty-one in May, thirty in June, thirty-one in July, and seventeen in August, making a total of 146 days, amounting to $1,752; and that he had received a total of $340, leaving a balance of $1,312. Plaintiff's son also testified that he heard defendant Roumain tell his father that he was going to drill more wells, on the occasion when he visited the property when work stopped on well No. 1.

[1, 2] Nothing is here presented but a conflict in the evidence. The testimony of the plaintiff that he was employed by the appellant; that he performed the work; that after the work on well No. 1 ceased, the appellant visited the property and assisted in arranging for further work, stating he was to pay for the same; and that plaintiff had three further conversations with him, between that time and August, and that nothing was said about his having withdrawn from the enterprise, until the last conversation some time in August, is sufficient to support the findings complained of, and this evidence was apparently believed by the court. It is true, as argued by appellant, that the final location for well No. 2 was not the one stepped off by the appellant in February, but it was upon the same quarter section, was a part of the same lease, and nothing appears in the record to show why the change was made, or why appellant should thereby be relieved from responsibility. It is elementary that a judgment cannot be reversed because the evidence is conflicting. 2 Cal. Jur. 921, and cases cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

BEARDSLEY LAND & INVESTMENT CO. v.
SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
Civ. 7020.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.
March 1, 1930.

1. Mandamus ☞28—Trial court's exercise of judicial discretion will not be controlled by mandate, in absence of palpable abuse.

Where a trial court is vested with discretion in the exercise of its judicial power, its exercise thereof will not be controlled by mandate, except in case of palpable abuse.

2. Attachment ☞132—Attachment bond held not invalidated by recitals referring to contract sued on as for direct payment of money (Code Civ. Proc. § 538, and § 537, subd. 2).

That recitals of bond for attachment in action on contract against nonresident of state under Code Civ. Proc. § 537, subd. 2, referred to contract as one "for the direct payment of money," whereas affidavit in conformity with section 538 omitted such words, and amended complaint was for payment to third parties, did not render undertaking void, though such recital was unnecessary.

3. Mandamus ☞36—Discharge of attachment in action for breach of contract to pay debts of plaintiff's assignor held not specially enjoined by law within mandamus statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 537, subd. 2, and § 1085).

Court's duty to discharge attachment, sought in action against nonresident under Code Civ. Proc. § 537, subd. 2, for breach of contract which covered many transactions, including agreement to pay debts of plaintiff's assignor, held not related to performance of act which law specially enjoins within section 1085, authorizing writ of mandate; court being called on to determine judicially disputable questions whether cause of action was proper basis for attachment, whether amount claimed was excessive and supported by contract, whether contract or rights arising thereunder were assign-able, and whether it was sufficient to support attachment.

4. Mandamus ⇨26—Mandamus lies to compel particular act by court in relation to action only in exceptional cases usually involving jurisdictional questions or refusal to perform specific, clearly indicated duty.

Court will be compelled by mandamus to perform a particular act in relation to an action only in exceptional cases, which usually involve questions as to extent or limitations of jurisdiction or court's refusal to perform some specific and clearly indicated duty.

Application by the Beardsley Land & Investment Company, a corporation, for a writ of mandate to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles, and L. E. Lampton, County Clerk of such county and ex officio clerk of said court.

Alternative writ discharged, and application denied.

Patterson, Bailey & Montgomery, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Louis Lombardi and John M. Hall, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J.

There is now pending in respondent court an action entitled Ralph Pleasant, Plaintiff, v. Beardsley Land & Investment Company, Defendant. The company is an Arizona corporation. From the complaint in that action it appears that plaintiff's assignor, one Carl Pleasant, had entered into sundry contracts and business relations with the corporation, and also that he was indebted to various creditors in sums which in the aggregate amounted to a sum in excess of $75,000; that on the 17th day of May, 1928, by an agreement in writing between the corporation and Carl Pleasant, the corporation assumed and agreed to pay this outstanding indebtedness of Carl Pleasant; that the corporation failed and refused to pay any part of said indebtedness save and except the sum of $5,000 and the sum of $500, which it did pay upon account of two of said claims of creditors; that after breach of the contract by the corporation, Carl Pleasant sold and assigned to the plaintiff his claim against the corporation arising out of said breach of contract. The complaint asks for judgment against the corporation in a sum in excess of $69,000.

Upon instituting said action, the plaintiff therein obtained a writ of attachment, directed to the sheriff of Los Angeles county, and under said writ the sheriff by garnishment process attached certain moneys in the hands of the United States National Bank at Los Angeles, as property of defendant corporation. Thereupon the corporation, appearing specially for the purposes of the motion (Willett & Burr v. Alpert, 181 Cal. 652, 663, 185 P. 976), made its motion to discharge the writ of attachment, which motion was denied. Thereupon this proceeding was commenced wherein the corporation applied for the writ of mandate. The answer filed by respondent does not raise any issues of fact which require particular attention. Substantially the facts are those set forth in the petition and in the exhibits which are made part thereof.

[1] "Where a trial court is vested with discretion in the exercise of its judicial power, the exercise of such discretion will not be controlled by mandate except in case of palpable abuse. Realty, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 543, 182 P. 1048." Los Angeles A. T. Co. v. Superior Court, 94 Cal. App. 433, 441, 271 P. 363, 366. A pertinent case illustrating the use of the writ of mandate to compel the discharge of an attachment is seen in Alexander v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. App. 312, 266 P. 993, 994, where it was made to appear that the so-called undertaking used to obtain the writ of attachment was a void instrument. The pretended sureties on the undertaking were themselves plaintiffs in the action and therefore were not qualified to be sureties on the undertaking. It was held that the void character of the writ was so clearly apparent that the exercise of judicial discretion was not involved in the matter and it was the duty of the court to discharge the attachment. The rule was affirmed that, "where the discretion ceases and the duty becomes absolute, the writ will lie." Or, as said in Pacific Palisades Association v. City of Huntington Beach, 196 Cal. 211, 222, 237 P. 538, 542, 40 A. L. R. 782, "where the discretion ceases, and the act to be done is purely ministerial, the duty becomes absolute, and can be compelled through the application of the writ."

In the argument of counsel for petitioner herein they rely upon five separately stated propositions. These are: That the cause of action alleged is not a basis for an attachment; that the amount claimed is excessive and not supported by the contract upon which the action is based; that the bond for attachment is fatally defective; that the plaintiff, an assignee under a personal contract not assignable, cannot sue; that the contract, not made or payable in California, does not support the attachment.

[2] We will first discuss the point that the bond for attachment is fatally defective. It is pointed out that the bond recites the commencement of an action "against the above-named defendant upon a contract for the direct payment of money," whereas, the affidavit for attachment omits the words "for the direct payment of money." It is further claimed that the amended complaint is specifically not for the direct payment of money, but is for payment to third parties who are not parties to the action. From an inspection of the record it is evident that the attachment was sought under the provisions of section 537, subdivision 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes an attachment, "In an action upon a contract, express or implied, against a defendant not residing in this state." In such a case it is necessary (section 538, Code Civ. Proc.) that the affidavit for attachment show, among other things, the facts specified in section 537 which entitle the plaintiff to the writ. It appears in this case that the affidavit was in conformity with the statute, and that the recitals of the undertaking were in conformity with the statute. The fact that the undertaking in its recitals referred to the contract as one for the direct payment of money did not, in our opinion, render the undertaking void, although such recital was not necessary in the instant case.

[3, 4] Concerning the other points above stated, and which are argued at length in the briefs, we think that it is not necessary for this court in this proceeding to determine whether or not the court below, in passing upon the motion to discharge the attachment, erred in deciding those points against the contentions of petitioner. The duty of the court to discharge the attachment, if such duty existed at all, was not related to "the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins," according to the meaning of those words as contained in section 1085 of the Code of Civil Procedure. People v. Pratt, 28 Cal. 166, 87 Am. Dec. 110; People v. Superior Court, 114 Cal. 466, 46 P. 383; First National Bank v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. App. 64, 71, 234 P. 420. The decision in Andersen v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 95, 200 P. 963, does not destroy the effect of the earlier decisions in their application to a proceeding like that now before us. The cases in which mandamus lies, to compel a particular act by a court in relation to an action, are exceptional. Usually they involve some question relating to the extent or the limitations of jurisdiction, or the refusal of the court to perform some specific and clearly indicated duty.

The alleged cause of action shown in the present case arose out of a contract which covered the subject-matter of many transactions and which included the alleged agreement of the company to pay various items of outstanding indebtedness of Carl Pleasant. In its interpretation of the contract and of the complaint of the plaintiff, the court was called upon to determine whether or not the cause of action alleged (admittedly a claim based upon a contract) was a proper basis for attachment, and whether or not the amount claimed was excessive and not supported by the contract, and whether or not the contract or the rights arising thereunder were assignable, and whether or not the contract was sufficient to support the attachment. In arriving at its decision on those questions for the purposes of the then pending motion, the court was dealing with disputable propositions affecting the merits of the case and was acting judicially with respect to those matters and questions. If in so acting the court committed error, such error is not one to be corrected by mandamus proceedings.

The alternative writ is discharged, and the application for peremptory writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by Robert R. Pashley, doing business as the Pashley Motor Company, against Joe Wukejevich. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

C. Ibeson Sweet, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. A. Knapp, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The appellant instituted this action for the recovery of the purchase price of an automobile which he had sold to the respondent, basing the suit upon a written contract. This respondent contended was obtained by fraud, coercion, and misrepresentation.

The contract specified one used Chevrolet touring car, for which the purchaser was to pay a stated amount in monthly installments. It recited that the personal property had been examined, and was "in good order and repair, and said purchaser further agrees that he will, at his own expense, during the life of this contract, repair any injuries sustained by said personal property; * * * all bills for repairs done upon, and labor and materials furnished by the seller * * * before the final payment * * * shall be added to the purchase price," and that the car was "sold as is." It was respondent's contention that he was unable to read or write, that the contract was not read to him, and that the machine was guaranteed for a period of thirty days. It appears that he was accompanied to appellant's place of business by one Bradovich, who witnessed his signature, made by "his [X] mark"; that the machine was of no practical value, and when returned was held by appellant upon charges for repairs until a second installment became due, when the whole purchase price was demanded. The trial court found that the document in suit was void, in that it did not represent the agreement upon which the purchase was made; that appellant had agreed to furnish a first-class automobile, and to keep it in repair during the first month.

There is a sharp conflict in the evidence. But it is argued that, conceding the truth of respondent's evidence, all oral statements and representations, if made, were merged in the writing. It is insisted by respondent that the defense, rather than attempting to vary the terms of a written contract, proved the true one which was entirely different from that upon which the suit was founded. Resolving all intendments in favor of the judgment, we are confronted with certain positive evidence, which must be accepted by this court as it was viewed below. The testimony tends to show that Pashley expressly stated the machine to be "first class," "in perfect mechanical condition," and agreed that "if anything was wrong with the machine to return it"; that it was "all right; guaranteed for thirty days"; and that he "would repair it for thirty days." Respondent knew nothing about an automobile, nor could he operate one. It was not demonstrated before the purchaser made the first payment, and his companion drove it to his home. The plaintiff testified that a form of contract was prepared, and further: "I said, 'You can't write at all?' He said 'No.' I said, 'Can you read?' I asked the other man, 'Can you read?' He says, 'Yes.' I handed him one of the copies. I took the original up and started to read to Joe, and Joe says, 'Oh, I have signed a lot of those already, forget all about it. You'll get your money.' I said, 'Listen here before you go any further, if you don't make your payments there will be a collector sent out to you and that costs money, and if you don't come through with the deal it is going to cost you $100 attorney's fees.' And he said, 'All right,' and put his mark and the other man witnessed his mark." There is evidence that the car was not in serviceable condition at any time, though repeated attempts were made to operate it. It made "all kinds of noises and knocks," was returned for adjustment three days after the sale; it "did not work the first day, * * * right from the start," it "was going sideways," and "became worse and worse all the time." When driven it would run but ten miles an hour, "something was wrong with it," it stopped at times, and they had difficulty in getting home. Within ten days it was again returned for repairs and adjustment, and the defendant swore that when he called for the car he was told there were charges for the work, to which he remarked: "'Why charge $37 to fix the machine when they say no charge for thirty days?' Pashley said got to pay or get out of the place. I went home."

[1-5] From this and other evidence which we do not recite, the trial court concluded that the defendant was in ignorance of the terms of the contract; that he acted entirely upon the plaintiff's statements, representations, and asserted guaranty, and placed his mark upon the instrument only when threatened with expensive litigation if he did not "come through with the deal"—in brief, that there was no meeting of the minds. The only point urged by appellant is that the evidence offered by respondent was contradicted, and that had there in fact been understandings and oral agreements the written contract expressly excluded them. However, it lay exclusively within the province of the trial court to accept or reject testimony, to determine the credibility of witnesses, and to pass upon the weight of conflicting evidence. Stransky v. Callan, 81 Cal. App. 476, 253 P. 960; People v. Marblehead Land Co., 82 Cal. App. 289, 255 P. 553. Where there is substantial evidence tending to show that untrue statements were made, and that they were acted upon in good faith to the detriment of a person so deceived, the judgment will not be disturbed. Bates v. United Construction Co., 81 Cal. App. 295, 253 P. 328. There is some evidence to the effect that appellant offered to guarantee the car for thirty days if sold at a higher price than that mentioned in the contract, and that a reduction was made in order to consummate the sale of the machine "as is." The court, however, was not bound by every declaration of the plaintiff, regardless of its improbability (Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513), and it may well have construed this as an admission of defective mechanism. With the witnesses before the court, it was equipped with facilities for determining as to whether or not the defendant had bargained at any price for an article which could not be operated until even the second monthly installment became due. Reversible error does not appear.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROYAL INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
Civ. 287.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

March 3, 1930.

1. Master and servant §367—"Independent contractor" is one rendering service in course of independent employment or occupation, following employer's desires only in results.

One who renders service in course of an independent employment or occupation, following his employer's desires only in results of work and not means whereby it is to be accomplished, is an "independent contractor."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Independent Contractor," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Master and servant §367—That compensation of real estate salesman consisted of commissions on sales made was not determinative on whether he was employee.

That injured real estate salesman's compensation consisted of commissions on sales made or a division of such commissions was not determinative on whether he was an employee of real estate broker.

3. Master and servant §367—Real estate broker's right to discharge salesman without recourse was not determinative of whether salesman sustaining injury was employee.

Right of real estate broker to discharge salesman at any time without recourse was not significant on question whether relationship of employer and employee existed between broker and salesman sustaining injury, where it fit in equally with theory of an independent association.

4. Master and servant §405(2)—Evidence showed an association between salesman sustaining injury and real estate broker rather than relation of employer and employee.

Evidence showing that salesman sustaining injury and real estate broker arranged their work by common consent and agreement, that salesman did not change his broker's license because he did not think it necessary, that both made suggestions and raised points and showing that broker did not have any control over means, manner, or mode of work of salesman, held to conclusively show an association, rather than relation, of employer and employee.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by D. R. Murray, claimant, for injuries, opposed by M. Brauer, employer, and the Royal Indemnity Company, insurance carrier. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award in favor of claimant, and the insurance carrier brings certiorari.

Award annulled.

Harry P. Sweet, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BARNARD, J.

This is a petition for certiorari, seeking to annul an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of D. R. Murray and against Royal Indemnity Company, a corporation, as the insurance carrier for one M. Brauer.

After a hearing and a rehearing, the Industrial Accident Commission found that the said Murray was an employee of the said Brauer and had sustained the injury complained of in the course of his employment. Briefly stated, the facts are as follows: Brauer was operating a real estate office in the city of San Diego and advertised for salesmen. Murray answered the advertisement and entered Brauer's office under some arrangement, the exact nature of which is here in controversy. A short time later Murray inserted an advertisement in a newspaper to the effect that he had a client who desired to purchase a small piece of land. In response to this advertisement a man named Bean phoned the office and asked for Murray. Brauer took his name and address and later Murray called him on the phone, and arranged to go with him to inspect a parcel of land which Bean desired to sell. Just before they arrived at the land Murray observed some avocado trees on an adjoining property. He left the road and entered that property for the purpose of seeing whether or not there was fruit on these trees. While on this mission he slipped, fell down an incline, and received the injuries for which compensation was later awarded. The Industrial Accident Commission found that his injuries arose out of and in the course of his employment, and that he was at that time an employee of Brauer.

[1] The principal question to be here considered is whether or not the respondent Murray was, at the time of the injury, an employee of the said Brauer. The law is well settled as to the tests that are to be applied in distinguishing an employee from an independent contractor. The general rules are summarized in Moody v. Industrial Accident Commission, 204 Cal. 668, 269 P. 542, 543, 60 A. L. R. 299, as follows: "Section 8 (b) of the Compensation Act, above referred to, provides that: 'Any person rendering service for another, other than as an independent contractor, or as expressly excluded herein, is presumed to be an employee within the meaning of this act.' Many definitions of an 'independent contractor' have been made, but they are not essentially different. Franklin Coal & Coke Co. v. Industrial Comm., 296 Ill. 329, 334, 129 N. E. 811. The following definition may be regarded as a correct statement of what constitutes an independent contractor: One who renders service in the course of an independent employment or occupation, following his employer's desires only in the results of the work, and not the means whereby it is to be accomplished. Brown v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 174 Cal. 457, 460, 163 P. 664; Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 99, 78 P. 337; Barton v. Studebaker Corp., 46 Cal. App. 707, 189 P. 1025; North Bend Lumber Co. v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 76 Wash. 232, 242, 135 P. 1017. 'It is well settled that, where one person is performing work in which another is beneficially interested, the latter may exercise over the former a certain measure of control for a definite and restricted purpose, without incurring the responsibilities, or acquiring the immunities, of a master, with respect to the person controlled.' Western Indemnity Co. v.

Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 811, 159 P. 721, 723. The decisive test of the relationship is: Who has the right to direct what shall be done, and when and how it shall be done? Who has the right to general control? Lassen v. Stamford Transit Co., 102 Conn. 76, 128 A. 117, 118; see, also, Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 191 Cal. 404, 407, 216 P. 578, 43 A. L. R. 1304. In other words, the test of what constitutes independent service lies in the control exercised. The test of control means complete control, and we must carefully distinguish between authoritative control and mere suggestion as to detail. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra."

[2] The occupation of real estate salesman is one that might come under the classification of employee, or independent contractor, depending upon the facts of the particular case. The fact that the compensation may consist of commissions on sales made, or a division of such commissions, is not determinative of the relationship. In Hartford Acc. & Indem. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 93 Cal. App. 313, 269 P. 733, it was held that a real estate salesman was an employee, the decision being based upon the fact that the employer exercised certain control over the mode or method of work of the salesman, and not merely over the results. Respondents justify the award in the instant case on the application of the above rules of law to certain facts in this case, which may be summarized as follows: Respondent Murray testified that he was working on the usual basis of 60 per cent. of the commissions for the agent, and 40 per cent. for the employer; that he was acting in the capacity of a salesman, selling real estate. When asked what type of business he was to handle, he replied: "Well, I think we discussed that I would handle exchanges, and that it was later understood we might work together. We were alone in the office for a while; that is, before there was anyone else came in; as things would come up, Mr. Brauer would say, 'You go and see this party if you want to;' or he would suggest that whether it was a trade or not a trade, and by common consent and agreement that way, if anything different was made, we always discussed it and agreed upon it; if it were to be different from an exchange deal, why, he said, 'Go ahead.'"

He testified that Brauer maintained the office, and paid for the advertisements; that he used Brauer's cards, and the listings were taken in Brauer's name. And further:

"Q. What I mean is this: Mr. Brauer didn't care what you did with your time during the day; all he was interested in was having you close a deal, and when a deal was closed, you would then prorate the commission between you? A. He wasn't supposed to want a man around his office or in this connection unless he was a busy man; that is what he wanted and that is what I was trying to give in the way that it is commonly done, whatever a man can do."

In reference to the particular call that resulted in the trip upon which he was injured, he testified: "I just stated Mr. Brauer turned over the call to me which he received over the telephone, which is customary. I would have done the same thing if he had been out; if I had received a call for him, I would have turned it over to him; likewise he had done the same with the call that he had to try to take care of the business that he was advertising."

In reference to his first going to work, he testified as follows:

"Q. When you first spoke to Mr. Brauer about associating yourself with him, isn't it true Mr. Brauer suggested you come in as a salesman and that you said, no, you preferred to remain an independent broker but that you would like to work out of his office as such? A. There was a conversation regarding my making application for a salesman's license and I just remarked that I did not think that that was necessary and the matter was left open at that point."

In reference to his right to quit without recourse against him, he testified as follows:

"A. There wouldn't be any recourse in the event there was nothing unsettled; providing there was nothing unsettled."

"Q. Assuming you had been paid for everything you had earned up to that time and he just said, 'Murray, you are through.' A. Why yes, I wouldn't have any recourse because I had no contract. In the same way, I could say the same thing to him. I would say, 'I believe I will not remain longer.' Provided everything was in shipshape on both sides. I don't know of anything that would stop either one from taking issues."

Mr. Brauer testified as follows:

"Q. Just how did Mr. Murray operate out of your office? Did you have any special time at which he was to report for work? A. No; he was to use his own judgment as to coming to work, or working his clients. I gave him the right to advertise, to make all calls come to him direct; all his advertisements called for Mr. Murray. * * * A. If I wanted to discontinue his services? There was no discussion as to that, but it is always understood that if a man does not want a man to work for him any more in a real estate office, he can tell him to discontinue the service and settle with him right there."

"Q. Did you feel that if Mr. Murray should have any reason desiring not to work out of the office, he could do that? A. Yes, sir."

"Q. In other words, you had the power, either of you could terminate without liability? A. At any time, yes, sir."

In reference to their talk about a license, Brauer testified as follows: "A. When I first advertised for salesmen, Mr. Murray came around. The first day he discussed the matter, he did not let me know definitely whether he could come or not; he came back a day or so afterwards when he decided that he was coming and work with me. I gave him a salesman's application blank to fill out and he told me he did not want to fill that out; he did not want to relinquish his broker's license; that he would have his broker's license transferred to this office. I asked him to do that and I found later that he didn't do that."

In Bennett v. Truebody, 66 Cal. 509, 6 P. 329, 331, 56 Am. Rep. 117, the court said: "The plumber was left to produce the desired result in his own way. If that did not constitute him an independent contractor we do not know what would." We feel there is absolutely no evidence in this record to show that respondent Murray was not free to produce the desired result of his work in his own way. It is true that Brauer testified: "It is always understood that if a man does not want a man to work for him any more in a real estate office, he can tell him to discontinue the service and settle with him right there." But he also testified that after the first conversation Murray "came back a day or so afterwards, when he decided that he was coming and work with me." All of the facts taken together indicate a purpose on Murray's part to associate himself with Brauer rather than to become his employee. Brauer says Murray refused to give up his broker's license. When Murray was asked if he had not told Brauer that he preferred to remain an independent broker, and would like to work out of his office as such, he did not deny this, but answered: "There was a conversation regarding my application for a salesman's license, and I just remarked that I did not think that that was necessary, and the matter was left open at that point." In any event, it is undisputed that Murray did not take out a salesman's license, but continued to work under his broker's license. While section 18 of the California Real Estate Act permits a licensed broker to pay compensation to any other licensed broker, or to salesmen licensed under the broker who pays the compensation, it specifically provides: "No real estate salesman shall be employed by or accept compensation from any person other than the broker under whom he is at the time licensed." It was therefore unlawful for Murray to accept compensation as a real estate salesman from Brauer, although he had the right, as a broker himself, to divide commissions with him. If he did not specifically refuse to change his status in this respect, he at least had his attention called to it, and the circumstance is of great significance in determining the relationship existing between these parties.

The other circumstances show no control over the movements, or methods, or mode of operation of the respondent Murray, but only an interest in the results of his work. Murray testified: "We discussed that I would handle exchanges, and it was later understood we might work together." And again, "as things would come up Mr. Brauer would say 'you go and see this party if you want to,'" and again, "he would suggest that whether it was a trade or not a trade, and by common consent and agreement that way, if anything different was made, we always discussed it and agreed upon it." He also testified that the call that came in the day he was injured was the result of his own advertisement; that Brauer received the call and turned it to him, which was customary; and that he would have done the same thing if he had received a call for Brauer when he was out. He testified he had made no sales up to the time he was hurt; that he was working on an indeterminate arrangement; that he did not receive any sales instructions, nor did Mr. Brauer have a sales school; that there were no requirements as to his reporting to the office any time of day, and no specific time of reporting to the office or keeping in touch therewith. Respondent also testified: "We understood we were trying to sell real estate and that we were working to each other's hand, and Mr. Brauer, if he had any suggestions to make to me, he did it, and if I had any questions to ask him or points to raise with him, I did it." He also states he remained in the office, or went out, as he pleased. While he advertised on Brauer's contract, he used his own name and when people called for him, these calls were turned to him by Brauer. When asked whether it was not true that Brauer did not care what he did with his time during the day, but was only interested in having him close a deal and then prorating the commission, instead of denying this, he answered as follows: "He wasn't supposed to want a man around his office or in this connection unless he was a busy man." The record shows no contradiction to Brauer's testimony that "he was to use his own judgment as to coming to work, or working his clients. I gave him the right to advertise, to make all the calls come to him direct; all his advertisements called for Mr. Murray." Murray testified: "I operate on a straight commission basis, no salary, no drawing account, no expenses."

[3] While the right to discharge a person at any time, without recourse, has been held to be a strong circumstance tending to show the subserviency of the employee (Press Pub. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 190 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820), it is of less significance in a case of this sort, where it fits in equally with the theory of an independent association. In this regard, both parties testified that the right to terminate their arrangement was a mutual one.

[4] We think these circumstances show an association, rather than the relation, of employer and employee. An employer does not suggest that an employee do the things for which he is hired, "if he wants to"; their work is not arranged by "common consent and agreement"; and an employer is usually interested in what an employee does with his time. Murray stated, in reference to the telephone call, that he would have done the same thing for Brauer; that if anything different was made they always discussed it and agreed upon it; that he had the same right to terminate the arrangement that Brauer had; that he did not change his license because he himself did not think it necessary; that he and Brauer were working to each other's hand; and that both made suggestions and raised points. These statements do not indicate an employment, and the entire circumstances fail to support the assumption that Murray was working illegally, and contrary to the provisions of the Real Estate Act. We find no evidence in the record showing any control over the means, manner, or mode of the work, to have been exercised by Brauer, or reserved to him. We think the relationship between Murray and Brauer, as conclusively shown by the record, was the not unusual one of associated real estate brokers, rather than that of employer and employee.

A second point raised is that the injury suffered by Murray did not arise in the course of his employment, but arose when he was on a purely personal errand, having no relation to the sale of real estate. Were Murray an employee of Brauer, this contention would be without merit, as the evidence sufficiently shows his motive in examining the avocado trees was to gain information that would assist him in selling the land, the sale of which was the object of the trip.

For the reason that the record discloses that the relationship of employer and employee did not exist in this case, the award is annulled.

PEOPLE v. THORP.*

Cr. 21.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 6, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 20, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 31, 1930.

Criminal law §1186(4)—Admitting hearsay and incompetent testimony, in forgery prosecution, identifying defendant as man who committed crime, held prejudicial error warranting reversal (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for forgery, admitting hearsay and incompetent testimony identifying defendant as man who committed crime held prejudicial error, warranting reversal, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½, authorizing reversal for erroneous admission of evidence only where error complained of has resulted in miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; V. N. Thompson, Judge.

Willis Thorp was convicted of forgery, and he appeals.

Reversed, with directions to grant new trial.

E. L. Johnson, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

MARKS, J.

Under an information filed by the district attorney of San Diego county on November 4, 1929, appellant was convicted of the crime of forgery alleged to have been committed by him on March 3, 1928. He was sentenced to confinement in the state penitentiary for the term prescribed by law.

Appellant complains of errors of the trial court in the admission and rejection of evidence, of instructions to the jury, and of misconduct of the district attorney during the trial, and relies upon them for a reversal of the judgment.

The alleged errors in rulings on the evidence occurred in connection with the identification and admission in evidence of a photograph which respondent urges was used for the purpose of assisting witnesses to identify the appellant. The picture was evidently taken in a criminal investigation bureau. The forged check was drawn on the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego, in favor of the First National Bank Trust & Savings, in the sum of $151.13, and was used to purchase travelers' checks of the American Express Company. A certain signature card, and another forged check were also involved. None of the bank employees could identify the appellant as the man connected with either transaction. Other than the testimony concerning the photograph, the only evidence connecting him with the forgery was that of a handwriting expert who testified for the people that admitted writings of the appellant and the writings on the checks and signature cards were written by one and the same person, and the testimony of a witness who was a lobby man at one of the banks who said that the appellant looked like the same man who had signed the signature card and deposited one of the forged checks in the bank.

The principal testimony in connection with the identification of the photograph occurred in the evidence of P. J. Slattery, a police officer of the city of San Diego. The transcript shows that the following occurred:

"Q. Now, did you make any investigation of the crime with which this defendant is charged? A. I did.

"Q. And what did that investigation consist of? A. Well, I interviewed the complaining witness, and he gave me a description of this man, of this special—

"Mr. Johnson: Just a moment, we object upon the ground that is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, calling for hearsay testimony.

"Mr. Clark: He is not testifying to any hearsay. He is simply testifying that he was given a description. We are not going into what he said.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"A. I was given a description of this defendant—I mean given a description of the man who is presumed to have passed this check at the First National Bank, and took this matter up with the American Railway Express Company in a letter.

"Mr. Johnson: Just a moment, now, we object to this upon the ground it is wholly incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and hearsay.

"The Court: Overruled—objection overruled.

"A. (continuing): And after writing them and explaining what our investigations were here with reference to this check, we received a photograph from the American Railway Express Company's office at 609 West Seventh street, Los Angeles, and that photograph was taken to the complaining witness, Mr. Hadley, and Mr. Hadley identified the photograph as the man that passed the check.

"Mr. Johnson: Just a moment now, we move to strike out the entire answer, upon the ground that it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and is the conclusion and opinion of the witness, and hearsay.

"The Court: Were you present when he identified the photograph? A. Yes, sir.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"By Mr. Clark: Q. Now, did you show this photograph to anyone else?

"Mr. Johnson: I make the objection that it is wholly incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"A. On the same date the photograph was shown to Mr. Cosgrove, who at that time was in charge of the new accounts department of the Southern Trust & Commerce Branch of the Bank of Italy, and he identified the photo.

"Mr. Johnson: We move to strike out that he identified the photo, on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and hearsay.

"By Mr. Clark: Q. That was in your presence? A. Yes, that was in my presence.

"Mr. Johnson: That doesn't alter the situation, may it please the Court. That is hearsay and we move to strike it out on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and hearsay.

"The Court: The motion is denied.

"A. (continuing): And also on the same day, in my presence, Mr. Leach, who at that time was floor man at the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank—Southern Trust Branch of the Bank of Italy, identified the photograph.

"Mr. Johnson: I move to strike that out as being incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and hearsay.

"The Court: The motion is denied.

"By Mr. Clark: A. Now, I call your attention to People's Exhibits Nos. 5 and 6, and I will ask you if you have seen these before? A. I have.

"Q. When and where did you first see them? A. Well, I seen them at the Southern Trust Branch of the Bank of Italy.

"Q. Who showed them to you there? A. Mr. Cosgrove.

"Q. Was that at the time you showed this photograph to Mr. Cosgrove? A. That was afterwards—I had received these—these were turned over to me and then I showed him the photograph afterwards.

"Q. Have you that photograph? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That you showed these parties?

"Mr. Clark: At this time we will offer this photograph in evidence as People's Exhibit next in number.

"Mr. Johnson: I make the objection it is wholly incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, based upon hearsay testimony.

"The Court: I don't know whether a proper foundation has been laid for it or not.

"Mr. Johnson: And we make the further objection, no proper foundation has been laid.

"The Court: The objection is good on that ground.

"Mr. Clark: If the Court please, it is not introduced as being necessarily the photograph of this defendant, but it is introduced for what it is worth, for the jury to see. The jury are entitled to see this testimony that certain individuals identified as the photograph of this defendant.

"The Court: There is nothing in evidence to show where the witness got the photograph.

"Mr. Clark: He testified where he received it.

"The Court: Objection overruled. It may be taken out of the file—it may be taken out of this file, Mr. Slattery? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Clark: What number is it, Mr. Clerk?

"The Clerk: Seven.

"Mr. Johnson: I do not know whether we have fully covered our objections, your honor, but we object to the introduction of the photograph on the ground that there is no proper foundation for its introduction laid, and upon the further ground that it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, not germane to any issue in the case, and it is entirely based upon hearsay statements and hearsay testimony.

"The Court: The objection is overruled."

The Mr. Hadley and Mr. Cosgrove and Mr. Leach referred to were all in court and testified for the people. Appellant's counsel moved to strike out all the foregoing testimony concerning the identification of the photograph and the photograph itself, which motion was denied. Counsel for the people recalled Leach, who testified as follows:

"Q. Now, Mr. Leach, I show you the photograph, People's Exhibit No. 7, and I will ask if you have seen that photograph before. A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Approximately when was that, if you remember? A. I could not give the date—some time ago.

"Q. Who was it that showed you that photograph? A. Sergeant Slattery, city detective.

"Q. Now, at that time, did you have any conversation with him in regard to this photograph? A. I cannot recall—I may have.

"Q. I will ask you whether or not you identified this photograph as being a photograph of the man you saw there in the lobby of the bank. A. I think I did.

"Mr. Johnson: Just a moment, I object to that on the ground it is wholly incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, calling for the opinion and conclusion of the witness, based upon hearsay testimony.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"A. I think I did."

Hadley was also recalled, and the following occurred:

"Q. Now I show you the photograph, People's Exhibit No. 7, and I will ask you if you have seen that photograph before. A. Yes, sir.

"Q. By whom was that photograph shown you? A. Why, it was by the detectives' department of the San Diego police.

"Q. Was it Sergeant Slattery? A. I do not recall whether it was Sergeant Slattery or not.

"Q. You do not recall the individual? A. No.

"Q. At any time that picture was shown you, did you identify that as being the picture of the man who had purchased these traveler's checks at your window and passed the $151 check—just answer 'Yes' or 'No.'

"Mr. Johnson: Just a minute, we object to that on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, calling for the opinion and conclusion of the witness, based on hearsay testimony.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"A. Yes, sir."

Cosgrove was recalled and testified that Slattery had shown him the photograph. Neither Leach nor Hadley were asked if they could identify the defendant as the man presenting the checks. Cosgrove testified that he could not identify the defendant.

The foregoing excerpts from the transcript furnish an extreme illustration of a prosecutor, by indirection, and by the use of hearsay and incompetent testimony, attempting to bolster up a weak case against a defendant where there was no satisfactory evidence identifying him as the man who committed the crime. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution was not intended to apply in a case of this kind. The error was prejudicial to the defendant, and his conviction cannot be sustained. People v. Turner, 93 Cal. App. 133, 269 P. 204; People v. Vasquez, 93 Cal. App. 448, 269 P. 549; People v. Adams, 92 Cal. App. 6, 267 P. 906.

The defendant testified that he was never in San Diego prior to his arrest, over a year after the forgery. He presented some evidence in support of this alibi. The trial court instructed the jury on the question of the defense of an alibi along the lines of the instruction given in the case of People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 P. 183. This instruction has been criticized in many cases and should not be given. People v. Girotti, 67 Cal. App. 399, 227 P. 936; People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 55 P. 137; People v. Smith, 189 Cal. 31, 207 P. 518; People v. Arnold, 199 Cal. 471, 250 P. 168.

The other errors complained of will, in all probability, not occur at another trial of the case.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant appellant's motion for a new trial.

SWITZLER v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY.
CO. et al.★
Civ. 4012.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Feb. 19, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 21, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 17, 1930.

1. Railroads ⇨328(2)—Automobile driver is negligent in not stopping at obstructed crossing to look and listen for train.

Where it was not shown that automobile was stopped in order that parties therein might look and listen for approaching train, although it was clear that view was more or less obstructed, it would seem that driver of automobile was negligent.

2. Railroads ⇨327(12)—Guest riding in automobile must use "ordinary care and prudence" to insure his personal safety at railroad crossing.

Guest riding in automobile must use "ordinary care and prudence" to insure his own personal safety, that is, he must use such reasonable care and prudence as ordinarily prudent person would exercise under like circumstances, but guest, when not having any control, supervision or management over automobile, is not placed in same legal situation as driver, as regards liability for collision at railroad crossing.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Ordinary Care," see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series.]

3. Railroads ⇨350(21)—Negligence of guest in automobile at railroad crossing, held for jury.

In action against railroad for injury to guest in automobile in accident at crossing, evidence held sufficient to take to jury question whether plaintiff was negligent.

4. Railroads ⇨327(12)—Guest in automobile may assume driver will drive in proper manner and take necessary precautions at railroad crossing.

Guest in automobile has right, in using ordinary and usual care which prudent person is required to exercise, to assume that automobile driver will drive in proper manner and will take necessary precautions to safeguard lives of his guests in driving upon railroad crossing.

5. Negligence $\S$ 136(30)—Automobile driver's negligence is not imputable as matter of law to guest.

Negligence of automobile driver, even in approaching railway crossings, is not imputable, as matter of law, to guest or passenger having no control or direction over operation of machine.

6. Railroads $\S$ 350(7)—Whether bell and whistle sounded held for jury in action involving crossing collision.

In action against railroad for injury to guest in automobile in collision at crossing, evidence held sufficient to take to jury question whether bell was rung and whistle sounded.

7. Appeal and error $\S$ 1003—Reviewing court is bound by finding though triers of facts gave credence to negative testimony, notwithstanding that positive testimony is of greater weight.

Positive testimony is doubtless of greater weight than negative testimony, and hence testimony that witnesses heard signals of railroad train is of greater probative force than statement of other witnesses that they did not hear any signals, but where triers of facts have given credence to negative testimony, reviewing court is bound by finding.

8. Jury $\S$ 135—Right of peremptory challenge in civil cases is statutory (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 601).

Exercise of peremptory challenge in civil cases is purely right or privilege granted by statute such as Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 601, since at common law there was no right of peremptory challenge in civil actions.

9. Jury $\S$ 136(6)—In action against railroad and automobile driver for injury to guest in crossing collision, defendants must join in four peremptory challenges (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 601).

In action for injury to guest in automobile received in collision with train at railroad crossing, brought against railroad and against driver of automobile, Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 601, under which each party is entitled to four peremptory challenges, must be construed to require all of defendants to join in four peremptory challenges, as against contention that defendant railroad was entitled to four and that driver of automobile was also entitled to four.

10. Appeal and error $\S$ 1045(1)—Unless injury is shown, any error in permitting plaintiff to exercise peremptory challenge after once having passed jury is without prejudice.

Any error in permitting plaintiff to exercise peremptory challenge after once having passed jury is not prejudicial in absence of showing that defendants were injured by ruling, since party is not entitled to have any particular juror sit on his case and any error in allowing challenge is without prejudice, if it appears that fair and impartial jury was obtained.

11. Railroads $\S$ 236—Railroad speed ordinance is competent evidence in personal injury case.

Ordinance regulating speed of trains passed in proper exercise of police power, in interest of safety and for protection of public, is competent evidence in personal injury case.

12. Railroads $\S$ 236—Power to pass ordinances regulating speed of trains within city limits may be implied from general powers of city.

Ordinances regulating speed of trains within city limits are police regulations and power to pass them need not be given in express terms, but may be implied from general powers of city, as to abate nuisances and provide for public welfare.

13. Municipal corporations $\S$ 592(2)—Ordinance regulating speed of trains held not in contravention of statute or of rules or regulations of railroad commission (St. 1915, p. 137, $\S$ 42; Const. art. 11, $\S\S$ 6, 8, and art. 12, $\S$ 23).

Ordinance of city of Stockton regulating speed of trains held not in contravention of any act of Legislature or of any rules or regulations promulgated by railroad commission, notwithstanding St. 1915, p. 137, $\S$ 42, relative to powers of railroad commission and Const. art. 11, $\S\S$ 6, 8, and article 12, $\S$ 23, relative to authority of incorporated city.

14. Railroads $\S$ 347(10)—Speed ordinance held properly admitted where testimony showed railroad was exceeding limit set therein.

Where there was testimony in action against railroad for injury to guest in automobile in crossing collision that speed limit in ordinance was being exceeded by defendant, ordinance was properly admitted.

15. Appeal and error $\S$ 1003—Where there was sufficient testimony to support verdict, reviewing court cannot disturb judgment because testimony apparently favored appellant.

Where there was sufficient testimony in record to support verdict which was against railroad but exonerated automobile driver in action for injury to guest in automobile in crossing accident, reviewing court is not at liberty to disturb judgment entered thereon, because testimony apparently favored railroad as to sounding of bell and whistle and indicated automobile driver should also have been found liable.

16. Trial $\S$ 260(1)—When subject is covered, it is not helpful to repeat instructions in slightly different language.

When subject is once covered by instructions in personal injury action, it does not appear helpful to repeat instruction in slightly different language.

17. Trial $\S$ 260(1)—Verdict will not be disturbed for any error in refusing instruction on subjects which were sufficiently covered.

Where subjects on which refused instructions were requested were sufficiently covered in action for injury in collision between train and automobile at railroad crossing, verdict will not be disturbed for any alleged errors in relation thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Violet Scott Switzler against Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant and others appeal.

Affirmed.

Robert Brennan, M. W. Reed, E. T. Lucey, Leo E. Sievert, and H. K. Lockwood, all of Los Angeles, and Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton, for appellants.

Charles H. Vance and Levinsky & Jones, all of Stockton, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

For convenience, the plaintiff in this action will be referred to as the plaintiff, and the three appellants, simply as appellants.

The plaintiff had judgment against the appellants in an action prosecuted by her against the appellants and the defendant Leo F. Sweem, to recover damages suffered by reason of a collision between an automobile driven by the defendant Leo F. Sweem, and an engine drawing a train of cars belonging to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, and operated by J. J. Scott, as engineer, and C. A. Parks, as fireman.

The complaint alleges that the automobile was driven carelessly and negligently by the defendant Leo F. Sweem, and that the train belonging to the railroad company was operated carelessly and negligently, at an excessive rate of speed, and without warning, through and over the public streets of the city of Stockton; and further, that no sufficient and adequate warning signals were placed, maintained, or in operation at the crossing where the collision involved in this action, occurred.

The record shows that a collision occurred between an automobile driven by the defendant Leo F. Sweem, in which the plaintiff was riding as a guest, and an engine operated by the appellant at a point where the Santa Fé Railway Company, passing through the city of Stockton intersects a certain highway therein known as El Dorado street. The collision occurred at about 11:30 p. m. of April 30, 1927. The automobile in which the plaintiff was riding was of the type commonly known as a "Paige" coupé, with a rumble seat. However, the plaintiff and three others were all riding in the front seat, the plaintiff occupying a position in the front seat partly upon the seat and partly upon the lap of one of the other passengers therein. The party in the coupé were traveling southward on El Dorado street; the train operated by the appellants was traveling eastward. El Dorado street and the tracks of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway, intersect at practically right angles. The main track of the railway company is maintained along what is known as "Taylor" street; the first street to the north of Taylor street is "Scotts Avenue"; the first street to the west of El Dorado street is "Center Street"; and the street immediately east of El Dorado street is known as "Hunter Street." Between Scotts avenue and Taylor street are some ten or twelve different railroad tracks. Immediately to the north of the main line of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway is a switching track known as and called the "House Track." This track runs along by the side of a freight shed belonging to and used by the company, situate between El Dorado and Center streets. The area west of El Dorado street and east of Center street, lying between Taylor street and Scotts avenue, contains a number of buildings. The freight shed just referred to is a one-story structure having a loading platform which extends approximately 150 feet east from the east wall of the freight shed. The record also shows that there is a structure on this platform used for housing freight, being protected by a roof and on the sides by upright slats. This structure is situate at the northeast corner of the platform to which we have just referred. This slatted structure, as appears by the photographic exhibits, is of the form and outlines of ordinary box cars. Upon the night of the 30th of April, 1927, the plaintiff, in company with the others, was traveling southward on El Dorado street, as hereinbefore stated, and as the automobile reached a point where the main line of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company intersects El Dorado street, the automobile came in collision with the pilot of the engine. There is much contention as to whether the automobile struck the engine or whether the engine collided with the automobile. It would appear from the record that an instant before the collision the automobile was swerved slightly to the left, as the impact of the pilot of the engine appears to have been upon the portion of the automobile just in the rear of the front right wheel, the record showing, however, that the left-hand side of the pilot was more or less shattered by the impact. Although there is testimony in the record that just prior to the collision the automobile had been slowed down to a speed of five miles an hour, the record shows that its speed was sufficient so that the occupants, as well as the wrecked automobile, were carried completely across the railroad track and landed on the pavement of El Dorado street to the south. This physical fact would indicate that the speed of the automobile was much in excess of five miles per hour, as the sudden stop of an automobile not traveling over five miles an hour would not catapult anyone the distance shown to have taken place in this case. The testimony of one Rieger, who was driving an automobile, is to the effect that when about 150 feet from the point of collision, and driving at about ten miles per hour, the machine in which the plaintiff was riding passed him at at least double his speed. The fact that all of the party and the wreck were propelled entirely across the railroad track and some distance to the south thereof, instead of being thrown eastward by the force of the collision with the engine, would indicate that the speed of the automobile had not been materially slackened. However, the jury in this case found in favor of the defendant, Leo F. Sweem, and we are not concerned with his contributory negligence, save and except as to whether it was of such a character that contributory negligence would likewise be imputed to the plaintiff herein.

[1] There is no testimony that the automobile was stopped in order that the parties therein might look and listen for an approaching train, although it is clear from the records that the view to the westward was more or less obstructed. Under the conditions presented it would seem clear that the driver of the automobile in question was negligent under the rule laid down in the case of Koster et al. v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 279 P. 788, and likewise, in the case of Barnett v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co. (Cal. App.) 278 P. 443, and the cases there cited. The testimony of all of the occupants of the car was to the effect that they heard no warning bell, that they heard no whistle; nor did they perceive the noise of the approaching train, which consisted of an engine, thirty-six cars and a caboose. The testimony of the occupants of the automobile was also to the effect that they were listening to determine whether there was any indication of an approaching train, and heard no warning. The record shows that an electric arc light is maintained at the intersection of El Dorado and Taylor streets in such a position that it casts a bright light over the immediate point of contact involved in this action, and would to some extent mingle with the headlight of an approaching train and the headlights of an approaching automobile in such a manner as not to give warning of the approaching train. The record contains testimony on behalf of the appellants to the effect that the bell on the engine, operated by an automatic contrivance, had been set in operation some distance to the westward of El Dorado street, and that the station whistle had been sounded. A few seconds before the collision actually occurred, the fireman on the engine saw the approaching automobile, gave three short whistle blasts, and called to the engineer to stop, who immediately did everything that could be done to bring the train to a standstill. From the hour of 6 a. m. to 10 p. m., the company at the time maintained a flagman. After 10 p. m. and until 6 a. m. an electric signal was in continuous operation, giving warning that no flagman was maintained. The foregoing constitute the salient features of the testimony set out in the transcript.

[2-5] Departing somewhat from the order of attack made by the appellants in this case, we will first consider the question of con-

tributory negligence, waiving the question as to whether such negligence was or is properly pleaded. This question has been before the appeal courts of this state a number of times, and it seems to be pretty well settled that a guest riding in an automobile must use ordinary care and prudence to insure his own personal safety, that is, he must use such reasonable care and prudence as an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under like circumstances. However, a guest when not having any control, supervision or management over the automobile, is not placed in the same legal situation as the driver. As stated in Carpenter v. Atchison, Topeka Ry. Co., 51 Cal. App. 60, 195 P. 1073, 1075: "Interference by the passenger or guest where the vehicle is about to be placed in a position of danger might prove to be gross imprudence and so disconcert the driver as to cause the disastrous result which such interference was designed to avoid." And further, the opinion in that case states, referring to the driver: "For aught that appears to the contrary, he might have reasonably believed that Gibson intended to and would have either stopped or increased the speed of the car and thus have easily escaped the threatened peril." The opinion in that case quotes from a number of other cases, and then the rule approved is as follows: "Assuming that deceased, when the automobile which he occupied as a passenger or guest, reached the point 30 feet distant from the crossing, and traveling at a speed of only 4 miles per hour, saw the train 300 feet away therefrom and approaching at a high rate of speed, we cannot say as a matter of law that his failure to interfere with the driver's operation of the car rather than to rely upon the latter's judgment in escaping the threatened danger, nor that his failure to leave the car, constituted contributory negligence. The question as presented was one of fact which should have been left to the verdict of the jury." In Curran v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., 77 Cal. App. 462, 247 P. 236, 239, we find the following: "While one who knows, or should know, that the driver is carelessly operating the car must use ordinary care for his own safety, and it is incumbent upon him to take proper steps for his own protection, still whether by failing to protest against the course being pursued by the driver, or to leave the vehicle, constituted a want of ordinary care which proximately contributed to his injuries was a question of fact to be submitted to the jury, unless from the evidence but one conclusion might reasonably be drawn." The following cases all show that whether the guest is chargeable with contributory negligence in not protesting with the driver, or doing anything to interfere with his management and control of the car, is a question to be submitted to the jury under proper instructions: Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel Gold Mining Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143

P. 714; Hardi v. Central Cal. Traction Co., 36 Cal. App. 488, 172 P. 763; Dover v. Archambeault, 57 Cal. App. 659, 208 P. 178; Carpenter v. Atchison, Topeka & S. F. Ry. Co., 51 Cal. App. 60, 195 P. 1073; Curran v. Earle C. Anthony Co., 77 Cal. App. 462, 247 P. 236; Drouillard v. Southern Pac. Co., 36 Cal. App. 447, 172 P. 405. These authorities are sufficient to show that in the instant case the negligence of the plaintiff was properly left to the determination of the jury. We may properly call attention, however, to the case of Campion v. Ira L. Eakle, 79 Colo. 320, 246 P. 280, 47 A. L. R. 289, and the extended notes appended thereto beginning on page 293. It may be further stated that the facts and circumstances attending the driving of the automobile involved in the collision under consideration are entirely different from instances where the facts show the guest or passenger to have been aware of the careless and negligent habits of an automobile driver, or of his intoxicated condition, where the courts would be called upon to declare a plaintiff riding as a guest, guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Here, there is nothing indicating that the plaintiff had any knowledge of any reckless, careless or inattentive manner of driving an automobile by the defendant Leo Sweem, until it was too late to interpose any objections or protest against his manner of driving, as a guest has a right, in using the ordinary and usual care which a prudent person is required to exercise, to assume that an automobile driver will drive in a proper manner and will take the necessary precautions to safeguard the lives of his guests or passengers, and in the absence of any want of knowledge to the contrary, under the authorities the question of contributory negligence must go to the jury. That the negligence of an automobile driver, even in approaching railway crossings, is not imputable, as a matter of law, to a guest or passenger having no control or direction over the operation of the machine, clearly appears by the text found in 3 California Jurisprudence, pp. 853, 854, and 855, and the authorities in the footnotes supporting the text.

[6, 7] Upon the question of whether any warning was given by the appellants of the approach of the train, testimony pro and con has been urged upon our attention—on the part of the appellants, that the testimony is positive that the bell was rung when the whistle sounded; on the part of the respondent, that no such signals were heard. This again presents only a subject proper for the consideration of the jury. In 22 California Jurisprudence, p. 311, the rule is thus stated: "Positive testimony is doubtless of greater weight than negative testimony. Hence, the testimony of witnesses to the effect that they heard signals is of greater probative force than the statement of other witnesses that they did not hear any signals. But where the triers of facts has given credence to the negative testimony, the reviewing court is bound by the finding that the signals were not sounded." The footnotes cite a number of cases. See, also, Jones v. Southern Pacific Co., 74 Cal. App. 10, 239 P. 429, where additional cases on this subject are cited.

[8, 9] This brings us to the principal grounds urged for reversal upon this appeal, to wit, the rule of the court in the selection of the jury, the admission of an ordinance of the city of Stockton regulating the speed of trains, and alleged errors in the instructions given by the court to the jury. Upon the selection of the jury the defendants in the action were restricted to the exercise of four peremptory challenges. Upon this appeal it is contended by the appellants that they were entitled to four peremptory challenges and that the defendant Sweem was likewise entitled to four peremptory challenges. This, upon the theory that the appellants and Leo F. Sweem constituted antagonistic parties, the appellants claiming that the defendant Leo F. Sweem was wholly chargeable for the collision and the resultant injuries to the plaintiff. Section 601 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads: "Either party may challenge the jurors, but where there are several parties on either side, they must join in the challenge before it can be made. The challenges are to individual jurors, and are either peremptory or for cause. Each party is entitled to four peremptory challenges," etc. Under the construction contended for by the appellants, the plaintiff would have four challenges, the appellants four and the defendant Leo F. Sweem, four. Following the rule adopted in some of the eastern states, where the subject is unregulated by statute, the appellants' contention would appear to be correct. The exercise of a peremptory challenge in civil cases is purely a right or privilege granted by statute. As said in 35 C. J. p. 406, § 460: "At common law there is no right of peremptory challenge in civil actions. The right is, therefore, purely statutory, and does not exist except where expressly so conferred, but such provision has now been very generally made." And further, in the same volume, section 468, it is said: "In civil actions where there are several plaintiffs or several defendants, the general rule is that all on one side constitute but one party, and are entitled only to the number of peremptory challenges allowed a single plaintiff or defendant, and statutes giving to each party a certain number of peremptory challenges are uniformly so construed"—citing a number of cases in the footnotes.

In some of the states where the statutes do not so provide, it appears that a different rule prevails. Thus, as said in 35 C. J. p. 410: "The rule, however, is to be applied according to the reasons upon which it is based and limited to cases in which the positions of the several parties upon the same side are similar, so while the fact that several defendants who set up a common defense plead separately does not entitle them to any additional peremptory challenges, the rule is otherwise where they set up separate and distinct defenses presenting different issues, or where the parties on one side, although having a common cause against the other, have conflicting rights among themselves which the verdict of the jury will affect." However, on the same page, and as a part of the same section of Corpus Juris, we find the following: "The statutes sometimes expressly provide that if there are several parties on either side of a controversy they must all join in their challenges, and in such case the rule allowing parties appearing separately to interpose separate challenges cannot obtain"—citing a number of authorities. The earliest case touching on this subject which we have discovered is that of People v. McCalla et al., 8 Cal. 301, which, however, is a criminal case. There it was held that under the statute then prevailing, even in capital cases where there were several defendants tried together, they were required to join in their peremptory challenges as well as their challenges for cause. The later amendments regulating challenges do not affect the rule stated. In 15 California Jurisprudence, page 407, § 79, the rule in relation to joinder of challenges is thus stated: "In civil actions, where there are several parties on either side, they must join in the challenge before it can be made. In construing these provisions it has been held in criminal cases defendants must join in peremptory challenges as well as in those for cause. The provision of the Code of Civil Procedure does not deny persons the equal protection of the laws and thus violate the fourteenth amendment, for the same rule applies to all the parties to an action where they are united with others either as plaintiffs or defendants." In County of San Luis Obispo v. Simas, 1 Cal. App. 175, 81 P. 972, section 601 of the Code of Civil Procedure was construed to require all of the defendants to join in the challenges irrespective of interest. In Muller v. Hale, 138 Cal. 163, 71 P. 81, it is said: "Either party may challenge the jurors; but where there are several parties on either side they must join in a challenge before it can be made."

* * * A similar provision was contained in the old practice act. The appellant concedes that the ruling of the court was justified by the statute in this state, but contends that it violates the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in that it denies persons equal protection of the laws. We see nothing in this contention, inasmuch as the same rule applies to all the parties to an action where they are united with others either as plaintiffs or defendants." As we read the case of Muller v. Hale, we find that the defendants had antagonistic interests, each trying to shift the onus of the alleged negligence leading to the plaintiff's injury upon the shoulders of the other defendant, precisely similar to the circumstances presented in the instant case. In Crandall v. Puget Sound Traction, etc., Co., 77 Wash. 37, 137 P. 319, a similar question was presented to the supreme court of Washington. Among other things, it was there said: "The right of peremptory challenge of jurors is wholly statutory, and the Legislature may withhold the right entirely, or it may grant it with restrictions." The statute there under consideration is practically identical with section 601, Code of Civil Procedure, and while the reasoning set forth in the opinion in that case, and taken particularly from the case of Colfax National Bank v. Davis, 50 Wash. 92, 96 P. 823, 16 Ann. Cas. 264, answers every objection urged by the appellants, it is too long to be set forth herein, but we think is absolutely conclusive against any other construction than that under section 601, Code of Civil Procedure, all the defendants must join just as the wording of the statute directs.

A different rule apparently prevails in the state of Montana, as appears from a consideration of the case of Mullery v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 50 Mont. 408, 148 P. 323, but the statute there interpreted reads differently. In the case of Chenoweth v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 50 Mont. 481, 148 P. 330, the Supreme Court of Montana again holds that where two defendants, sued jointly, are in fact hostile, so as to entitle them to separate peremptory challenges, but one of them sits by and allows the other to exercise the challenges alternately with the plaintiff without calling the court's attention to his rights to a separate challenge, such party is held to have waived his challenges. In the case at bar, it does appear that the court stated, while there was actually nothing before the trial court to be decided, its views as to how it would hold on the question of challenges, using these words: "In other words, I will let you know how the court will rule. You will know better how to protect yourself. It is my holding that you in the aggregate have but four peremptory challenges;" an examination of the record shows that the respective defendants, without any objection to any of the challenges made by either of the defendants, joined in all of the four peremptory challenges exercised by the defendants, and after the four peremptory challenges in which all of the defendants joined had been exercised, no challenge was interposed by either of the defendants that would give the court an opportunity to rule. On an examination of the cases relied upon by the appellants, touching the construction which should be given section 601 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we find that they are based upon entirely different statutory or code provisions. The principal case, that of Rutland v. St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 274 S. W. 284, 285, among other things says: "The rule is to treat several defendants as one party within the meaning of the statute * * * declaring that 'each party to civil suit in the district court shall be entitled to six peremptory challenges,' unless such defendants have conflicting rights which the verdict of the jury will affect." Citing a number of cases. There does not appear to be anything in the opinion in that case, or in any of the cases cited by the appellants, corresponding to the provisions of our Code of Civil Procedure, requiring the parties to join in their challenges. We think the rule is well established in California and in other states having similar statutes or code provisions, that section 601 of the Code of Civil Procedure must be so construed as to require all of the defendants to join in the four peremptory challenges.

[10] Objection is also urged that the court permitted the plaintiff to exercise a peremptory challenge after once having passed the jury. Nothing is set forth showing that the appellants were injured by this ruling of the court. The plaintiff, in fact, was only allowed to exercise four peremptory challenges. In 15 California Jurisprudence, page 410, § 82, the rule applicable to this ruling of the court is thus stated: "One is not entitled to have any particular juror sit upon his case so that, as has been pointed out in another article, any error in allowing a challenge, either peremptory or for cause * * * is without prejudice, where it appears that a fair and impartial jury was obtained." See, also, Jones v. Southern Pacific Co., supra.

[11-13] After testimony had been adduced relative to the rate of speed at which appellants' train was being propelled, both to the effect that it was in excess of 8 miles per hour, and also to the effect that it was not, an ordinance of the city of Stockton was introduced in evidence, which ordinance limits the speed of trains within the corporate limits of the city to 8 miles per hour. Upon the proposal of plaintiff's counsel to read the ordinance to the jury, counsel for appellants interposed the following objection: "And to the reading of the ordinance at this time, on behalf of the defendants whom I represent, I object to the reading of the ordinance on the ground that it is unconstitutional; that the defendant Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company is a common carrier of interstate commerce, and that as such no municipality, or either state or municipal ordinances, have power to place any burden or restriction upon interstate commerce, and that such power rests solely with the Congress of the United States, under the Constitution of the United States, and that any ordinance, or this ordinance in particular, is unconstitutional so far as interstate commerce and this defendant is concerned." It may be here stated that the testimony indicated that the train involved was partly loaded with merchandise destined for places outside of California, and was carrying interstate commerce to that extent.

Upon this appeal, the objection taken in the trial court appears to be abandoned, and it is now urged that the regulation of the speed of trains through municipalities lies solely within the jurisdiction and power of the railroad commission, and that any attempted exercise thereof by an incorporated municipality is void. In the case of Cleveland, Cinn., Chicago & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Grambo, reported in 103 Ohio St. 471, 134 N. E. 648, 20 A. L. R. 1214, the Supreme Court of Ohio thus disposes of the constitutional question. (We are quoting from the syllabus): "An ordinance regulating the speed of trains through a municipality, enacted under the exercise of police power, which conforms to the limitations prescribed by the Legislature, is presumptively reasonable and valid, and not in conflict with the state or federal Constitutions. But the presumption may be rebutted, and in order to overcome such presumption a railway company must affirmatively show its unreasonableness." No testimony was offered in the instant case tending to show the unreasonableness of the ordinance limiting the speed of trains. The Ohio case to which we have just referred further holds: "That an ordinance regulating speed, passed in the proper exercise of the police power, in the interest of the safety and for the protection of the public, is competent evidence in a personal injury case, under the settled law of Ohio." The same rule prevails in California. As to the reasonableness of ordinances regulating the speed of trains in various municipalities, reference may be had to the annotation following the Ohio case, beginning on page 1222 of 20 A. L. R. A consideration of the cases there quoted leads to the conclusion that no objection could be urged to the reasonableness of the speed specified in the Stockton ordinance.

In 22 R. C. L. p. 800, it is said: "It is very generally held that ordinances regulating the speed of trains within city limits are police regulations, and that the power to pass them need not be given in express terms, but may be implied from the general powers of the city, as to abate nuisances and provide for the general welfare." We think no further citation is necessary in support of the power of municipalities to adopt ordinances regulating the speed of trains, and that such ordinances properly come within the purview of what is generally known as police powers.

In support of appellants' contention that the ordinance of the city of Stockton is inapplicable, and that it was error to read it to the jury and to instruct the jury with reference thereto, the following Illinois cases are called to our attention: In City of Witt v. Cleveland, C. & St. Louis Ry. Co., 324 Ill. 494, 155 N. E. 325, the Supreme Court of Illinois held that the laws of 1921, p. 733, § 57, creating the public utilities commission, withdrawing from cities and villages powers theretofore exercised by them with reference to speed and operation of railway trains running through cities, and vested such power in what is now called the commerce commission, and therefore, that ordinances attempting to regulate the speed of trains, adopted by municipalities, were void. In the case of Northern Trust Co. v. Chicago Rys. Co., 318 Ill. 402, 149 N. E. 422, 425, with reference to an ordinance requiring certain headlights to be upon street cars, it was held under the Public Utilities Act of 1913, which became effective January 1, 1914, inoperative and void, as the commission was given power to require every public utility to maintain and operate its equipment in such a manner as to promote and safeguard the public safety; to prescribe the installation, use and maintenance of appropriate safety devices or appliances; and to require the performance of any other acts which the public safety might demand. And further, that "the act charged the commission, so far as the operation of a public utility in the streets of a city was concerned, with the duty of protecting and promoting the safety of the public, and vested in the commission plenary power to perform that duty."

In the case of Chester v. Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co., 247 Ill. App. 505, where a speed ordinance was being considered, the court said: "While prior to January 1, 1914, cities in this State had power to pass ordinances regulating the speed of trains while passing through such cities, the General Assembly by the passage of 'An act to provide for the regulation of public utilities,' approved June 30, 1913, in force January 1, 1914, created the Public Utilities Commission, and by 'an act concerning public utilities,' approved June 29, 1921, in force July 1, 1921, * * * created the Commerce Commission and vested it with general supervision of all public utilities, including the power, by general or special orders, rules or regulations, or otherwise, to require every public utility to maintain and operate its plant, equipment or other property in such manner as to promote and safeguard the health and safety of its employees, passengers, customers and the public, and to this end to require the performance of any act which the health or safety of its employees, passengers, customers or the public may demand. * * * By this act the General Assembly, in its discretion, withdrew from cities and villages the power theretofore exercised by them with reference to the speed and operation of railway trains and such power is now vested in the Commerce Commission, another agency of the government."

In this connection our attention is called to section 42 of the act (St. 1915, p. 137), relative to powers of the railroad commission, wherein it is authorized, "to require every public utility to construct, maintain and operate its line, plant, system, equipment, apparatus, tracks and premises in such manner as to promote and safeguard the health and safety of its employees, passengers, customers, and the public, and to this end to prescribe, among other things, the installation, use, maintenance and operation of appropriate safety or other devices or appliances, including interlocking and other protective devices at grade crossings or junctions and block or other systems of signalling, to establish uniform or other standards of construction and equipment, and to require the performance of any other act which the health or safety of its employees, passengers, customers or the public may demand." Further attention is called to the power of the railroad commission relative to street crossings, the installation, operation and maintenance of signalling devices, etc., which need not be further specifically mentioned. Under this section and the Illinois cases it is urged that no power exists outside of the railroad commission to enact any ordinances relative to the speed of trains within the corporate limits of municipalities. While the Illinois cases apparently support the contention of the appellants, an examination of the constitution of the state of Illinois reveals the fact that the Public Utilities or Commerce Commission Act, as it is now called in that state, has no constitutional limitation such as we find in our own organic instrument. By section 7½ of article 11 of our Constitution chartered municipalities are given very wide and extensive powers, limited only to the extent that their ordinances do not conflict with general laws.

Again, section 23 of article 12 of the Constitution under which the railroad commission of this state exists, contains the following: "From and after the passage by the Legislature of laws conferring powers upon the Railroad Commission respecting public utilities, all powers respecting such public utilities vested in boards of supervisors, or municipal councils, or other governing bodies of the several counties, cities and counties, cities and towns, in this State, or in any commission created by law and existing at the time of the passage of such laws, shall cease so far as such powers shall conflict with the powers so conferred upon the Railroad Commission; provided, however, that this section shall not affect such powers of control over public utilities as relate to the making and enforcement of local, police, sanitary and other regulations, other than the fixing of rates, vested in any city and county or incorporated city or town as, at an election to be held pursuant to law, a majority of the qualified electors of such city and county, or incorporated city or town, voting thereon, shall vote to retain, and until such election such powers shall continue unimpaired," etc.

While sections 6 and 8 of article 11 of the Constitution limit the authority of incorporated cities to a legislating upon municipal affairs, and in a manner so as not to contravene general laws, and is referred to in many of the cases bearing upon the powers of municipalities, it would appear by the express provisions which we have quoted from section 23 of article 12, of the Constitution, that if the subject legislated upon is a local police regulation, then and in that event it is within the reservation contained in the section, or rather, within the proviso contained within the section, notwithstanding that the section previously specifies that the powers conferred upon the railroad commission respecting public utilities is declared to be plenary and unlimited by any provision of the Constitution. Section 23 of article 12 must be read as a whole, and if it appears, as we have stated, that the subject legislated upon is exclusively local, and a police regulation in character, the authority to so legislate is vested in incorporated cities. We may further state that there is nothing in the record showing that the Legislature has ever passed any act regulating the speed of trains through incorporated municipalities, nor does it appear from the record that the railroad commission has ever enacted or promulgated any rules or regulations relative to the speed of trains through incorporated cities. From this it follows that the ordinance of the city of Stockton is not shown to be in contravention of any act of Legislature or of any rules or regulations promulgated by the railroad commission. That the character of signal devices to be given at railroad crossings, and the manner of constructing grade crossings, overhead crossings and underground passageways are subjects in which the general public are concerned, and therefore of state-wide and not purely local interests, does not detract in the least from the police power reserved to incorporated cities to enact ordinances safeguarding its inhabitants from the perils of excessive speed. The cases of San Bernardino v. Railroad Commission, 190 Cal. 562, 213 P. 980, Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 441, 166 P. 351; Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 P. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822, and City of San Jose v. Railway Commission, 175 Cal. 284, 165 P. 967, relied upon by the appellants, have to do only with the physical properties of railroads and matters of state-wide interest, and not with purely local police regulations coming within the proviso set forth in section 23 of article 12 of the Constitution.

[14] While practically all of the cases relating to speed ordinances hold that they may be attacked on the grounds of unreasonableness, no such attack is made in this case, and therefore, we are not called upon to consider this phase of the ordinance. There being testimony in the record to the effect that the speed limit in the ordinance was being exceeded, the ordinance was properly admitted, and the jury correctly instructed in relation thereto.

[15] It is further insisted that the verdict of the jury exonerating the defendant Sweem, and holding the appellants liable, furnishes sufficient evidence of passion and prejudice on the part of the jury to warrant a reversal. It is likewise strongly argued that the weight of the testimony favors the appellants. In order that a full statement of the case might appear, we have set forth the facts in relation to the operation of the automobile by the defendant Sweem so that the rule relative to imputed negligence on the part of the plaintiff might be properly considered. While we may agree with the appellants that the jury should also have found against the defendant Sweem, and while we may also agree with the appellants that in view of the positive testimony that the whistle was sounded and the bell was ringing as the train approached the crossing, and while we may also agree with the appellants that the fact that the locomotive was equipped with an automatic bell-ringing device is persuasive in favor of the testimony given by the engineer and fireman, yet as there is testimony in the record to the contrary, the triers of fact having sufficient upon which to base their verdict, we are not at liberty to disturb the judgment entered thereon, because the testimony in the record apparently favors the appellants upon these issues. The case of People v. McCalla, which we have heretofore cited, is a good example of where the courts may not interfere because of the disparity of the verdict as to the different defendants involved. In that case two men were jointly indicted and tried for the crime of murder. One was convicted of murder in the first degree without recommendation. The other was convicted only of manslaughter. The judgment in that case was upheld without the court attempting to reconcile the two verdicts. Having accepted the testimony of the plaintiff, we may agree with appellants that the verdict should have been against all of the defendants, but as there is sufficient testimony in the record to support the verdict as returned, we are not called upon to reason why, as to the verdict rendered in favor of the defendant Sweem.

[16, 17] It is finally contended that the court erred in its instructions to the jury. In this behalf the appellants have failed to comply with the provisions of rule 8, relative to the rules governing appeals to this court; nevertheless, we have carefully read all the instructions given by the court, and the refused instructions requested by the appellants. This reading leads to the conclusion that the jury was correctly and painstakingly instructed. The only objection, if objection can be urged thereto, is that they were somewhat too voluminous. When a subject is once covered, it does not appear helpful to repeat an instruction in a little different language. The practice of requesting instructions couched in a little different language, relating to the same subject, neither aids the court nor assists the jury. The refused instructions in this case, when compared with the instructions given by the court, amount to nothing more than a repetition, in different language, of instructions actually given. The subjects upon which the refused instructions were requested, being sufficiently covered, no reason exists for disturbing the verdict for any alleged errors in relation thereto.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Prisons ☞15—Order suspending parole, pending investigation of complaint did not cancel credits prisoner had earned (St. 1915, p. 981, § 1½).

Where state board of prison directors ordered that prisoner's parole be suspended pending investigation of a complaint and that prisoner be retaken and returned to actual custody to abide further order of board, effect of order was merely to terminate for time being right of prisoner to be outside of prison walls during remainder of term, and it did not ex vi termini purport to cancel any credits which prisoner had earned in view of St. 1915, p. 981, § 1½, providing that cancellation of credits shall not take place until hearing before board has been had so that therefore prisoner's term ran on without interruption and terminated before habeas corpus proceeding to gain his release.

2. Prisons ☞15—Whether credits of prisoner whose parole was suspended should be canceled to revive part of term cannot be inquired into after term had expired.

Where term of imprisonment of prisoner whose parole had been suspended pending investigation of a complaint had already expired prior to habeas corpus proceeding to obtain his release from prison, whether credits which prisoner had earned should be canceled could not be inquired into for purpose of reviving part of term which had expired.

STURTEVANT, J.

[1] This application involves the question as to when the term of the imprisonment of the petitioner expired or will expire. The petitioner was convicted of issuing a check with intent to defraud, and was sentenced to serve the term provided by law in a state prison. He was received at the prison September 4, 1922. His term was fixed at ten (10) years on July 14, 1923. The credits which he earned amounted to three (3) years and six (6) months. Nothing to the contrary appearing, his term would have expired March 4, 1929. He was granted parole September 11, 1927. Thereafter he was constructively a prisoner till the end of his term—a prisoner outside of the prison walls instead of inside. His term commenced from the date he was received at the prison. It ran uninterruptedly thereafter except as otherwise provided by statute or the rules of the board of directors of the prison enacted pursuant to statutes authorizing the enactment of said rules. It is not contended that said term was interrupted by the provisions of any statute. However, it is contended that the term was interrupted by an order made by the prison board. On February 9, 1929, that board made an order which recited certain facts evidencing a violation of parole and concluding "On motion duly made and carried, it was ordered that the above-named prisoner's parole heretofore granted, be suspended pending investigation of the complaint filed, and that the prisoner be retaken and returned to actual custody to abide the further order of the board." No "further order" was made by the board. Conceding, without deciding, that this order was within the power of the prison board, the effect of it was to terminate, at least for the time being, the right of the petitioner to be outside of the prison walls during the remainder of his term. It did not ex vi termini purport to cancel any credits. The statute authorizes the prison board, for violations of parole, to cancel credits (St. 1915, p. 981). But that statute provides that such cancellation shall not take place until a hearing before the board has been had (section 1½). In the meantime, while it is clear the right to be outside of the prison walls may be terminated, the statute is silent regarding the running of the term. Therefore the petitioner's term ran on without interruption and terminated on March 4, 1929. From January 9, 1929, and down to the date of the filing of this petition, the petitioner has been in the custody of the peace officers in San Francisco by reason of certain other alleged offenses. But our statutes do not contain any provisions to the effect that imprisonment, on such new charges, has any effect on the term of imprisonment on which the prisoner was on parole. The record does not show any facts and counsel cite no law showing or tending to show that, at least temporarily, the petitioner could not, on February 9, 1929, or immediately thereafter, have been taken before the prison board to have a hearing on the question as to whether his credits should be canceled. If it had been done and the credits had been canceled, thereupon the petitioner could have been sent back to San Francisco to stand trial or he could have been retained at the prison to serve out such unexpired term. But, in following that procedure, all would have been done as provided by law and during and within the proper times.

[2] However, after the petitioner's term as fixed by law has expired, such matters may not now be inquired into for the purpose of reviving a part of the term which has expired. Ex parte Wadleigh, 82 Cal. 518, 521, 23 P. 190.

This cause requires a construction by the court of the language of a surety bond, considered in connection with the contract to which it relates. The facts are not disputed.

Defendant Shannahan, under a written contract dated January 23, 1925, agreed to do certain work for Blue Diamond Company, a corporation, in connection with the construction by it of a branch railroad line in Nevada. Said defendant covenanted to furnish "all necessary material, superintendence, labor, tools, plant, equipment and transportation for and to perform, lay, execute, finish and complete in the most expeditious, substantial and workmanlike manner," all grading, pipe culverts, etc., for said branch line, as detailed in the general conditions and specifications constituting a part of the agreement of the parties. The general conditions of said contract provided: "The documents forming the Contract are complementary * * * They are intended to include all detail of labor and material reasonably necessary for the proper execution of the work. * * * They also provided: "The Contractor * * * shall protect and indemnify The Company from and against all claims against the said work for labor, material and/or supplies furnished the Contractor. * * * They further required that said defendant deliver to the corporation a good and sufficient surety company bond "as security for the faithful performance by the Contractor of all the covenants and agreements on the part of the Contractor contained in said Contract, as well as for the payment in full of all claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in said work, which bond shall have its terms to be made to inure as well as to the benefit of the Company, to the benefit also of such persons so as to give such persons a right of action to recover upon said bond in any suit brought to foreclose liens, or in a suit brought on said bond."

On the same day, pursuant to the above requirement, defendant Shannahan, as principal, and defendant and appellant, Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, as surety,

Supreme Court of California.
March 12, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 10, 1930.

1. Principal and surety ⇨59—Express terms of contract measure liability of surety.

Liability of surety is measured and bounded by express terms of its contract, and courts do not favor extending that liability by construction.

2. Railroads ⇨111—Railroad construction contractor's bond must be construed in light of contract it secures.

Bond of contractor agreeing to construct branch railroad line must be considered in light of contract which it secures.

3. Principal and surety ⇨59—Surety's liability is measured by language expressing it, read in light of circumstances.

Extent of surety's liability is measured by language used to express it, when read in light of circumstances attending transaction.

4. Railroads ⇨111—Rental and transportation of shovel used for railroad construction work held within contractor's bond for payment of all persons performing labor or furnishing material, when construed in light of contract and circumstances; "supplies."

Where contractor agreed to furnish all necessary material, superintendence, labor, tools, equipment, and transportation for, and to perform, lay, execute, finish, and complete in most expeditious, substantial, and workmanlike manner, all grading, etc., for railroad branch line, and contract also provided contractor should protect company from claims against work for labor, material, and/or supplies furnished the contractor, bond conditioned upon performance by contractor of all terms, covenants, and conditions of contract to be by contractor completed and performed, when read in light of contract and considered in connection with circumstances, held to cover rental and transportation of gasoline shovel used by contractor; word "supplies" including rental items.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Carl A. Stutsman, Judge.

executed a bond, to which was attached a copy of said contract, in the sum of $15,000, conditioned as follows: "The condition of the above obligation is such, that whereas the above principal has entered into a written contract with the above named obligee, dated January 23, 1925. * * * Now, therefore, if the said principal shall well and truly keep and perform all of the terms, covenants and conditions of the said contract, to be by him completed and performed and shall pay in full, claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing material to be used in such construction work, then this obligation shall be null and void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect."

On January 21, 1925, two days prior to execution of the above documents, plaintiff and said Shannahan executed a written agreement whereby plaintiff rented to the latter a gasoline shovel—monthly rental $650, all transportation charges to be paid by the renter—which shovel was transported to the place of and used by Shannahan in connection with the work performed under said construction contract with the Blue Diamond Company. Shannahan, however, failed to pay to plaintiff a balance of $1,000, admittedly due as rental upon said shovel, and $618.97 transportation charges advanced by plaintiff to procure its return. Plaintiff therefore instituted this action against both Shannahan and appellant surety company to recover said sums.

Upon the trial, defendant Shannahan did not question the said sums adjudged to be due plaintiff. In fact, he testified that he was ready and willing to pay said obligation and had the money therefor, but, under his contract with said surety, it had the right of assignment on money still due him from the Blue Diamond Company, which right of assignment it exercised; therefore, in order to pay plaintiff, it was necessary to have the surety's signature as well as his own on the check, and the surety had refused to sign. The court found that the bond covered said two items due plaintiff, and gave judgment in his favor as against both defendant Shannahan and the bonding company. Said company has alone appealed, disclaiming any liability on the bond for said indebtedness to plaintiff. The sole question presented by the appeal is whether or not its contention in this behalf is meritorious.

To state the matter another way, relying mainly upon the cases of Wood, Curtis & Co. v. El Dorado Lumber Co., 153 Cal. 230, 94 P. 877, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 585, 126 Am. St. Rep. 80, 15 Ann. Cas. 382, and French v. Farmer, 178 Cal. 218, 172 P. 1102, 1103, appellant urges that the terms of its bond, conditioned upon full payment of "claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing material to be used in such construction work," cannot be held to constitute a promise to answer for the debt of defendant Shannahan to plaintiff as, under said authorities, rental and/or transportation of machinery was not the performance of labor upon or the furnishing of material to be used in the construction work. In other words, it is appellant's further contention that, distinguishing claims of those furnishing supplies or machinery for the work from claims for materials, etc., actually used in the work, the word "in" should be given a constricted interpretation, thus narrowing application of the clause "labor * * * or material * * * used in such construction work" to matter actually entering into or becoming a part of the structure or improvement itself.

[1-3] We, of course, recognize the well-settled principle that the liability of a surety is measured and bounded by the express terms of its contract, and that courts are not swift to extend that liability by construction (County of Glenn v. Jones, 146 Cal. 518, 80 P. 695; Civ. Code, § 2836; 23 Cal. Juris, p. 1024, § 24, and cases there cited); yet we see no escape from the conclusion that, irrespective of the fact that the word "in" might in some instance be subject to the interpretation which appellant would have us place upon it, the claims presented by plaintiff here are amply covered by the language of said bond, which is to be considered in the light of the contract it secures. In the last analysis, the extent of a surety's liability is measured by the language used to express it, when read in the light of the circumstances attending the transaction. The following language found in the recent case of Roberts v. Security Trust, etc., Bank, 196 Cal. 557, 238 P. 673, 677, is applicable here, even though in that case the contract was expressly incorporated by reference as a part of the bond, instead of merely being attached to it:

"Our Civil Code, § 2837, provides that, in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship, the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts. In Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs Co., 138 Cal. 724, 730, 72 P. 352, 354, this court said: 'While it is true that a surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract, yet in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship, the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts. Such construction does not mean that words are to be distorted out of their natural meaning, or that, by implication, something can be read into the contract that it will not reasonably bear; but it means that the contract shall be fairly construed with a view to effect the object for which it was given, and to accomplish the purpose for which it was designed. The old rule of strictissimi juris applies only to the extent, that no implication shall be indulged in to impose a burden not clearly inferable from the language of the contract, but does not apply so as to hold that the contract shall not be reasonably interpreted as other contracts are."

In the case of W. P. Fuller & Co. v. Alturas S. Dist., 28 Cal. App. 609, 612, 613, 153 P. 743, 745, the doctrine is set forth in this language: "It is elementary that: 'Sureties are never bound beyond the strict letter of their contract; that they have a right to stand upon the precise terms of their agreement, and that there is no authority for extending their liability beyond the stipulation to which they have chosen to bind themselves.' Callan v. Empire Surety Co., 20 Cal. App. 483, 485, 129 P. 978, 981. But it is also elementary that a bond given to guarantee the execution of a contract according to its terms becomes a part of such contract, and to that contract the sureties become parties the same as though they had actually made and executed the contract itself. Therefore, in interpreting the language of the undertaking for the purpose of gathering its scope or the measure of the liability of the sureties, we must do so by treating or viewing the contract and the undertaking as a whole or as constituting an indivisible contract. In other words, we must, in order to ascertain the nature and extent of the liability to which the sureties have bound themselves, examine the undertaking by the light of the agreement of whose terms it guarantees the faithful performance."

See, to the same effect, Hollenbeck-Bush, etc., Co. v. Amweg, 177 Cal. 159, 170 P. 148; Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs Co., 138 Cal. 724, 72 P. 352; El Dora Oil Co. v. Gibson, 201 Cal. 231, 256 P. 550.

[4] This bond is expressly conditioned upon performance by the contractor of "all the terms, covenants and conditions of the said contract, to be by him completed and performed." One of the covenants of the contract was that the contractor furnish "all material, superintendence, labor, tools, plant, equipment and transportation" for the performance of said work. Further, the contract was "intended to include all detail of labor and material reasonably necessary for the proper execution of the work." Can it be denied that the rental and transportation of this equipment by said contractor was not the furnishing of "equipment" and "transportation" for use in performing said work, within the meaning of said provisions of the contract?

Furthermore, as above stated, a copy of the contract was attached to the bond, and it is impossible to properly construe the language of the undertaking other than in the light of the contract, the faithful performance of which it secured. When considered in such light it is plain that the bond was intended to "protect and indemnify * * * against all claims against the said work for labor, material and/or supplies furnished the Contractor." The word "supplies" has been expressly held to include rental items. Sherman v. American Surety Co., 178 Cal. 286, 173 P. 161; Bricker v. Rollins & Jarecki, 178 Cal. 347, 173 P. 592.

Prior to its amendment in 1911, section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure contained the identical phrase found in this bond, "performing labor upon or furnishing materials" to be used in the work. Appellant therefore claims that the construction to be placed upon said clause in the case at bar must be gathered from the court decisions which construed said section and said language thereof as it then existed. The section was amended in 1911 to make it specifically cover such claims as the ones here presented. In this connection, appellant cites said case of Wood, Curtis & Co. v. El Dorado, etc., Co., supra, which arose out of an attempt to enforce a mechanic's lien claimed to have been created under the section prior to the 1911 amendment, at which time it did not provide liens in favor of teamsters or draymen, but was limited in its application to mechanics, materialmen, and all other persons and laborers performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used or consumed in the structure. The court held there that the plaintiff, by letting his horses to the contractor at a stipulated monthly price, could not be said to have bestowed labor upon the structure so as to entitle him to a lien for the rental of such horses under the terms of said section.

The determination of this cause, however, is not governed by the construction placed by said authority upon the clause in question as found in said section 1183 prior to amendment. The very fact that the section was expressly amended so as to leave it unhampered by such restriction argues strongly for a broader interpretation of the language, but we are not here required to either pass upon it or construe it. For, as above stated, we are not burdening appellant with liability based alone upon that provision of the bond. On the contrary, we hold appellant liable under the entire language of the condition of the bond, read and construed in the light of said contract in its entirety, and considered in connection with all the circumstances attending the transaction.

The opinion in the case of French v. Farmer, supra, also relied upon by appellant, is based solely upon the holding of the Wood, Curtis Case; recovery being therein denied under a common law bond for rental of mules, upon the ground that the renter was not a person "to whom any part of such work" was given. It is not in point because the provisions of the contract there under consideration were utterly unlike the provisions of the document before us. Furthermore, the court there recognized the rule above set forth, for it said: "* * * If it can be fairly said from either the contract or the bond, which are to be construed together, that the parties intended to and did agree to pay such third person, a suit could be brought on such bond by such third person to recover the promise so made for his benefit (citing many cases)."

The authorities just discussed are reviewed in Bricker v. Rollins & Jarecki, supra, which case upholds the conclusion we have reached. It also expressly approves the doctrine of French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 P. 92, a case wherein the rental of a team was held to be a proper charge recoverable in an action upon a bond. See, to the same effect, Associated Oil Co. v. Commary-Peterson Co., Inc., 32 Cal. App. 582, 163 P. 702, and Sherman v. American Surety Co., supra. The trend of recent similar decisions outside the state is in accord with this pronouncement. See Brogan v. National Surety Co., 246 U. S. 257, 38 S. Ct. 250, 62 L. Ed. 703, L. R. A. 1918D, 776, and cases therein reviewed.

The petition for a hearing herein is denied. In denying said petition, we withhold our approval of that portion of said opinion which purports to hold that a mortgagee is protected by the provisions of section 1142 of the Civil Code in the same way and to the same extent that a buyer under an executed sale of personal property from a person having possession thereof with power to dispose of the same is afforded protection by said section. While in some cases the words "buyer" and "purchaser" are used synonymously, and in others a "purchaser" has been held to include a "mortgagee," we know of no authority, and none has been cited by the respondent, which goes so far as to hold that a mortgagee is ever "a buyer at an executed sale."

1. Brokers § 63(1)—Broker may recover from principal not delivering goods to buyer and depriving broker of commission from buyer.

Where principal agrees with broker that broker shall undertake to negotiate with third party for sale by principal to third party of personal property, broker to receive his compensation directly from third party out of proceeds of sale, and principal fails to make delivery of property to third party in accordance with terms of contract when executed, broker is entitled to recover from principal damages which will restore what broker has been unlawfully deprived of through nonperformance of principal.

2. Brokers § 82(1)—Complaint against principal not delivering trucks and depriving broker of commissions he would have received from buyer stated cause of action.

Amended complaint, alleging that defendant solicited plaintiff to procure orders for trucks and agreed that, if plaintiff would induce certain customer to order trucks at price agreed upon, defendant would make contract of sale with such customer so as to require customer to pay plaintiff all of purchase price of trucks over and above certain sum and that defendant agreed with customer to sell ten trucks but delivered only two, so that plaintiff lost right to receive commissions on sale of remaining trucks, held to state cause of action within rule entitling broker to recover from principal where principal refuses to perform contract with third party and deprives broker of commission from third party.

3. Evidence ⇨441(9)—Evidence principal agreed with broker not to ask acceptance of trucks until needed by buyer held not inadmissible as attempt to vary terms of contract between principal and buyer.

In action by broker against principal failing to perform contract with third party for sale of trucks whereby broker would have received commissions from third party out of proceeds of sale, admitting parol evidence to prove that in oral contract between broker and principal it was agreed by latter that it would not ask acceptance of delivery of trucks to buyer until trucks were needed by buyer in connection with construction of dam held not error as attempt to vary terms of written contract between principal and buyer.

4. Brokers ⇨87—Statute on damages held inapplicable in broker's action against principal not delivering trucks to buyer and depriving broker of commissions from buyer (Civ. Code, § 3308).

Civ. Code, § 3308, fixing measure of damage for breach of seller's agreement to deliver personal property as value to buyer over amount which would have been due to seller under contract, held inapplicable in broker's action against principal failing to perform contract with third party and thus depriving broker of commissions he would have received from seller out of proceeds of sale of trucks.

5. Brokers ⇨87—Measure of damage for principal's failure to deliver goods contracted for, depriving broker of commission from buyer, was that likely to result in ordinary course of things (Civ. Code, § 3300).

In action by broker against principal failing to perform contract for sale of trucks with third party, and thus depriving broker of commissions he would have received from third party from proceeds of sale under oral contract with principal, measure of damage for breach was found in Civ. Code, § 3300, and was that which in ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom.

6. Brokers ⇨87—Broker held entitled to interest on commissions from date principal should have delivered trucks to buyer (Civ. Code, § 3287).

Where evidence showed that if principal had delivered trucks to buyer on February 24, 1926, commissions on sale would then have immediately become due to broker, and there never was at any time any dispute between parties as to amount of commissions, so that plaintiff was entitled to recover damages certain upon that particular day, he was entitled to recover interest thereon from that day in accordance with terms of Civ. Code, § 3287.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by R. C. Klepper against the American-La France Fire Engine Company of California for damages for breach of an oral contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Walter M. Campbell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert E. Austin and John N. Helmick, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, Acting P. J.

Plaintiff sued to recover damages for breach of an oral contract. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff for $9,459.48, with interest thereon from the 24th day of February, 1926. The defendant appeals upon typewritten transcripts.

[1] The first attack upon the judgment is that the amended complaint fails to state a cause of action. The case pleaded by the plaintiff is a simple case of an oral contract wherein the principal agrees with a broker that the broker shall undertake to negotiate with a third party for the sale by the principal to such third party of personal property, the broker to receive his compensation directly from the third party out of the proceeds of the sale. Here the plaintiff, who was the broker, pleads the terms and conditions of the contract with the defendant, who was the principal, and founds his cause of action on defendant's failure to make delivery of the property to the third party in accordance with the terms of the contract which was executed between the defendant and such third party. The action is plainly an action for damages for breach of contract—damages made certain by the express terms of the contract. Such an action finds support in the well-settled rule of law that where a broker undertakes to receive his compensation from a third party his principal is under no obligation to see that the broker is paid for his services unless the principal renders it impossible for the broker to become entitled to payment by the other side by refusing to perform the contract negotiated. This obligation of the principal is stated in 4 Ruling Case Law, p. 333: "When the employer violates his agreement in this respect and the broker sues for his commissions or their equivalent, he is permitted to recover not upon the theory that the contract holds the employer to their payment, but because the employer by violating the contract of employment has destroyed its obligatory force, and deprived the broker of the fruits of performance on his part, for which reason the latter is entitled to such a recovery in damages as will restore what he has unlawfully been deprived of through the nonperformance of his principal."

[2] Without reciting the allegations of the amended complaint in detail, it is sufficient to point to the averment that the defendant solicited plaintiff to procure orders for eight designated automobile trucks manufactured by the defendant and expressly agreed that if the plaintiff would induce Orndorff Brothers to order and take such trucks from the defendant at a price agreed upon the defendant would make a contract of sale thereof with Orndorff Brothers so as to require said Orndorff Brothers to pay to plaintiff all of the purchase price of said trucks over and above the sum of $4,223.87 for each of said trucks which defendant might be able to sell to Orndorff Brothers by or through the efforts of plaintiff; that this excess which was agreed to be the sum of $1,554.92 would have been paid to the plaintiff out of the purchase price of each of said trucks but for the failure of defendant to carry out and complete its contract for the sale of said trucks to Orndorff Brothers. It was further alleged that two of said trucks were sold and delivered to Orndorff Brothers; that plaintiff received a stipulated commission on the sale of these two trucks amounting to $2,979.84; that defendant agreed with Orndorff Brothers to sell them ten of said trucks at a price of $5,778.79 each; that because of defendant's failure to make deliveries of the remaining eight trucks and to carry out its contract in that regard the plaintiff lost the right to receive from Orndorff Brothers his commissions on the sale of the remaining trucks amounting to $12,569.36. This sum is alleged to be the amount of plaintiff's damage caused by defendant's breach of its contract with the plaintiff. The amended complaint clearly states a cause of action within the rule above noted.

[3] The argument is made that the trial court committed error in permitting parol evidence to prove that in the oral contract between plaintiff and defendant it was agreed by the latter that they would not ask acceptance of delivery of the trucks to Orndorff Brothers until the trucks were needed by Orndorff Brothers in connection with the construction of a dam, referred to in the evidence as the "Ross Construction Company job." The argument is that inasmuch as the written contract between defendant and Orndorff Brothers called for delivery of the trucks "as soon as possible," any evidence tending to show that a definite time for delivery was fixed was inadmissible as an attempt to vary the terms of a written contract. The point is without merit. The evidence was offered solely for the purpose of proving the oral contract between plaintiff and defendant. The terms of the written contract executed between defendant and Orndorff Brothers were not affected in any sense by the contract between plaintiff and defendant or by any of the evidence in relation thereto.

It is argued that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings that there was a contract between plaintiff and defendant apart from the written contract between defendant and Orndorff Brothers; that Orndorff Brothers demanded delivery on the eight trucks covered by the order but received delivery of only two trucks and that defendant refused to deliver the remaining six trucks (the trial court found that but eight trucks were contracted for and not ten, as alleged in the complaint); and that defendant did not tender delivery of the trucks to Orndorff Brothers. We are at a loss to understand why the attack is made upon the judgment in this manner. Defendant prints in its brief portions of the testimony of the plaintiff and of D. P. Orndorff which fully support the findings of the trial court. Other testimony in the record including that of defendant's officers and employees merely adds to the positive testimony of the witnesses noted, so that there is not really so much as a conflict in the evidence before the trial court. The equities of the case are disclosed by defendant's admission that, on a later day, it delivered to Orndorff Brothers five of the six trucks contracted for at a slightly reduced price, thus defeating plaintiff of his commissions on the sale.

[4, 5] It is argued further that the trial court erred in its application of the rule as to the measure of damages, the point being that the case is controlled by section 3308, Civil Code, fixing the measure of damage for the breach of the seller's agreement to deliver personal property as the value to the buyer over the amount which would have been due to the seller under the contract. That this action is not based or controlled by this section of the Code it is too plain for argument. The further contention is made that inasmuch as the plaintiff was a general broker in the sale of automobile trucks he might have gone into the open market and purchased other trucks which would have satisfied Orndorff Brothers and might have sold these trucks to Orndorff Brothers in lieu of those agreed to be delivered by defendant, and by obtaining a commission on the sale of such trucks he might have lessened the damage caused by defendant's breach of its contract with him. Plaintiff cites decisions arising under sections 3308 and 3354 of the Civil Code, and cases arising in tort following the general principle that where the injury complained of is comparatively small and might have been prevented by the expenditure of a comparatively small sum of money by the plaintiff, the plaintiff may not recover because it is his duty to use all ordinary care to render the injury as slight as possible. It would serve no purpose to refer to the citations by name or to distinguish them from the case at hand. That they have no bearing upon the question raised here is apparent. The rule applicable here is found in Hunt Bros. Co. v. San Lorenzo, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 51, 56, 87 P. 1093, 1095, 7 L. R. A.

(N. S.) 913, where it is said: "It is the well-settled general rule of damages for any breach of contract that the damages that can be recovered for a breach are only such as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract, as the probable result of a breach." Here the complaint alleged and the trial court found that the damages for the breach of the contract were determined and specified by the parties in the contract. In such a case the measure of damage for the breach is found in section 3300, Civil Code. It is that which, "in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom."

[6] Finally it is argued that the trial court erred in awarding interest on the amount found due from February 24, 1926, the date of the breach. The evidence disclosed, and the court found, that if the defendant had delivered the remaining trucks to Orndorff Brothers on that date, the commissions on the sales amounting to $9,459.48 would then have immediately become due to the plaintiff. There was never at any time any dispute between the parties as to the amount of these commissions. Plaintiff was then entitled to recover damages certain upon that particular day. He is therefore entitled to recover interest thereon from that day in accordance with the express terms of section 3287, Civil Code. Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF MARYSVILLE v. FREEMAN et al.★
Civ. 4028.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

March 11, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 10, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 8, 1930.

Municipal corporations §586—City could not recover personal judgment against property owner for expense of repairing sidewalks abutting lots after notice given pursuant to ordinance.

Municipality which pursuant to ordinance notified property owner to repair and construct sidewalk in front of lots, and on his failure to comply with the notice let contract for construction, paying agreed price to contractor, held not entitled to personal judgment against the property owner for the amount so paid the contractor, since to allow a personal judgment would be equivalent to taxing the entire estate of the property owner for the improvement.

Action by the City of Marysville against William Freeman and another. Judgment for defendants, and the city appeals.

Affirmed.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J.

The complaint alleges and the court found that the defendants own three lots in the plaintiff city; that pursuant to ordinances of the city the defendants were duly notified "to repair and reconstruct" the sidewalk in front of said lots; that they failed and neglected to comply with the notice; that thereafter such proceedings were taken that the superintendent of streets let a contract "for the construction of said sidewalk * * * for the sum of $217.95"; that the contractor constructed the sidewalk in accordance with the contract; and that the plaintiff paid him the agreed price therefor. This action is for the recovery of a personal judgment against the defendants for the amount so paid to the contractor. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom.

A personal judgment against the defendants would become a lien on all their real property in the county, and could be made a lien on their lands in other counties, and their personal property would be subject to sale under execution issued on such judgment, thereby imposing the burden of a local improvement upon all of such property, contrary to the principle on which an assessment for local improvements is based. "To say that the owner of land bordering upon an improved street can be made personally liable for the payment of the improvement is equivalent to saying that his entire estate, real, personal and mixed, whether bordering upon the street or remote from it, whether within the corporate limits or without, whether benefited or not, shall be held responsible for the tax, which, in turn, is equivalent to saying that his entire estate may be taxed for the improvement in direct contradiction of the very terms of the power." Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Marjorie Weddington against N. Elizabeth McCann and another, upon a promissory note. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals.

Affirmed.

Chas. M. Easton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Willis S. Mitchell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

The defendant N. Elizabeth McCann appeals from a judgment rendered against herself and W. F. McCann, her husband, upon a promissory note, which they executed and delivered to the respondent.

The defendant W. F. McCann admitted due execution of the note, for value. Appellant denied liability, alleging a failure of consideration, and the principal question here presented is as to the sufficiency of the evidence in this respect. Respondent and her daughter testified that the defendants called at their home, that each signed the note in the sum of $1,000 in their presence and in the presence of Fred Weddington, respondent's husband; and that Mrs. Weddington made and delivered to them her check for that amount; that the check was paid by the bank and returned to the payor bearing the usual evidences of cancellation, but that it had since been lost or stolen. Appellant admitted having so signed the note in controversy, but she testified that after so doing the plaintiff said: "I have already given Mr. McCann the money, before." And further: "There never was a $1,000 check given to Mr. McCann or to me by Mrs. Weddington at any time." Her counsel thereupon requested a suspension of the proceedings and permission to obtain and offer if possible cumulative evidence from the books of the bank and from the plaintiff's husband, in support of this latter testimony. The request was denied, and judgment was awarded to the plaintiff. Thereafter a motion for new trial was presented upon the affidavit of Mrs. McCann's counsel, wherein it was averred that he had inspected the records of the bank and had taken the deposition of Weddington, showing that the purported check had not been so paid, and that it had never existed. Counter affidavits of the plaintiff and appellant's husband were also presented, which contradicted in detail the facts which were asserted in support of the motion. McCann swore: "I was present together with the defendant N. Elizabeth McCann and the plaintiff Marjorie Weddington, and her husband and Guy Weddington, in the Weddington home, at Lankershim, California, at which place and time the said $1,000 promissory note was first signed by me and then signed by the defendant Elizabeth McCann and thereupon a check in the sum of $1,000 at said time and place was signed by the plaintiff Marjorie Weddington and delivered to me in the presence of each and every of said persons," and that the same was by him deposited and credited to his account.

[1] Appellant complains that the presumption of consideration accompanying the written instrument having been overcome by her positive testimony to the contrary, the burden of proof shifted, and that a prima facie case was not sustained by the plaintiff. This argument is refuted by questions in her brief from the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, as already above briefly stated. The evidence was conflicting, and its truth or falsity was a question for determination by the trial court.

[2-5] Finally, it is contended that the defendant was surprised by the testimony offered by the plaintiff, and that the court erred in denying either continuance or a new trial. The suspension of proceedings during trial is a matter within the discretion of the court. Kahn v. Triest-Rosenberg Cap Co., 139 Cal. 340, 73 P. 164. It is obvious from the record before us that if granted in this instance it could have resulted only in a showing that the bank then had no record of the transaction. As already noted, appellant's codefendant swore that he received respondent's check for $1,000 in the presence of four witnesses, including his wife, who alone denied its delivery. It is apparent that the court did not err in denying a new trial upon the mere suggestion of additional evidence which could render probable no different result. Where material facts are contradicted by counter affidavits, the granting or denying of a new trial is also within the discretion of the court. Such motions are not favorably regarded, and the ruling thereon will not be disturbed unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears. Goodwin v. Snyder, 70 Cal. App. 98, 232 P. 763; Miles v. Miles, 77 Cal. App. 219, 246 P. 143.

The judgment is affirmed.

STATE COMPENSATION INSURANCE FUND (PETERSON, Intervener) v.
ALLEN. ★
Civ. 4010.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

March 8, 1930.

[Rehearing Denied April 7, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1930.]

1. Master and servant §354—Injured employee's claim against third party for damages held not waived by delay in filing employee's complaint in intervention, where state insurance fund, having paid medical and hospital charges, brought suit within statutory period (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 340, 387; Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act 1917, § 30(f)).

Where state compensation insurance fund, having expended money for hospital and medical fees for injured employee, brought action for damages against third party within limitation period prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 340, injured employee's claim for damages was not waived by failure of such employee to file complaint in intervention within statutory period, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 860) § 30(f), which gives the state compensation insurance fund right to subrogation and permits it to enforce rights in its own name, and intervener was therefore not necessary party, and complaint in intervention which presented no new issues could be filed at any time prior to trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 387.

2. Negligence §134(3)—Whether subcontractor's employee using runway erected by contractor for running saw into building was licensee or invitee was question of fact, and jury's finding that he was licensee was supported.

In action against building contractor for injuries to subcontractor's employee sustained in fall from runway erected for purpose of moving circular saw into building, question whether the injured person was using the runway as licensee or invitee was one of fact, and evidence sustained finding of jury that he was a mere licensee.

3. Trial §296(9)—Instruction held not to invade jury's province in view of other instructions.

In action against contractor for injuries to subcontractor's employee falling off runway built to connect with building for purpose of transporting circular saw, instruction permitting jury to find that the injured foreman was mere licensee or that his invitation did not extend to use of runway held not erroneous as invading the province of jury by assuming he was a licensee, in view of other instructions.

4. Negligence §32(1)—Contractor constructing runway into building for sole purpose of moving saw owed no duty to subcontractor's employee to see that runway was safe, unless such employee used it by invitation.

Where general contractor constructed runway to building for sole purpose of conveying circular saw and thereafter its employees immediately proceeded to dismantle it, contractor was under no obligation to provide foreman employed by subcontractor with the use of the runway or to see that it was safe and secure for him, unless there was an express or implied invitation from contractor to such foreman to use it.

5. Negligence §32(1)—One owning or controlling property is not liable to licensee for injuries, unless willful and wanton.

Doctrine is well established that, except for willful and wanton injury, the owner or one in control of property is not liable for injuries sustained by a mere licensee or trespasser.

6. Trial §260(8)—Instruction as to liability of contractor to subcontractor's employee held sufficiently covered by instruction given.

In action against contractor for injuries to subcontractor's employee falling from runway constructed by contractor for purpose of transporting saw into building, instructions as to defendant's liability for negligence in construction of runway if use thereof by employees of subcontractor was contemplated and reasonably necessary held sufficiently covered by instructions given.

7. Negligence ⚡32(2)—One invited upon premises for special purpose may be mere licensee with respect to certain parts of premises, approaches, or appliances.

It is well settled that one may be an invitee upon particular premises for a specific purpose and yet become a mere licensee with respect to certain parts of the premises, approaches thereto, or appliances contained within it, which were not intended for the use of the visitor.

8. Negligence ⚡32(2)—That subcontractor's employee used runway several times during morning of accident, without knowledge of contractor, did not establish invitation.

Fact that foreman employed by subcontractor used runway into building several times on morning of accident without knowledge of contractor was insufficient to constitute invitation on part of contractor, where runway was constructed for specific purpose of moving saw into building.

9. Appeal and error ⚡1003—Reviewing court will not consider fact that evidence would support contrary judgment.

Jury alone passes on weight and sufficiency of testimony, and reviewing court is concluded by verdict, and will not consider fact that evidence would have supported a contrary judgment.

10. Negligence ⚡124(3)—Evidence of general custom for workmen engaged in constructing steel frame building to use runway communicating therewith held inadmissible in action against contractor for injuries sustained by subcontractor's employee.

In action against contractor for injuries sustained by employee of subcontractor falling from runway constructed by contractor, evidence of general custom existing in California for all workmen engaged in the construction of steel frame buildings to use indiscriminately runway communicating therewith, regardless of class of employees, held inadmissible.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by the State Compensation Insurance Fund against J. A. Allen, in which Victor Peterson intervened. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff and intervener appeal.

Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, Frank J. Creede, Thomas W. Slaven and Walter J. O'Connor, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Neumiller & Ditz, of Stockton, for respondent.

ROLFE L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the defendant following the verdict of a jury, in a suit for damages for personal injuries. The chief controversy arises over the question as to whether the intervener was an invitee or a mere licensee in his use of a runway over an excavation adjoining a building, from which he fell in attempting to cross in the course of his employment.

The defendant was a general contractor to whom the construction of the Union Safe Deposit Bank building at Stockton had been awarded. The intervener, Victor Peterson, was employed as foreman of the steel structure workmen by the Williams Construction Company, a subcontractor of the defendant. The steel frame for the building had been completed. The area reserved for sidewalks adjoining the building had been excavated to be used as an extension of the basement. This space was 9 feet wide and 12 feet in depth and was still uncovered. The concrete walks had not yet been laid. For the purpose of conveying a 700-pound circular steel saw into the building, the defendant constructed a runway across this open space the night before the accident occurred. It was built by laying four 2 by 10 inch planks which were 14 feet in length across this open space. They were placed at an angle of 20 per cent. from a direct line between the wall of the building and a temporary plank walk bordering the excavation on the outer side. There is a conflict of evidence as to whether another plank runway had been used at this same place across the open space prior to the construction of the one which was used to transport the saw into the building. The planks of this runway overlapped the steel girder of the building upon which they rested 2 or 3 feet. At the other end of the runway the planks overlapped the sidewalk about a foot and were toenailed to the planks of the walk to prevent them from slipping. Midway beneath this runway upright timbers which were 2 by 6 inches in diameter were placed, to which a cross-ledger was spiked to support the planks of the runway. After the saw had been taken into the building the following morning and deposited on the beams of the floor, the workmen immediately commenced to dismantle the runway to use the planks as a platform for the saw. There is evidence to support the assertion that three planks had been removed and that one plank only remained to span the opening. This plank was found in position after the accident had occurred, which was about 11 o'clock a. m. on July 3, 1924. Peterson claims to have used this runway several times that morning for taking materials to and from the building. The defendant testified that he had no knowledge that it was being used by any one except for the purpose of transporting the saw, which was the only purpose for which it was constructed. At the time of the accident Mr. Peterson threw a heavy coil of rope, blocks, and tackle over his shoulder, and thus burdened attempted to cross to the building upon this plank. He claims there were then two planks of the runway remaining, and that one of them gave way causing him to fall into the basement. The jury, however, was entitled to assume from the defendant's evidence that there was but one plank left and that this plank remained in proper place after the accident. This left the question to be determined by the jury as to whether the intervener may not have lost his balance and fallen from the plank into the basement through no fault in the construction or maintenance of the runway. He was precipitated into the excavation and was impaled on a reinforcement rod which extended upward from the concrete wall at the bottom. The bar entered his left leg below the hip and came out through the abdomen near the navel. He was very seriously injured.

The suit was commenced by the State Compensation Insurance Fund in behalf of Peterson and also to recover the hospital and medical fees which it had expended for his treatment. The complaint also charged the defendant with negligence in the construction and maintenance of the runway and prayed for damages for the injuries sustained by Mr. Peterson. A demurrer was overruled, which was urged on the ground of nonjoinder of parties plaintiff and that the State Compensation Insurance Fund lacked jurisdiction to maintain the action so far as damages for the personal injuries of the employee were concerned. At the time of the trial, over the objection of the defendant, Peterson was permitted to file a complaint in intervention. The defendant controverted all the material allegations of the complaint and charged the intervener with contributory negligence.

[1] It is contended by the respondent that since the accident occurred July 3, 1924, and the complaint in intervention was not filed by Victor Peterson, the injured person until July 23, 1926, his claim for damages was waived by virtue of the statute of limitations as provided by section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The permission of court granting leave to file the complaint in intervention was harmless since the plaintiff, State Compensation Insurance Fund, by the incurring of obligations and payment of medical and hospital charges in behalf of the insured was subrogated by statute to all the rights of an employer and was authorized to enforce such claims in its own name. Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, St. 1917, p. 831; Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 200 Cal. 210, 252 P. 605. City of Sacramento v. Central Calif. Traction Co., 78 Cal. App. 215, 222, 248 P. 307. Section 30, subdivision (f) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, provides: "Where any employer is insured against liability for compensation with any insurance carrier and such insurance carrier shall have assumed the liability of the employer therefor * * * or shall have paid any compensation for which the employer is liable, or furnished or provided any medical services required by this act, such insurance carrier shall be subrogated to all the rights and duties of such employer and may enforce any such rights of its own name."

The intervener was therefore not a necessary party to the action. The complaint was filed by the State Compensation Insurance Fund within the statutory limitation period of one year from the time when the injuries were sustained by the insured, and contained all the necessary allegations upon which the intervener's claim was founded. The complaint in intervention presented no new issues and was therefore entitled to be filed at any time prior to trial. Section 387, Code Civ. Proc.; 16 Cal. Jur. 544, § 141; Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., 198 Cal. 290, 299, 244 P. 1077.

[2] The record contains evidence which may be held to support an implied finding of the jury to the effect that the intervener was guilty of contributory negligence in venturing upon a single plank laden as he was with a cumbersome burden of heavy rope and tackle.

The appellants assert that in passing over the runway to the building upon a mission incident to his employment, the intervener was an invitee of the defendant who owed him the duty to exercise ordinary care in the construction and maintenance of the runway. Upon the contrary, the defendant asserts that the intervener as the employee of a subcontractor was a mere licensee in the use of this runway which was constructed for the sole purpose of transporting the saw into the building, and that he therefore owed him no duty except to refrain from willfully or wantonly injuring him, or from laying a dangerous trap which would expose the intervener to great peril. The defendant claims that although the intervener may have been an invitee with relation to his occupation in other parts of the building or upon other approaches thereto, still he was a mere licensee in the use of this particular runway which was constructed only for the conveyance of the saw into the building.

The problem as to whether the intervener was using this particular runway as a licensee or as an invitee presents rather a close question of fact. The implied finding of the jury, however, to the effect that he was a mere licensee, finds support in the record, and must therefore be sustained.

[3] Two instructions upon the subject of licensee and invitee were given to the jury, at the request of the defendant, which are challenged as erroneous. They are in the following language:

(1) "If you find from a preponderance of the evidence that Victor Peterson was a mere licensee at the time he is alleged to have been on the alleged runway, then you are instructed that he took upon himself the risk of the alleged runway as he found it, and the defendant owed him no duty of seeing that the alleged runway was safe for his attempted use, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

(2) "If you find from a preponderance of the evidence that Victor Peterson was an invitee on the premises under the control of the defendant, but that the invitation did not extend to the use of the alleged runway, then you are instructed that said Victor Peterson was a mere licensee at the time he is alleged to have been on the alleged runway, and the defendant owed him no duty of seeing that the alleged runway was safe for his attempted use, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

It is asserted that the foregoing instructions invade the province of the jury by virtually assuming that the intervenor was a mere licensee while the evidence conclusively establishes the fact that he was in fact an invitee.

Obviously, this criticism is not merited. Each instruction is based upon the express condition that the jury shall first find from a preponderance of the evidence that Mr. Peterson was either an invitee or a licensee. The determination of his relationship toward the defendant was left entirely with the jury. Moreover, these instructions should be construed with relation to the three following instructions, two of which were given at the request of the plaintiffs and which adequately apply the doctrine of the law respecting the liability of an employer toward a licensee or an invitee as contended for by the appellants:

(3) "If you believe from the evidence that Victor Peterson used the runway on July 3, 1924, and at the time he fell, at the invitation, express or implied, of the defendant, then I instruct you that as a matter of law Victor Peterson was an invitee and had a right to use said runway. And in that event if you believe that the said runway gave way and as a proximate result of any negligence on the part of the defendant or any of his servants or employees acting within the scope of their employment, your verdict should be for the plaintiff unless it has been proven that Victor Peterson himself was guilty of negligence which was a proximate cause of his injury."

(4) "It is not necessary in this case that there should have been an express invitation by the defendant to Victor Peterson to use said runway; circumstances themselves may be sufficient to imply such an invitation. For invitation, as the law construes it, may be either express or implied."

(5) "It is admitted in this case that Victor Peterson was an employee of J. G. Williams Construction Company, and not of defendant J. A. Allen, and that said J. A. Allen was under no contractual duty by any contract to construct, secure and support any runway for said Victor Peterson, and you must, before you can find for the plaintiff and against the defendant, find, from a preponderance of the evidence, that there was an invitation, either express or implied, extended by said J. A. Allen to said Victor Peterson to use said runway as a walkway, and if no such invitation were extended, then you are instructed that said Victor Peterson was a mere licensee at the time he is alleged to have been on said alleged runway, and said J. A. Allen owed him no duty of seeing that said alleged runway was safe for his attempted use."

Instruction No. 4 informs the jury that an invitation to use a particular runway may be either express or implied from the surrounding circumstances. No. 3 declared that if he used the runway at the invitation of the defendant either express or implied and was thereby injured as a result of the negligence of the defendant or his employees, he was entitled to recover damages. The instruction last above quoted correctly states that as an employee of the Williams Construction Company, the defendant was not obligated to provide the intervenor with a runway upon which to enter the building, and that unless the jury should find that Peterson was invited by the defendant, either expressly or by implication, to use the runway, he would be a mere licensee in such use, under which circumstances the defendant would be under no obligation to see that it was safe and secure.

[4] The appellants insist that this application of the law is erroneous; that when an employee is actually engaged in the performance of his work, it is inconsistent to say that he may still be acting as a mere licensee. The authorities which are cited upon this subject will not sustain that conclusion. Obviously, the relationship of licensee or invitee must depend upon the nature of the employment and the circumstances under which the service is performed. In the present case the intervenor was not an employee of the defendant. The runway was not constructed for the use of workmen in general who were employed upon the building. It was for the exclusive purpose of conveying the saw into the structure. After the object for its construction had been accomplished, the defendant's employees immediately proceeded to dismantle it. The defendant was not aware that Peterson was making use of it as a convenient way to go and come from the building. Peterson knew why it was constructed. He knew that it was being dismantled. He did not ask for permission to use it. It may not be said that it had been used so long or commonly as to imply an invitation or acquiescence in its use. While undoubtedly Mr. Peterson as foreman for the Williams Construction Company had a lawful right to the use of the building and other approaches there-to necessary for the reasonable performance of his duties, the jury were authorized to find from all the facts of the case that as between himself and the defendant he was a mere licensee in the use of this particular runway.

[5] It is, of course, true that even though the intervenor was a mere licensee upon the runway at the time he was injured, still the defendant would be liable for conduct which would result in wilfully or intentionally inflicting the injuries. An owner of property may not construct a device which will become a trap or expose even a mere licensee or trespasser to great peril, without liability. As Mr. Justice Harlan well said in the case of Bennett v. Louisville, etc., Ry. Co., 102 U. S. 577, 580, 26 L. Ed. 235, "The owner is liable to invited guests for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition of the land or its approaches, if such condition was known to him and not to them, and was negligently suffered to exist, without timely notice to the public, or to those who were likely to act upon such invitation." 20 R. C. L. 56, § 52.

In the present case it is not contended, and the evidence will not support the assertion, that the defendant maintained a trap at the peril of employees, or that he willfully, wantonly, or knowingly built or maintained a runway to injure the intervenor or anyone else.

The doctrine is well established that except for willful and wanton injury the owner or one in control of property is not liable for injuries sustained by a mere licensee or trespasser. Means v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 P. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206; Jacobson v. Northwestern Pac. Ry. Co., 175 Cal. 468, 472, 166 P. 3; Lucas v. Walker, 22 Cal. App. 296, 301, 134 P. 374, 379; 45 C. J. 796, § 201; 20 R. C. L. 57, § 53, 2 Sherman & Redfield on Negligence, p. 1220, § 705; Thompson on Negligence, § 685.

[6] Error is charged in the refusal to give plaintiff's instructions 9 and 10. The first charged the jury that a contractor is bound to use ordinary care in the construction of a runway to render it safe for the purpose for which it was intended, and that if the jury found this particular runway was permitted to remain after the saw had been deposited in the building, with the intention that it should thereafter be used by the workmen generally as a runway to the building, the defendant would be liable for negligence in its construction and maintenance. The second instruction informed the jury that even though Mr. Peterson could safely enter the building by means of ladders or runways other than the one upon which he was injured, that privilege would not necessarily preclude him from the right to also use this saw-runway, and if the jury found that his use of the latter runway was contemplated and reasonably necessary for the performance of his work, the defendant would be liable for negligence in its construction or maintenance. These instructions embrace correct statements of the law.

The refusal to give these instructions, however, was not error for the reason that they were amply covered by others. For instance, the jury was charged that: "If you believe * * * that the use of the runway by Victor Peterson * * * was a use thereof contemplated by the defendant * * * and that his fall was proximately caused by the failure * * * to exercise ordinary care to make said runway safe and suitable for such use * * * you must return a verdict in favor of plaintiff."

The jury was also charged: "Although toward an employee of his subcontractor a general contractor is not obligated to exercise ordinary care in the construction of runways, the use of which is merely convenient to the employee of such subcontractor, the general contractor is, however, bound to exercise ordinary care to make runways safe and suitable for the use of employees of such subcontractor whose use thereof is contemplated and reasonably necessary to the performance of the work. * * * If you believe * * * that the use of said runway by Victor Peterson * * * was a use thereof contemplated by the defendant," it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary care to safely construct and maintain the runway.

Other instructions which were given substantially cover the same principles. The jury was clearly informed that although a general contractor was not ordinarily liable for a lack of care in the construction or maintenance of runways or appliances not intended for the use or benefit of the subcontractor or his workmen, still if the general contractor knew they were likely to be so used, he would be liable for injuries sustained through a lack of ordinary care, even to a licensee who had no absolute invitation or right to use the same. This was as favorable a declaration of the law as the appellants were entitled to. In Pettyjohn & Sons v. Basham, 126 Va. 72, 100 S. E. 813, 816, 38 A. L. R. 391, the court said: "In order for the plaintiff to occupy the position of invitee, it must appear that the use was not merely convenient, but reasonably necessary for the work to be done."

And in the case of Bottum's Adm'r v. Hawks, 84 Vt. 370, 79 A. 858, 864, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 440, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1025, it is said:

"Neither silence, acquiescence, nor permission * * * standing alone, is sufficient to establish an invitation. A license may thus be created, but not an invitation."

In the Pettyjohn Case, supra, the facts were quite similar to those of the present case. The opinion in that case aptly distinguishes between an invitee and a mere licensee. Basham was a plumber who was working for a subcontractor of Pettyjohn in the construction of a house. The latter had erected a scaffolding on the outer wall of the building for the purpose of encasing the window frames in the gable. This work had been completed. The scaffolding was permitted to remain in place. To complete his work of plumbing, Basham climbed onto this scaffolding through the gable window and proceeded to the end thereof with the object of reaching the roof. He stepped upon the ends of some loose timbers which gave way and he fell to the ground, sustaining severe injuries. A judgment, which was recovered by Basham in the trial court, was reversed on appeal on the ground that he was a mere licensee on the scaffolding toward whom the general contractor ordinarily owed no duty to exercise care. The court said: "If Basham was a mere licensee, then he took upon himself the risk of the scaffold as he found it, and cannot recover; but if he was an invitee, and the invitation extended to that use of the scaffold, then Pettyjohn & Sons are liable to him for the injury sustained in consequence of its fall. * * * Usually, an invitation will be inferred where the visit is of common interest or mutual advantage to the parties while a license will be inferred where the object is the mere pleasure or benefit to the visitor. * * * In the case at bar, the evidence fails to show that the use of the scaffold by Basham for getting upon the roof was for the common interest and mutual benefit of both parties. It was built for use in doing work on the face of the gable, and was never intended to be used as a means of access to the roof. * * * If the scaffold was attractive, the plaintiff was not a child, and temptation was not invitation. If simply convenient, the use of it was as a licensee and not as an invitee. * * * In order for the plaintiff to occupy the position of invitee, it must appear that the use was not merely convenient, but reasonably necessary for the work to be done. * * * Mere convenience is not invitation. * * * The fact that access by way of the scaffold was 'easy and convenient' did not warrant the implication of an invitation to use it, when another means of access existed that was perfectly safe, easy, and convenient."

[7] It is well settled law and in accordance with reason that one may be an invitee upon particular premises for a specific purpose and yet become a mere licensee with respect to certain parts of the premises, approaches to it, or appliances contained within it, which were not intended for the use of the visitor. Powers v. Raymond, 197 Cal. 126, 239 P. 1069; Kennedy v. Chase, 119 Cal. 337, 52 P. 33, 63 Am. St. Rep. 153; Peebles v. Exchange Bldg. Co. (C. C. A.) 15 F.(2d, 335; Lindholm v. Northwestern Pac. R. R. Co., 79 Cal. App. 34, 39, 248 P. 1033; 45 Cal. Jur. 830, § 240.

[8] The court did not err in instructing the jury that certain specific facts standing "alone" would not constitute an invitation for Peterson to use the runway. Customary and general use of a runway for a long period of time might reasonably imply knowledge thereof or acquiescence on the part of the one in control of it. In the present case, however, there was no evidence of general or continued use of this particular runway. The most that can be said is that Peterson used it several times the morning of the accident, without the knowledge of the defendant. This use will not constitute invitation.

[9] After a careful examination of all the instructions given and refused, we find no reversible error, and we are satisfied that the jury was very fully and fairly charged as to the essential issues involved. The fact that the evidence would have supported a contrary judgment is not a matter for this court to consider, since it is concluded by the verdict of the jury which possessed the sole province of passing upon the weight and sufficiency of the testimony.

[10] Nor do we think the court erred in sustaining defendant's objection to plaintiff's effort to prove that a general custom existed in California for all workmen engaged in the construction of a steel frame building to indiscriminately use a runway communicating therewith, regardless of the class of employees to which they belong. The general custom of workmen to use a common runway communicating with a steel structure in the process of building, will in no way aid in determining whether an employee of an entirely different contractor has a right to use a special runway which was constructed for a particular purpose, or to decide whether the injured party acted as an invitee or a mere licensee in his use thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

CARD v. BOMS.★
Civ. 5828.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

March 7, 1930.

Hearing Ordered by Supreme Court
May 5, 1930.

1. Evidence ⇨222(1)—Witnesses ⇨379(1)—
Prior statement of party may be considered, not only for impeaching his testimony, but as admission against interest.

Any prior statement made by party to the action may be considered, not only for the purpose of impeachment of his testimony or credibility as a witness, but as an admission against interest.

2. Evidence ⇨265(1)—Jury may give credit to party's prior admissions, where such admissions conflict with his testimony.

Where testimony given by party to the action when on the witness stand differs materially from his prior admissions, conflict in the evidence is created, and jury may give credit to prior admissions rather than to sworn statements of the party as a witness.

3. Automobiles ⇨245(26)—Evidence in action for injuries held insufficient to make issue for jury of identity of defendant as driver of automobile which struck plaintiff.

In action for injury to one struck by automobile, in which the evidence for plaintiff failed to identify the driver of the car but merely showed that it was a touring car of one of two makes with its top up and that defendant was arrested about five miles away from the scene of the accident half an hour later, intoxicated and driving car of one of these makes with headlights, fender, and running board in damaged condition, and that defendant had then admitted having left town with car uninjured and had been unable to account for damaged condition, held that evidence was insufficient to make issue for jury of identity of defendant as driver of automobile which struck plaintiff.

4. Evidence ⇨601(5)—Jury may not make finding of identity on mere conjecture in absence of any evidence thereof.

Though it is not necessary that identification be made absolutely by any one witness, since it is a matter for the jury to determine from all the circumstances and evidence on the subject, this rule does not justify a finding of identity in the absence of any evidence thereof and upon mere conjecture or speculation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward T. Bishop, Judge.

Action by Walter D. Card against C. A. Boms. From a judgment for defendant notwithstanding the verdict, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Morris Abraham and Charles I. Rosin, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Clarence B. Runkle, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem.

October 13, 1925, at about 1 o'clock a. m., the plaintiff was pushing a hand cart in a northerly direction on Hill street, between Third and Fourth streets, in the city of Los Angeles, and was proceeding on the right-hand side of the street near the curb when he was struck from behind by an automobile traveling in the same direction, and which continued on its course without stopping. He brought this action to recover damages for the injuries thus sustained, and the court having denied a motion for nonsuit and one for a directed verdict in favor of the defendant, the jury brought in a verdict for plaintiff, whereupon the court, on its own motion, ordered judgment for the defendant, notwithstanding the verdict. Thereafter a judgment was entered for defendant reciting that it appeared to the court that the evidence was insufficient to justify a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and it is from this judgment that the appeal is taken.

The only question presented to us is whether or not the court below was justified in making the order on which the judgment was based, and that question has been narrowed down, by a stipulation filed in this court, to a consideration of the sufficiency of the evidence with respect to the identification of the defendant as the driver of the car which ran into the plaintiff and thus caused his injuries.

The plaintiff himself did not see either car or driver, being rendered unconscious by the collision. The accident was witnessed by two persons, one of them a police officer. Their testimony may be thus summarized: Officer Ackers, standing at Fourth and Hill streets, noticed the automobile which struck the plaintiff, just prior to the impact. It was traveling "probably around twenty or twenty-five miles an hour." He thought it had no lights, or that the lights were very dim. Seeing that the plaintiff was in danger of being struck, the officer started to blow his whistle, but before he could do so the automobile had hit the plaintiff "and kept on going" north on Hill street, the driver increasing its rate of speed after striking plaintiff. The car "was a touring car, either a Maxwell or a Dodge," with the top up. The testimony of the other eyewitness to the accident was the same in all particulars as that of Officer Ackers except that the former testified positively as to the absence of lights and said that he could not observe whether the driver was a man or a woman. The defendant was arrested at about 1:30 the same morning by Officer Beck on North Broadway, at a point some five miles distant from the scene of the collision, and after a chase of about nine blocks. The officer's attention was called to defendant's car by the fact that it was being driven at a speed of over thirty miles per hour, "swaying from one side to the other," without lights and with the right running board splintered, the top torn and one headlight bent. (In addition to this damage, other witnesses testified that the right front fender was bent.) The defendant, who was traveling in a northerly direction at the time, failed to stop when the officer ordered him to do so, but kept on going until the latter "shot in the street." The automobile driven by the defendant was a Maxwell touring car and its top was up. He himself was intoxicated to the point where "he could not stand erect very well," and when asked what had occasioned the damage to his car "he said he hit something, and did not know what it was; thought it was a lamp post," but did not know when or where the accident occurred. About 2:10 a. m. of the same day, when questioned at the receiving hospital, the defendant failed to reply to a number of inquiries, but did say that he "had had a drink" and that since he had last got into his automobile "he had struck something at some place, but he did not know what it was nor where." About 9:30 that morning the defendant's statement was taken down in shorthand at the city jail and later transcribed. This statement, identified by Detective Lieutenant Stevens and the stenographer who took it down, was in substance as follows: Defendant left his place of business at about 9:30 the previous evening and went to a poolroom, where he engaged in playing pool and drinking "moonshine" liquor until he started for his home at an hour not specified in the statement, feeling the effects of his libations. His usual homeward route took him east on Eight street as far as Hill street, and north on the latter through the Hill street tunnel to Temple street, thence to Broadway "and straight out North Broadway." Asked as to whether he had taken that route on the previous evening, he replied, "I think so." He did not recall hitting an old man on Hill street, between Third and Fourth streets, and said the headlights on his car at the time he left the poolroom were "in perfect condition" and that his fenders were not dented, and admitted that his car was damaged, as above stated, when he was arrested. He further said he was so intoxicated when he started home that he really did not know what occurred during the drive. At the trial the defendant, called to the stand under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, gave an entirely different version of his actions. He placed the time of his arrest on North Broadway at 12:30 or 12:45, which was prior to the occurrence of the accident, and swore that he had been working at his place of business on West Eighth street the previous evening until approximately 12:15 or 12:20 a. m.; that while he had had a drink or two during the afternoon he had not partaken of any intoxicating liquor in the evening; and that he was not under the influence of liquor at all. He said that when he started home his lights were in working order, but that he had forgotten to turn them on; that there were no dents in the fenders of his car, but that the running board was "slightly damaged." He described his course of travel as one which would have taken him some five blocks west of Hill street and the scene of the accident, and said this was his usual way of going home. He denied having had any collision at all. Interrogated as to the statement made by him at the jail, he admitted being questioned by Officer Stevens, but denied that he had been asked or had stated that he had been in a poolroom, denied that he had said he had left his place of business at 9:30, and denied that he had admitted drinking liquor or that he had given his route as north on Hill street and past the place of the accident, or that he had in fact taken that route.

[1,2] It is urged by respondent that the statement claimed to have been made by him when questioned at the city jail cannot be considered as any evidence of the facts therein stated, and that it was admissible solely for the purposes of impeachment. Hence, he argues, it cannot be used to establish the fact that he took a homeward route, on the morning of the accident, which carried him over Hill street and past the place of the accident. The general rule is thus stated in Albert v. McKay & Co., 174 Cal. 451, 163 P. 666, 668: "When a witness is impeached by proof of prior inconsistent statements, the effect is merely to discredit him as a witness. The former statements made by him are incompetent for any other purpose. They do not constitute evidence of the truth of the facts so stated by him." This rule, however, applies only to prior statements made by witnesses who are not parties to the action. In the case of the latter it is subject to the qualification that any statement made by a party to the action may be considered, not only for the purpose of impeachment of his testimony or credibility as a witness, but as an admission against interest. Gates v. Pendleton, 71 Cal. App. 752, 236 P. 365; Hall v. Bark "Emily Banning", 33 Cal. 522. Where the testimony given by a party to the action when on the witness stand differs materially from his prior admissions, a conflict in the evidence is created and the jury has the right, if it gives any credence to him at all, to believe his admissions rather than his sworn statements as a witness in court. Gates v. Pendleton, supra. If, however, we may assume that the jury in the instant case rejected the defendant's testimony and accepted his statement, made at the jail, all that is thus supplied by way of identifying defendant as the driver of the automobile which struck the plaintiff are the facts: (1) That he left the poolroom at an unspecified hour sometime between 9:30 p. m. and the time of his arrest at 1:30 a. m.; (2) that his car was uninjured when he started home, and damaged when he was arrested; (3) that his usual route would have taken him past the place of the accident.

[3, 4] Taking into consideration only the evidence which is most favorable to the plaintiff, the established facts are these: Plaintiff was struck at about 1 a. m. by an automobile not identified as to license number, color, number of passengers, sex of driver, or otherwise than that it was a touring car of one of two makes, with its top up and its lights unlit; the defendant was arrested about five miles away from the scene of the accident half an hour later, intoxicated and driving a car of one of these makes with the headlights, right fender, and running board in a damaged condition, for which he failed to account. In our opinion there was an utter lack of evidence from which the jury could have properly identified the defendant as the person responsible for the injury to the plaintiff. It is true that it is not necessary that identification be made positively by any one witness and that it is a matter for the jury to determine from all the circumstances in evidence on the subject (People v. Franklin, 46 Cal. App. 1, 188 P. 607; People v. Hrkaj, 85 Cal. App. 301, 259 P. 353; People v. Wilson, 76 Cal. App. 688, 245 P. 781); but this does not justify a finding of identity in the absence of any evidence thereof and upon mere conjecture or speculation (Nichols' Applied Evidence, vol. 5, p. 4738).

We have examined the decisions cited by appellant and find the facts in each of them readily distinguishable from those in the case before us. Thus in Szopieray v. West Berkeley Express, etc., Co., 194 Cal. 106, 227 P. 720, while there was no direct evidence that the injury to a three year old child was caused by the movement of an unattended horse-drawn truck belonging to the defendant, there was testimony that the child was close to and playing with one of the hind wheels of the truck immediately before the accident, and that the injury was caused by a crushing weight passing over the child's leg. Blood stains were found on the roadway near where the child was found after the accident. There was no intimation in the evidence that any other vehicle had passed along the street or had been near the child. There was also the testimony of one witness that just before the child was found injured he heard some one "holler Whoa." In State v. Elliott, 94 N. J. Law, 77, 110 A. 135, where the defendant was convicted of manslaughter, the question was presented as to the identification of his automobile as the one which had struck and killed the deceased and then sped away. The opinion does not review all of the evidence on this point, but does refer to a police officer "seeing the defendant's car, a high-power Packard, approaching at 40 miles an hour," watching it, and shortly after it had passed seeing a human body "fly [up] in the air," and states that shortly after the accident "a car answering the description of the car in question, driven by this defendant," was halted. It is further stated that "at the trial testimony of an adequate character was adduced regarding identification of the men in the car, as well as the general contour of the car itself, from which a jury might reasonably infer that the car in question was the same instrumentality which caused the homicide." (Italics ours.)

In Bowling v. Roberts, 235 Pa. 89, 83 A. 600, the court held that the identity of the automobile which caused the accident was established by testimony as to its size and the peculiar decorations which adorned it, corresponding in description to a car owned by the defendant, which was the only one in the vicinity so decorated. In O'Malley v. Public Ledger, 257 Pa. 19, 101 A. 94, the evidence as to identification included that of witnesses to the accident who observed the defendant's name painted on the side of the automobile which struck the plaintiff. In People v. Franklin, supra, there was, in addition to other circumstances, the testimony of three witnesses who, while they would not positively state that the defendant was the man they had seen at the scene of the crime, picked him out, each separately, from a number of other prisoners as resembling him. In People v. Wilson, supra, the prosecuting witness testified that the man who had rifled his pockets resembled the defendant, although he had not seen the robber's face but only his back and shoulders. In that case the court observed that there might have been peculiarities about these which constituted a sufficient foundation for identification. In People v. Fowler, 30 Cal. App. 183, 157 P. 540, there was an identification of the eyes of the defendant, who had worn a mask while committing the burglary and homicide, and testimony that on being interrupted in the commission of their crime the three men involved had fled and had been seen to run into a public park, from which two men emerged very shortly thereafter, followed by a third man who was without a hat. A few hours later a hat bearing the defendant's initials was found in the park at the place where the three men had crossed it.

In all of these cases there were facts and circumstances from which an inference of identity might well be drawn; in the instant case there were none. There was no testimony as to the appearance or even the sex of the driver of the automobile which struck the plaintiff, nor was there any as to any peculiarity of the car itself whereby it might have been distinguished from other cars of either of the two well-known makes, of which there are in all probability many hundreds in Los Angeles and vicinity.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLINTON v. CITY OF SANTA CRUZ.

Civ. 6988.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 14, 1930.

Municipal corporations Ⓒ741(1)—It was unnecessary for individual to present claim to council before suing city to recover damages as for deceit.

Individual suing city to recover damages as for deceit need not allege nor prove that, before commencing action, he presented claim to council of city, in view of charter not providing that in an action for damages it is condition precedent that plaintiff must first present his claim to city council.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; H. G. Jorgensen, Judge.

Action by Delmar S. Clinton against the City of Santa Cruz. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

John H. Leonard, of Santa Cruz, and Carl E. Lindsay, of Fresno, for appellant.

Byrne & Lamson and Paul S. Jordan, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff sued to recover damages as for deceit. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed.

The defendant complains because the plaintiff did not allege nor prove that, before commencing his action, the plaintiff presented his claim to the governing board of the defendant. Yolo County v. City of Sacramento, 36 Cal. 193, 197. The case is not in point. The city of Sacramento was, at that time, acting under a special statute. St. 1863, p. 415. In that act it was provided: "The inhabitants thereof are hereby made and constituted a body politic and corporate under the name and style of 'City of Sacramento', by which name they shall be known in law * * * may sue and be sued * * * provided, further, that no action shall be commenced or maintained against the city until the claim, account, or demand upon which it is founded has been presented to, and, either in whole or in part, been rejected by the Board of Trustees. * * *" The charter of the defendant contains no such provision. St. 1911, p. 1865, § 5. Again, it cites and relies on Bancroft v. City of San Diego, 120 Cal. 432, 52 P. 712. That case was brought to recover damages for injuries caused to the property of the plaintiff by the act of the defendant in changing the grade of the street on which plaintiff's property abutted. The charter of the city of San Diego contained a provision as follows: "All claims for damages against the city must be presented to the Common Council and filed with the Clerk within six months after the occurrence from which the damages arose." St. 1889, p. 658, § 10. A similar differentiation exists as to Bigelow v. City of Los Angeles, 141 Cal. 503, 75 P. 111; Farmers, etc., Bank v. City of Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 655, 91 P. 795; Crim v. City & County of San Francisco, 152 Cal. 279, 92 P. 640; Western Salt Co. v. City of San Diego, 181 Cal. 696, 186 P. 345; and Morris v. City and County of San Francisco, 59 Cal. App. 364, 210 P. 824. But this plaintiff cites no such provision as being contained in the charter of this defendant. Finally, the defendant cites and relies on sections 179, 180, 181, and 185 of its charter. No one of those sections uses the word damages nor any other language showing that in an action for damages it is a condition precedent that the plaintiff must first present his claim to the city council of Santa Cruz. Adams v. City of Modesto, 131 Cal. 501, 63 P. 1083. We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

This is an action for damages. A judgment of nonsuit was entered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs have appealed. It is not contended that the judgment is erroneous except as to the defendants Richardson and Lewis, who will be referred to herein as defendants and respondents.

[1] Respondents contend that the judgment was properly entered on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Insufficiency of a complaint is not a ground for granting a nonsuit. Code Civ. Proc. § 581; Pacific Finance Corporation v. Roffalli (Cal. App.) 276 P. 1064; Loop Bldg. Co. v. De Coe (Cal. App.) 275 P. 881; Scott v. Sciaroni, 66 Cal. App. 577, 226 P. 827. The complaint charges that the defendants entered into a conspiracy to defraud the plaintiffs and made false representations which induced the plaintiffs to enter into the agreement involved in the action; that by the terms thereof the parties agreed to exchange properties owned by them respectively; that the plaintiffs conveyed their properties to the defendants in accordance with the agreement, but that the defendants "failed, refused and neglected to, and by reason of the falsity of said representations * * * could not transfer" their property to the plaintiffs "or anything of value whatsoever." The answers admit that Lewis and his wife entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs for the exchange of the properties described in the complaint; that the former received a part of plaintiffs' personal property and sold it; that while Lewis and his wife agreed to pay an incumbrance of $22,400 upon the plaintiffs' land there were additional incumbrances thereon in the form of liens for irrigation and county taxes in the sum of more than $1,000 at the time of the execution of the agreement, and that thereafter the plaintiffs permitted a judgment against them in favor of J. M. Culpepper for the sum of $2,829.60 to become a lien on the land; that the plaintiffs "failed and refused to discharge or remove the aforesaid additional encumbrances" and admitted that "they were unable to comply with their said agreement"; and that thereafter the "defendants gave notice in writing to the plaintiffs that all interest of the plaintiffs in or to" the land which Lewis and his wife had agreed to convey to them "was terminated and ended." The truth of the foregoing allegations as to tax and judgment liens was admitted at the trial.

[2] The agreement in question recites that the plaintiffs are the owners of 220 acres of land, referred to by the parties as the Culpepper ranch, "subject to an encumbrance * * * in the sum of $22,400," and a herd of dairy cattle and other personal property; and that Lewis and his wife are the owners of 80 acres of land, referred to as the Farmington vineyard, subject to a trust deed given as security for the payment of $10,000 and a second trust deed for $7,000; and that they own the personal property on the land. The agreement provides for the exchange of such properties, the grantees to assume and pay the indebtedness incumbering the respective lands to be conveyed to them, and Lewis and his wife to pay the sum of $1,040 to the plaintiffs "at the time of the execution and delivery of deeds and bills of sale." Under well-settled rules relating to the right of a defendant to a nonsuit, the evidence will be stated in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs.

June 28, 1924, J. W. Fitzgerald entered into an agreement to sell the Farmington vineyard to Fred Bruggisser. July 2, 1924, Bruggisser assigned all his "right, title and interest" under the agreement to Richardson. Fitzgerald thereupon executed a conveyance of the land to Richardson, who executed a trust deed conveying the land to Fitzgerald as security for the payment of $15,000 of the purchase price. Both instruments were placed in escrow to be delivered upon the payment by Richardson of $5,000 on the indebtedness secured by the trust deed. Richardson also gave Bruggisser a trust deed, subject to the one first mentioned, to secure payment of $7,000. Richardson was induced to purchase the property by Lewis, who was thereupon placed in charge thereof. October 2, 1924, Richardson agreed to convey all his "right, title and interest" in the land to Lewis and his wife. October 14, 1924, Lewis and his wife entered into the aforesaid agreement with the plaintiffs. Both parties went into possession under the agreement, but no deeds of conveyance or bills of sale were ever executed. November 5, 1924, Lewis sold at public auction a part of the cattle which the plaintiff had agreed to convey and received therefor more than $5,000, out of which sum he paid them $1,040 in accordance with the agreement. January 23, 1925, counsel for the plaintiffs notified Lewis that "unless the agreement * * * is closed within the coming week, we have been instructed to commence suit to enforce the same." January 29, 1925, Richardson and Lewis indorsed upon the face of their agreement of October 2, 1924, a purported cancellation thereof and signed the same. Neither of their wives, however, signed the indorsement. On the next day thereafter Lewis and his wife assigned all their interests in various properties to Richardson and his wife as security for the payment of the assignor's promissory note for $10,260. The plaintiffs were unable to pay the amount of the aforesaid tax and judgment liens on the Culpepper ranch and, about February 3, 1925, Richardson told them they must discharge these liens within one week or he would not carry out the terms of their exchange agreement with Lewis and his wife. February 10, 1925, Richardson served notice of forfeiture on the plaintiffs and a demand for possession of the Farmington vineyard. The plaintiffs refused to surrender possession. The interest on Richardson's note to Bruggis-ser was payable semiannually. Richardson testified that he failed to pay the first installment of interest amounting to $245 when it became due and that Bruggisser thereupon commenced proceedings to sell the Farmington vineyard under the terms of the trust deed securing payment of the note for $7,000. After these proceedings were commenced, Wilson Walker purchased the note from Bruggisser and, notwithstanding the fact that he had been associated with Richardson in business for several years, an association which continued until March, 1926, Walker carried out the proceedings commenced by Bruggisser and purchased the property at the sale thereunder on November 14, 1925. Thereafter Walker caused the plaintiffs to be ejected from the property. At the trial, in May, 1928, Lewis, who was examined by the plaintiffs as an adverse witness, referring to the cancellation of his agreement to purchase Richardson's interest in the property, testified: "At a later date I acquired that interest in the property again, and I have had an interest in that property until the present day." It does not appear when or how such later interest was acquired by Lewis.

Lewis and Richardson had been "good friends" for at least ten years. They had been associated together in "a dozen or so" business transactions, Richardson frequently advancing Lewis' share of the money involved therein. Some of such business transactions were mere loans by Richardson to Lewis. It does not appear that any money passed between Richardson and Lewis in any of their transactions relating to the Farmington vineyard.

[3] One of the plaintiffs testified that when Lewis first interviewed them relative to an exchange of properties he said, "I have a partner, rich fellow, in San Francisco"; that prior to the auction sale he said: "I was see my partner in San Francisco. I find out we cannot keep care of those cows, * * * so we figure to have auction sale." While, as against Richardson, the foregoing is hearsay evidence only of a partnership, it was admitted without objection and is therefore to be considered in determining whether it was error to grant the motion for a nonsuit, in the determination of which question contradictory evidence is to be disregarded. Lucy v. Davis, 163 Cal. 611, 615, 126 P. 490; Menefee v. Raisch Improvement Co., 78 Cal. App. 785, 789, 248 P. 1031; Fong Lin v. Probert, 50 Cal. App. 339, 344, 195 P. 437. Richardson attended the auction sale of the plaintiffs' cattle on November 5, 1924. Lewis there introduced him to the plaintiffs, saying, according to the testimony of the plaintiffs, "I will introduce my partner, Mr. Richardson." Another witness testified: "Mr. Lewis say, * * * 'This is Mr. Richardson, my partner, that I tell you before,' * * * Q. Then they were partners, as you said, he was a partner in the auction sale? A. Was partner in auction sale and the land too." Another witness testified that before the sale commenced Richardson said, "We going to have a nice sale." A page of Lewis' account book was admitted in evidence, reading as follows:

[4] Treating the foregoing evidence as uncontradicted, as is required on a motion for a nonsuit, it cannot be held insufficient to support an inference that Lewis and Richardson were partners in the ownership of the Farmington vineyard and in the agreement to exchange it for the property of the plaintiffs.

One of the plaintiffs testified that prior to the execution of such agreement he said to Lewis, "We got some * * * taxes to pay, state taxes, irrigation taxes." * * * I said, 'Mr. Lewis, we got that to pay, and we aint got no money, only got stock, we had the stock clear,' and he said, 'It is all right, I take care of that, you people got to pay it extra.' * * * He no say much time, was give plenty of time to pay, any time get the tion in connection with his subsequent conduct.

The same witness testified that shortly after the execution of the exchange agreement the plaintiffs were served with a summons in an action commenced against them by Culpepper and in which the aforesaid judgment against them was entered; that thereafter on the same day Lewis went to the Culpepper ranch and stated that he and his partner had decided to sell the cattle thereon; that the witness said: "Mr. Lewis, this morning we got a paper served on us here. * * * We got note for $2,500. * * * I got to go down town and see Culpepper.' Mr. Lewis said, 'You no need lose time, you keep still here, keep working on here and keep care of the cow, because going to have auCTION sale on November 5th. I going to take this Culpepper judgment that time, and I going to buy from Culpepper, and I going to give an extension of this $2,500, give you plenty of time to pay when you get down there on the vineyard, then you can pay every year, pay the interest, then pay the balance a little bit at a time, whatever you can.'" The summons was then delivered to Lewis, and the plaintiffs gave no further attention to the action, but relied on Lewis' promise to take care of the matter. He allowed the suit to go to judgment and then took an assignment of the judgment.

[5-8] The agreement contains the following: "This agreement is to be consummated and concluded by the execution and delivery of deeds and bills of sale and the payment of money as herein provided, all within ten days from date hereof. * * * Time is of the essence hereof and of each and every part hereof." The agreement is dated October 14, 1924. Neither of the parties had tendered performance prior to the auction sale, which was held more than ten days after the execution of the agreement. At the time of such sale, therefore, the plaintiffs were under no legal obligation to make the agreed exchange of properties. Their live stock and other personal property were then unincumbered. They could have borrowed money thereon with which to pay the liens upon the Culpepper ranch and the amount of their promissory note for which Culpepper was given judgment, but after Lewis' sale of such personal property they had no means of raising the money required for that purpose. With full knowledge of the tax liens on the Culpepper ranch, which he had promised to take care of, and with full knowledge of the Culpepper note and the suit thereon, which note he had agreed to pay, Lewis proceeded to sell the plaintiffs' personal property as his own, thereby rendering the plaintiffs financially unable to satisfy the liens on the Culpepper ranch. Under such circumstances Lewis is estopped to set up such liens as an excuse for not consummating the agreed exchange of properties. His partner, Richardson, of course, is equally estopped. If it be contended that the plaintiffs did not plead an estoppel, the answer is that the existence of the liens in question were set up as an affirmative defense by the defendants, and "all affirmative matters by way of replication are deemed to have been pleaded, and plaintiff may make proof of any appropriate fact tending to disprove or avoid the new matter set up as a defense as fully as if it had been specially pleaded." 21 Cal. Jur. 165.

It appears that the plaintiffs are inexperienced in business transactions and that the defendants are shrewd business men. The evidence shows that the plaintiffs experienced on the Farmington vineyard the sum of $2,000 in money and performed labor thereon of the reasonable value of $4,000, while Richardson received the whole of the returns from the crops produced thereon by the plaintiffs, amounting to $5,500. If the judgment is permitted to stand, the result will be that, in addition to their financial embarrassment, the plaintiffs have suffered a direct loss of more than $10,000.

Nothing said herein is intended as an expression of opinion as to the weight of the evidence or the proper judgment finally to be entered. Those are matters which have no place in the consideration of a motion for a nonsuit.

The judgment of nonsuit in favor of the defendants J. A. Richardson and William R. Lewis is reversed, and the judgment in favor of the other defendants is affirmed.

1. Criminal law ⇨1171(1)—District attorney's incorrect reading of date, erroneously stated in accomplice's confession as that on which crime was committed, held not prejudicial error.

In trial for robbery, committed by defendant and another on May 21st, district attorney's statement that crime occurred on such day in reading accomplice's confession, which recited that it was committed on May 22d, to impeach accomplice's testimony, held not prejudicial to defendant, where there was no evidence of any other crime committed by them together, and confession was correctly read to jury at different times.

2. Criminal law ⇨724(1)—District attorney's reference to defendant as trapped rat held not improper.

Reference by district attorney to defendant as a rat caught in a trap held not improper.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Daniel Gaylord was convicted of robbery in the second degree, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Alfred J. Hennessy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Alberta Bedford, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

TYLER, P. J.

Appellant was charged by information with the crime of robbery. He was tried and convicted of robbery in the second degree. Motion for a new trial was made and denied. This is an appeal from the judgment and order.

As grounds for reversal, appellant assigns misconduct of the district attorney and alleged error in the admission of certain evidence. The facts show that one Andrew Ababurke was on the 21st day of May, 1929, held up and robbed by two men at the entrance to his home at 1857 Larkin street, San Francisco. He was relieved of his pocket-book, which contained a sum of money. Appellant and one Earle were arrested the following day as the perpetrators of the crime. Both parties admitted that they had committed the offense, and appellant consented to take the officers to the place where the purse was hidden. Certain police officers accompanied him to the locality indicated, where the purse and appellant's overcoat were found. After the recovery of the articles named, the officers proceeded with appellant to the police station, where he signed a written confession of his guilt. Earle also signed a statement to the effect that he and appellant had committed the crime; that appellant flourished a revolver while he abstracted the purse from the pocket of the victim.

[1, 2] At the trial appellant claimed the confession was written by an officer, and he did not know its contents, and, further, that he was not the party who accompanied Earle when the crime was committed. In explanation of his knowledge as to the location of the purse and the overcoat, appellant testified that Earle and one Meyers had visited him at his room and informed him that they had committed the crime; that he thereupon became frightened, and he and Earle hid the articles in the place where they were subsequently found. Earle, called as a witness, testified that appellant took no part in the robbery, but that the same had been committed by himself and one Jack Meyers. To disprove his testimony, the statement which he had signed at the time of his arrest implicating appellant was read to him. This statement recited that the robbery had been committed on May 22d, and the district attorney in reading the same erroneously stated that it had occurred on the 21st of May. Appellant contends that this act of the district attorney constituted such error as deprived appellant of a fair trial, as the confession referred to a different crime. The date of the robbery, as charged and proved, occurred on the 21st day of May, 1929, and this was the only crime referred to in the evidence. The police officer in reducing the confession of the witness to writing erroneously recited that the crime had occurred on the 22d of May. There was no contention that any other crime had been committed by appellant and Earle, and, in fact, it was the only robbery so far as the record shows that they ever committed together. Moreover, on the evening of the 22d, both Earle and defendant were in custody after the hour of 8 o'clock p. m. The statement was correctly read to the jury at different times, and it was only offered to impeach the testimony of Earle. Under all the circumstances, it is manifest that appellant was in no manner prejudiced by the incorrect reading of the confession. Appellant complains of the fact that he was referred to by the district attorney as a rat caught in a trap. We see no error in the use of this figure of speech. The court instructed the jury that they were not to be influenced thereby. There is no merit in the appeal.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. Taxation $\S$ 251—One claiming benefit of exception to or exemption from law providing for taxation must affirmatively show himself within exempted class.

Where one claims benefit of an exception to or exemption from a law providing for taxation, he must affirmatively show that he comes within class specifically made exempt from taxation.

2. Licenses $\S$ 19(3)—Rule that taxing law must be construed strictly extends to exemptions and impositions.

Requirement that taxing law is to be construed strictly extends to exemptions as well as to impositions of law precluding court from reading into Gasoline Tax Act (St. 1923, p. 575) $\S$ 11, as amended by St. 1925, p. 660, $\S$ 4, any extension of exemptions therein specifically provided.

3. Licenses $\S$ 16(9)—Fuel used in rollers and tractors in construction of highway closed to public held subject to tax (Gasoline Tax Act 1923, $\S$ 11, as amended by St. 1925, p. 660, $\S$ 4).

Gasoline fuel used in operation of rollers and tractors in highway construction work, which were not at any time operated over any highway or portion thereof that was not under construction or repair, and closed to public, held subject to tax under Gasoline Tax Act (St. 1923, p. 575) § 11, as amended by St. 1925, p. 660, § 4, which does not indicate that highways under construction or repair, and for that reason closed to public travel, shall be deemed to have lost character as public highway, and which act provided for refund of tax on gasoline used other than in motor vehicles operated upon public highways.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by George H. Oswald and John P. Oswald, a copartnership, doing business under the fictitious name of Oswald Brothers Paving Company, against Charles G. Johnson, as State Treasurer of the State of California, and another. From an adverse judgment, the defendants appeal.

Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellants.

George De Lany Blair, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem.

The action resulting in the judgment from which this appeal was taken was brought against the state treasurer and the state controller to obtain reimbursement of gasoline taxes paid by the plaintiffs on fuel used in the operation of certain rollers and tractors during the month of January, 1926. The complaint alleged that in the operation of their business of constructing and paving highways in the state of California the plaintiffs used certain rollers and tractors propelled by gasoline, but which "were not at any time operated or propelled over any highway or portion thereof that was not under construction or repair, and closed to the public." To this complaint the defendants interposed a general demurrer, which was overruled, and upon their failure to answer the judgment from which they appeal was taken against them.

The only question presented for our consideration is whether or not the complaint set up facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for a refund of taxes within the purview of section 11 of the Gasoline Tax Act (St. 1923, p. 571). That section, as amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 660), and as it stood at the time this action was commenced, provided that any person who should "buy and use any motor vehicle fuel for purposes other than in motor vehicles operated, or intended to be operated upon the public highways of the State of California or export the same for use outside of this state," or who should "buy any motor vehicle fuel and use the same exclusively in the transportation of rural free delivery mails," and who should have paid the tax on such fuel "either directly or to the vendor from whom it was purchased, or indirectly by the adding of the amount of such tax to the price of such fuel," should "be reimbursed and repaid the amount of such tax paid by him" upon presenting to the state controller "an affidavit accompanied by the original invoices showing such purchase," stating "the total amount of such fuel so purchased and [that] the same has been used by said consumer for the transportation of rural free delivery mails or for uses other than in motor vehicles operated upon any of the public highways in the State of California."

That the rollers and tractors mentioned in the complaint are "motor vehicles" is not questioned, the Gasoline Tax Act itself defining the term "motor vehicle" as including "every vehicle operated upon the highways of this state which is propelled by the use of motor vehicle fuel," while the latter term is defined as including gasoline as well as other fuels. That the vehicles in question were operated upon highways is alleged in the complaint. The theory of the respondent plaintiffs is that they are entitled to the refund because their vehicles were "used in the construction and repair of highways while such highways were closed to public use."

[1, 2] The section of the statute relied upon in instituting this action provided, in effect, for an exemption from the tax imposed upon every gallon of motor vehicle fuel distributed (save in original packages imported into the state) throughout the state of California. If the plaintiffs were entitled to a refund it could only be because the fuel used by them and on which they had paid the tax was used in a manner or for a purpose clearly falling within one of the exemptions specifically included in the section. It is a firmly established principle of law that one who claims the benefit of an exception to or exemption from a law providing for taxation must affirmatively show that he comes within a class specifically made exempt from such taxation. Cottle v. Spitzer, 65 Cal. 456, 4 P. 435, 52 Am. Rep. 305. The only exemption specified by the Gasoline Tax Act which could possibly apply to the plaintiffs is that as to motor vehicle fuel used "for purposes other than in motor vehicles operated, or intended to be operated upon the public highways of the state of California." But that exemption is inapplicable because it contains no qualification based upon the condition of highways as open or closed to general use. If the fuel was used in the operation of such vehicles upon such highways, it is not exempt from the tax, for there is no language in the act indicating expressly or even impliedly that for the purposes of the act highways under construction or repair, and for that reason closed to public travel, shall be deemed to have lost their character as public highways while so closed; nor does any law, statutory or otherwise, to which our attention has been called so provide. The rule that a taxing law is to be construed strictly "extends to exemptions, as well as impositions" (Estate of Bull, 153 Cal. 718, 96 P. 366), and we cannot read into the act any extension of the exemptions therein specifically provided.

[3] The complaint, which alleged that the vehicles belonging to the plaintiffs were propelled by gasoline and were operated on and over highways in this state, failed to state a cause of action for a refund of the tax paid on the fuel so used, and the demurrer should have been sustained.

March 13, 1930.

Criminal law ⚖️1071—Statute fixing time for application for transcript held mandatory and unambiguous (District Court of Appeal Rule 2, § 7).

District Court of Appeal Rule 2, § 7, providing that application for transcript must be filed within five days after giving notice of appeal and that appeal shall be dismissed if such application is not filed within said time, held mandatory and unambiguous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Proceeding by the People against Thomas Riga. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Richard L. North, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

.. CRAIG, J.

The application for transcript and statement of grounds of appeal was not filed by the appellant in this case within the time specified by Rule II, section 7, and a motion is made on behalf of the people that his appeal be dismissed, but it is to be observed that the present counsel of record for appellant did not become his counsel until long after this time had elapsed.

Upon an appeal by the defendant in a criminal case, it is required that he file such application and statement within five days after giving notice of appeal, and that, "if such application is not filed within said time, the appeal shall be dismissed."

In denying a motion to dismiss, upon rehearing, after a decision upholding an order of dismissal previously granted by the District Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court held that an appeal in all respects sufficient except for technical defects in form or substance, wherein the application had been filed in time, need not be dismissed. People v. Bryant (Cal. Sup.) 278 P. 1025. The only reason there mentioned for relaxing the rule was that "appellants substantially complied with section 1247, Penal Code, and the defect worked no injury to anyone"; that the legislation was then new and might have been misleading. In People v. Davis (Cal. App.) 284 P. 516, relied upon by the people in the instant case, an appeal was dismissed for failure to file an application as required; it appearing that the rule had then been in operation for a period of seventeen months. Section 1247 of the Penal Code, which prior to its repeal was similar in effect to the rule in question, was repeatedly construed to be mandatory. People v. Flaherty, 61 Cal. App. 775, 215 P. 699; People v. Hill, 78 Cal. App. 615, 248 P. 714; People v. Shaw, 81 Cal. App. 312, 253 P. 747. Likewise section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that the power of a superior court to pass upon a motion for new trial within two months would automatically work a denial of the motion, was by this court deemed mandatory. It was there concluded that the power to consider such a motion was limited to the specified period of time, and that the last day would be excluded if it fell upon Sunday or upon a holiday. Holquin v. Allison (Cal. App.) 274 P. 1037. Said section and the present rule are not in their language substantially unlike. By the former it is ordained: "The power of the court to pass upon a motion for a new trial shall expire within two months. * * * If such motion is not determined within said two months, the effect shall be a denial of the motion without further order of the court." Section 7 of Rule II (204 Cal., p. xliii) provides that, "within five days after giving notice of the appeal," such application must be filed, and that, "if such application is not filed within said time, the appeal shall be dismissed." In construing the limitation of time within which to consider a motion for new trial, it was said in Bidwell v. Sonoma County Trans. Co., 39 Cal. App. 330, 178 P. 722, 723, wherein a hearing by the Supreme Court was denied: "Without advertent to the evident intent of the Legislature * * * section 660 is specific as to the time within which the court may pass upon a motion for a new trial, and in the most positive terms confines the power of the court to perform that particular act to the period named, and, going even further, provides that, failing action by the court within said time, the motion is automatically deemed denied."

Whether a duty of one of the parties be to initiate proceedings preliminary to appeal, or to bring them before the court for consideration, we think the specification of a definite time in positive terms within which he must act is mandatory and leaves no room for its performance at a later date. Enactments directing that, for a failure to observe their plain and certain mandates, a proceeding in the one case shall be dismissed, and in the other that it shall be deemed at an end, are not in this respect capable of differentiation. We think the rule before us is unambiguous.

The appeal is dismissed.

1. Burglary — Defendant entering dwelling house in nighttime during absence of occupants held guilty of burglary in first degree (Pen. Code, § 460).

In prosecution for burglary, where it appeared that defendant unlawfully entered dwelling house in nighttime, during absence of occupants, defendant held guilty of burglary of first degree under Pen. Code, § 460.

2. Burglary — Burglarized house was an "inhabited dwelling house" within burglary statute, notwithstanding occupants were away on trip (Pen. Code, § 460).

In prosecution for burglary, where it appeared that defendant made entry into dwelling house in nighttime, during absence of occupants, contention that house at time of burglary was not "inhabited dwelling house," within scope of Penal Code, § 460, held unavailing, notwithstanding fact that occupant and family were away on trip to other state.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Inhabited Dwelling House," see Words and Phrases.]

PER CURIAM.

By the information, defendant was charged with the crime of burglary, committed as follows: That at the time and place stated, he did wilfully, etc., enter the dwelling house of one Munro with intent to steal, etc., the goods and personal property of Munro. To this charge the defendant pleaded guilty. It thus became the duty of the court to ascertain and determine the degree of this crime as committed. Pen. Code, § 1192. The court found that the crime was burglary of the first degree, and judgment was entered accordingly.

[1, 2] On this appeal from the judgment, appellant makes the single contention that the court erred in its determination that said burglary was of the first degree. The unlawful entry was made in the nighttime, and during the absence of the occupants. The defendant was not armed with any deadly weapon. Burglary of an inhabited dwelling house or building, committed in the nighttime, is burglary of the first degree. Section 460, Pen. Code.

It is the contention of appellant that the house of Munro, at the time of said burglary, was not "an inhabited dwelling house." The facts were that on July 18, 1929, Munro was living at the described premises with his wife and son. On that date, they went away for a trip to the eastern states, and did not return until August 27th. On leaving their home they closed and locked the house, leaving therein their household furnishings and personal property. They did not give to any one permission to enter the house or move any of the property during their absence. On the night of July 18th, during said temporary absence of the occupants, the burglary was committed by the defendant.

Upon the stated facts we are satisfied that the crime was burglary of the first degree. People v. Allard (Cal. App.) 279 P. 182; 4 R. C. L. 427; 2 Am. St. Rep. 389; State v. Mason, 74 Ohio St. 65, 77 N. E. 283; Olds v. State, 19 Ala. App. 162, 95 So. 780.

MORTARA v. RIZZI.

Civ. 4021.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 10, 1930.

Reformation of instruments $\Rightarrow$ 46—Finding in action to reform contract for sale of land held sufficient to establish mutual mistake in omitting agreement to assume lien arising from dissolution of Irrigation district (Civ. Code, § 1578, subd. 1).

In action to reform contract for sale of land on ground of mutual mistake, finding that defendant prior to execution of agreement had knowledge of existence of judgment dissolving irrigation district and of lien created thereby, which defendant agreed to assume but which agreement was inadvertently omitted, though not a specific finding of mutual mistake, was nevertheless sufficient, in that it reasonably appeared from facts found that there was such mistake within meaning of Civ. Code, § 1578, subd. 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by Albert Mortara against John Rizzi. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Carter & Smith and L. C. Smith, all of Redding, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J.

This is an action to reform a contract for the sale of land, by the plaintiff to the defendant, on the ground of mutual mistake and for other relief. The plaintiff was given judgment, and the defendant has appealed. The appellant contends that neither the evidence nor the findings show a mutual mistake.

The court found that prior to and at the time of the execution of the contract the land was incumbered by the lien of a judgment rendered in a proceeding for the dissolution of the Happy Valley irrigation district; that "prior to the execution of said agreement said defendant had knowledge of and knew of the existence of said judgment of dissolution and the lien thereby created"; that "it was understood and agreed by and between plaintiff and defendant that defendant was to assume and agreed with plaintiff to pay any and all liens existing against said property"; that in the drafting of said agreement there was inadvertently omitted therefrom a covenant obligating the defendant to pay and discharge "any lien or encumbrance caused by reason of the dissolution of the Happy Valley Irrigation District"; that "said agreement as it is written does not express the true agreement or mutual understanding of the parties thereto, and that the only way whereby said contract can be made to express the true intent and agreement of said parties is to insert the clause hereinabove noted."

It is true that there is no specific finding of mutual mistake, but it reasonably appears from the facts found by the court that there was such a mistake, and therefore it must be held that the findings are sufficient. Horton v. Winbiger, 175 Cal. 149, 154, 165 P. 423; Holmes v. Anderson, 90 Cal. App. 276, 288, 285 P. 1010; Shindelar v. Hadacheck, 88 Cal. App. 319, 321, 263 P. 305; Robertson v. Melville, 60 Cal. App. 354, 358, 212 P. 723.

While the testimony given by the parties themselves is conflicting, that of the draftsman who drew the contract clearly shows that the defendant agreed to assume and pay the said judgment lien, and that a covenant binding him to pay the amount thereof was omitted from the contract through a mutual mistake of law, as that term is defined by section 1578, subdivision 1, of the Civil Code.

The judgment is affirmed.

GUBIN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

Civ. 7224.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

March 5, 1930.

Mandamus $\Rightarrow$ 40—Mandamus held not proper remedy to compel superior court in divorce action to receive excluded testimony (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1881, subd. 1; 2055).

Where testimony of witness in divorce action called to stand, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, was excluded on objection under section 1881, subd. 1, providing that neither wife nor husband may be examined for or against the other without the other's consent, mandamus held not proper remedy to compel superior court to receive such testimony.

Original application by Rhonie Gubin for a writ of mandamus prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, and Hon. Warren V. Tryon, Judge of Department 42 thereof, to compel respondent to receive testimony in an action of divorce.

Writ denied.

C. C. Montgomery, Ben C. Cohen, and Sam Wolf, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Paul W. Schenck, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

The petitioner seeks the writ of mandate to compel the respondent court to receive testimony. Simply stated, the proposition presented to us in this: The petitioner here sued her husband in the respondent court for divorce and incidentally for a division of the community property. She joined the defendant's brother, Oscar Gubin, and his wife, Bertha Gubin, as defendants, alleging that the two latter held the record title to property, which in truth and in fact belonged to herself and her husband as community property. After Bertha Gubin was called to the stand under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, her counsel objected to plaintiff's counsel interrogating her with respect to the sources from which the money was secured with which the property was purchased, on the ground that by subdivision 1 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure neither a wife nor a husband may be examined for or against the other without the other's consent. This objection was sustained, the trial judge indicating that he would also uphold counsel's contention that the husband could not be examined for or against the wife without her consent. It is this line of testimony which the petitioner asks us to compel the trial judge to receive. This we must decline to do, not on the ground that the testimony is not receivable, which point we expressly disclaim any intention of passing upon in this proceeding, but for the reason that we cannot make use of this high prerogative writ for the purpose here sought.

We are fully aware of the confident reliance placed by petitioner on the cases of Johnston v. St. Sure, 50 Cal. App. 736, 195 P. 947, and Wissman v. Cabaniss, 34 Cal. App. 487, 168 P. 150, but we think those authorities fail to hit the mark. In neither of the cited instances was the appellate tribunal called upon to direct a trial court during the trial of the action what evidence it should receive. In both cases the deposition of the spouse was being taken and the writ was utilized for the purpose of directing the judge taking the deposition to receive the testimony. That is quite different from attempting to prevent the court from committing error during the progress of a trial. We adhere to the opinion written by us in Short v. Superior Court, 94 Cal. App. 664, 271 P. 783, 784, wherein we said: "The law enjoined upon respondent court no duty to receive any particular evidence in petitioner's suit for divorce. The only duty of the court was to try the action and to render judgment. This it has done. If any errors have been committed during the progress of the trial, they cannot be corrected by means of the writ of mandate."

It is asserted that because Oscar Gubin applied for and was denied a writ of prohibition by another division of this court at a time when testimony was being taken by a court commissioner, to prevent him from receiving the same character of evidence which it is now sought, by this proceeding to compel the respondent court to admit, we are bound by that refusal, although the denial was ex parte. Our attention is directed to Reilly v. Police Court, 194 Cal. 375, 228 P. 860, to support the argument, in which case it was decided that the denial of a writ of prohibition by the District Court of Appeal without the filing of a written opinion, to prevent an inferior court from proceeding with the trial of an action, is a bar to a subsequent application to the Supreme Court for the same relief upon the same facts. The correctness of this conclusion cannot be doubted. But in the instant cause we can very properly assume that the writ of prohibition was denied for the same reason that the peremptory writ of mandate here sought should not issue, i. e., that a proper case was not made out for the use of the writ.

A writ of mandate is denied.

Civ. 7265.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.
March 12, 1930.

Insurance $\Rightarrow$ 282(1)—Fire policy covering building, fixtures, and equipment held not void, because building contained personal property insured bought on conditional sales contracts (Civ. Code, § 2612).

Where fire insurance policy by its terms divided property into three items—$3,000 on main building, $3,500 on fixtures and equipment, and $500 on adjacent building—policy was not void, because insured had in building items of personal property which he had purchased on conditional sales contracts, under clause providing that entire policy should be void, if interest of insured was other than unconditional and sole ownership in property covered in whole or in part by policy, since policy did not purport to cover property purchased under conditional sales contracts, and there was no breach of warranty under Civ. Code, § 2612.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter J. Desmond, Judge.

cover on a fire insurance policy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action to recover on a fire insurance policy. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and, from a judgment entered thereon, the defendant has appealed. The property burned in the fire included a gas and oil station and restaurant, together with the contents. Prior to the issuance of the policy the plaintiff had purchased on the installment plan the lot and the improvements that were then on it, and thereafter he had moved onto the lot another building and had furnished both buildings. Among other things he had in the buildings certain personal property which he had purchased and had fully paid for and which were of the value of $750. He had in the buildings other personal property which had been purchased on conditional sales contracts and on which he had made some payments, but a comparatively small amount of the total purchase price. Thereafter on February 12, 1926, defendant issued its policy insuring the plaintiff in the sum of $7,000. The policy by its terms divided the property into three items: $3,000 on the main building, $3,500 on fixtures and equipment, and $500 on a small building adjacent and referred to as the rest-room. On March 31, 1926, the property was totally destroyed by fire. On the 17th day of May, 1926, the plaintiff presented to the defendant a proof of loss in which the plaintiff itemized his loss item by item, including, among other things, the articles of personal property which he had purchased under conditional sales contracts. Pursuant to a covenant contained in the policy, upon the demand of the defendant, the plaintiff appeared before a notary public on July 26, 1926, and was examined under oath regarding the items of his loss and his title to each item. At that time he stated the facts, and it is not contended that he did not state the facts truly. When the case was brought to trial the plaintiff's attorney waived all claim regarding the properties purchased under conditional sales contracts. Acting on such waiver the trial court allowed nothing on the items so waived, but ordered judgment for $750 on the personal property that had been fully paid for and $3,000 on the buildings. At this time the defendant contends that the contract was entire; that the plaintiff was not the owner of the property purchased under the conditional sales contract; that therefore the policy never attached either as to the personal property or the buildings. The policy contained numerous conditions, among others, "matters avoiding policy." That clause, omitting irrelevant parts, provided: "Unless otherwise provided by agreement endorsed hereon or added hereto this entire policy shall be void * * * (b) if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership * * *" on the property covered in whole or in part by the policy.

On the face of the policy there is no clause which specifically included the personal property which had been purchased under conditional sales contracts. There is no clause which even purports to cover the interest of the plaintiff in such property. Therefore as to the personal property the case falls directly within the rule stated in Coniglio v. Connecticut Fire Ins. Co., 180 Cal. 596, 599, 182 P. 275, 5 A. L. R. 805. The court has neither the right nor the inclination to place a strained construction on the language of the policy to include the property purchased under conditional sales contracts and thereupon declare that there was a breach of warranty. Civ. Code, § 2612. Nothing to the contrary appearing, under well-settled rules, we are bound to hold that the policy never even purported to cover the property so purchased under conditional sales contracts. If we are correct in this conclusion, and we have no doubt whatever on the subject, it follows that the other contentions made by the defendant need not be discussed. We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MANES. ★

Cr. No. 1890.

Rehearing Denied March 28, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 10, 1930.

1. Forgery $\S$ 44(1/2)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of forgery.

In prosecution for forgery, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1129(2)—Assignments of error without attempting to assist appellate court by making application of law to instances assigned held insufficient.

In prosecution for forgery, where defendant on appeal made several assignments of error but did not attempt to assist appellate court by making application of law to any of instances he assigned as erroneous, defendant's assignments held insufficient, as it is duty of counsel to present argument and authority to appellate court in such manner as to indicate error complained of.

3. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1037(2)—Defendant could not complain of misconduct of district attorney, where trial court was not asked to correct harm, if any.

In prosecution for forgery, where counsel for defendant urged that district attorney was guilty of misconduct but did not ask trial court to correct harm if any was done, defendant could not complain of misconduct on appeal.

4. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 954(1)—Defendant not asking for new trial on ground that time for pronouncing judgment had elapsed held not entitled to new trial on such ground (Pen. Code, § 1191).

Where, in prosecution for forgery, verdict was returned on August 14, 1929, and defendant waived time for sentence and made oral application for probation, which was denied on September 12, and defendant then made motion for new trial but not on ground that time for pronouncing judgment had elapsed, even if waiver of time for sentence by defendant on August 14 did not carry time beyond 20-day period mentioned in Pen. Code, § 1191, defendant held not entitled to new trial on such ground, inasmuch as he did not ask for it.

5. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 957(5)—Overruling motion for new trial based on misconduct of juror supported by affidavit held proper, where affiant's information and belief was based on statement of juror.

Trial court's refusal to grant motion for new trial supported by affidavit presented by defendant and sworn to by another, on information and belief, to effect that he had been informed by unnamed juror that jury had found out defendant had spent five years in penitentiary, which was probably why she was scared to take stand, held proper.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment pronounced upon the verdict of a jury finding the defendant guilty of forgery and from an order denying her motion for a new trial. The first reason assigned by appellant for a reversal of the judgment and order is that the evidence is insufficient to establish the offense. We shall refer to the testimony produced by the prosecution for the purpose of supporting the verdict.

[1] The lady to whom we shall hereafter refer as Peggy Tompkins, which was her maiden name, had been married to a man by the name of Murphy and had been divorced prior to her acquaintance with the appellant and the man with whom appellant lived and who was known as August W. Manes, but whose real name was Poolitzski or Povlitzski. These three persons lived in the same bungalow court for some time prior to August 24, 1928, and had become very friendly. Peggy Tompkins had loaned to August Manes various sums of money approximating $200. On the date mentioned, August Manes sold to Peggy Tompkins a lot in Huntington Park for the total sum of $800, representing to her, in the presence of appellant, that it was a great bargain and saying to her that she could pay him $60 down; that he would apply what he owed her; and that the remainder could be paid at the rate of $15 per month. Peggy Tompkins says that she paid him the $60 (the sum of $600 appears in one instance in the record, but otherwise the sum referred to is $60), and signed one or two papers for the purchase, one of which papers said the lot was owned by a Mrs. Olive Mills. About a week or so later Manes and appellant moved from the bungalow court. On August 29, 1928, a deed from Olive H. Mills conveyed the lot in question to August W. Manes and Beatrice H. Manes, as joint tenants. A deed dated August 25, 1928, signed by appellant and Manes, conveyed the property to "Peggy Tompkins, wife of Harold Tompkins," although she was in fact unmarried at the time. Peggy Tompkins did not see the deed prior to its recordation. On August 24, 1928, a deed of trust to the Los Angeles-First National Trust & Savings Bank as trustee for the benefit of Olive H. Mills, and to secure the payment of the sum of $800, payable at the rate of $15 per month, appears to have been executed. These two deeds and the trust deed were all filed for record on December 14, 1928. The record indicates that the trust deed here mentioned was one of those signed by Peggy Tompkins on August 24, 1928, although the pages were so turned that the witness did not understand she was signing a trust deed. She did not acknowledge her signature before a notary. On October 10, 1928, Manes and the appellant went to the office of the Pacific States Savings & Loan Company where Manes introduced the appellant as Peggy Tompkins. There they made final arrangements for a loan of $3,100, and the appellant, as Peggy Tompkins, signed a trust deed and note for that amount. She also represented that the property was her separate property and that her husband was in the navy and for that reason could not sign the papers. About $2,600 of the loan was paid out to a man named Robert B. Cook, a contractor, who built a house upon the lot. Cook was not a witness in the case, but there can be no doubt that the Pacific States Savings & Loan Company were defrauded by the execution by appellant of the note and trust deed in the name of Peggy Tompkins. The evidence is ample to justify the jury's verdict. In fact, it is so self-evident that discussion is not necessary.

[2] Counsel has grouped together six assignments of error relating to the reception and rejection of testimony, i. e., set one instance after another down without further argument than to say in each case that it is error or prejudicial to the right of the defendant. Following all of these assignments he cites some authorities relating to cross-examination, but in no place does he attempt to assist us by making application of the law to any of the instances he assigns as erroneous. This is insufficient. However, we have been at pains to examine the entire record, largely because it has been difficult to understand the brief of counsel, and we have failed to discover any error in any of the assignments. Under a heading of "Point three" counsel says: "The court erred by virtually declaring a blockade against defense evidence." He then cites subdivisions 1, 3, 7, and 15 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Without further ado he then quotes 15 instances in which the court rejected testimony offered by the appellant. No other or further argument is made and no effort made to apply the three fundamental rules of evidence to the assignments of error. We have time and again pointed out to counsel that it is their duty to present their argument and authority to us in such a manner as to indicate the error complained of, and that in case of their failure so to do we are not called upon to assume their labors. But again we say that we have discovered no error.

[3] Counsel assures us that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct. At no place did he ask the court to correct the harm if any was done, and this would be a sufficient answer to appellant's claim in this regard. In addition to that, however, we find no misconduct on the part of the district attorney. And finally, the learned trial judge was meticulously careful in his admonitions to the jury to disregard all extraneous matter, including the remarks of counsel. Not once, but several times, he advised them of their duty in this particular.

The same failure to argue or aid us with authority is apparent when counsel presents certain instructions which were given and certain others which were requested and not given. We have examined the instructions and are of the opinion that the jury was fully and fairly advised of its duty and of the law applicable to the issues of the case.

[4] The verdict was returned on August 14, 1929. The defendant waived time for sentence and made oral application for probation. The time for passing on the application was set for August 22, 1929, and on that date, with the defendant and her counsel in court, it was continued to September 12, 1929. On September 12, the application was denied and defendant made a motion for a new trial, not upon the ground, however, that the time for pronouncing judgment had elapsed, which motion was denied on September 16, and sentence pronounced. It is now asserted that the court had lost its jurisdiction to sentence the defendant. Assuming that the waiver of time for sentence by the appellant on August 14 did not carry the time beyond the twenty-day period mentioned in section 1191 of the Penal Code, we have a situation exactly parallel to that considered in People v. Okomoto, 26 Cal. App. 568, 147 P. 598, 600. There the court said: "Here it appears that the defendant was entitled to a new trial; but it further appears that a new trial was not refused, inasmuch as he did not ask for it. * * * It has been held by this court that, in the absence of any objection made by the defendant at the time of pronouncing judgment, and in the absence of any demand made by him for a new trial upon the ground that the legal time limit had expired, the court might rightfully enter the judgment." People v. Polich, 25 Cal. App. 464, 143 P. 1065. A similar opinion was indicated by this court in the case of In re Hemstreet, 18 Cal. App. 639, 123 P. 984, where it was said that, under those sections of the Penal Code, the trial court should, 'upon application therefor,' grant defendant a new trial." (Italics ours.) The proper course of procedure is set forth again in People v. Winner, 31 Cal. App. 352, 160 P. 689.

[5] The last contention of appellant is that the trial court should have granted a new trial upon an affidavit presented by her and sworn to by one Paul Angelillo to the effect that he had been informed by an unnamed juror on the day of the verdict that they had found out appellant "had spent five years in the penitentiary for the same sort of stuff and has been pulling these fast ones for a long time; that's probably why she was scared to take the stand." It is manifest from the affidavit that affiant had no personal knowledge of the facts. His information and belief was based solely upon the indefinite and uncertain statement made to him by the juror. The trial court was governed by the rule announced in People v. Albori (Cal. App.) 275 P. 1017, and properly denied the motion for a new trial based on the ground discussed.

Judgment and order affirmed.

March 10, 1930.1. Limitation of actions § 29(2)—Four-year limitation applies where debtor made payment with indication he intended the account to remain open (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2).

To bring an account within the limitation of four years, under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2, it should not alone be one where payment had been made leaving balance due, but one in which payment was made with indication of debtor that he intended account to remain open.

2. Limitation of actions § 29(2)—Where only showing of open account was payment of $400 and memorandum in diary of steps taken to accomplish inspection of land, two-year limitation applied (Code Civ. Proc. § 339).

Action on "open book account" for services of inspection and report on land was barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 339, after two years, where only showing of open account was payment of $400 claimed to be final payment by debtor and memorandum in diary of steps necessary to accomplish object of inspection and report on land.

Action by F. A. Gray against Albert J. Hall and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

N. B. Nelson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The plaintiff and respondent, as assignee of an alleged claim for personal services and expenses in the sum of $977.62, instituted an action upon an "open book account." Judgment was rendered in his favor for $798.62, and the defendants appealed.

Among other grounds of defense, it was contended that the cause of action was barred by section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It appears that the only evidence offered by the plaintiff in support of the alleged book account consisted of entries in a diary from which the witness refreshed his memory. He testified to various conversations, journeys of persons to certain lands of the defendants, the making of surveys, drawings, and charges therefor, and that the sum of $400 had been paid on account. There was no showing of even a pretended "account" as contemplated by the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] We think the instant case is squarely within the rule announced in Merchants' Collection Agency v. Levi, 32 Cal. App. 595, 163 P. 870. The only question there presented was as to whether the account was such that an action might be maintained thereon within four years from its inception, or was barred after the expiration of two years by the provisions of section 339 of said Code. Two purchases had been charged upon the books of a large mercantile establishment, for which no payments on account had been made, but we think the principles no less applicable to the facts here presented. It was there said that to bring an account within the limitation of four years it should not alone be one whereon payments had been made, leaving a balance due, but one in which after the payment of amounts there was an indication of the debtor that he intended the account to remain open. That "the intent of the legislature in amending subdivision 2 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so as to include open book accounts, was to take accounts out of the category of simple accounts to which it had been long held the provisions of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure had application, and place such accounts in the same category with mutual, open, and current accounts whereon the balance remaining due from time to time was the result of mutual transactions other than mere money credits."

[2] It is conceded that the original entry related the consummation of but one transaction—the inspection and report upon a tract of land in the San Jacinto mountains. Plaintiffs' assignors and their engineers went upon the ground, performed services, and made a report, at a per diem of $30 in addition to the expense of transportation and maintenance. The defendants paid them the sum of $400, and contended that they had agreed to pay no more. It is clear that mere memoranda in a diary of various steps necessary to the accomplishment of this object cannot be deemed a series of mutual transactions other than a simple account, even if dignified by the characterization of bookkeeping of any character. Tipps v. Landers, 182 Cal. 771, 190 P. 173.

Rehearing Granted April 4, 1930.

1. Landlord and tenant ⚭79(2)—Relation of landlord and tenant existed between original lessor and lessee's assignee entering into possession.

Assignee of lease, on accepting assignment, became liable only to lessee, but, on entry into possession, the relation of landlord and tenant was created between the original lessor and the assignee, and its holding created a privity of estate.

2. Damages ⚭40(2)—Neither party determines extent to which experiment shall proceed, where profits are wholly speculative and success or failure is of mutual interest.

When profits from enterprise are wholly prospective and speculative or conjectural, and success or failure of the experiment is of mutual interest, neither party to contract is arbiter to extent to which, or diligence with which, operations shall proceed.

3. Damages ⚭6—Parties to contract are relegated to equitable proceedings, where profits are wholly conjectural and it is impracticable to estimate damages (Civ. Code, § 3301).

If compensation or penalty is not specified by the parties as provided by Civ. Code, § 3301, are precluded from recovering damages.

4. Mines and minerals ⚭78(1)—Lessor held not entitled to damages for failure to drill well to required depth, where rental was payable from oil produced and quantity of oil at lower levels was unknown (Civ. Code, § 3301).

One leasing real property for oil and gas prospecting by agreement under which lessee was to drill to depth of 5,200 feet for oil and gas, and to pay as rental $2,500 from the first production and one-sixth of all other production, held not entitled to damages from sublessee for failure to drill to the required depth, where it was not shown how deep well would have to be drilled to reach oil, or what would be the probable regularity of flow, if any, or the market value of the product, since, under the circumstances, the amount of damages or rental was wholly unascertainable, and therefore, under Civ. Code, § 3301, damages could not be recovered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Garland P. Fallis and another against the Julian Petroleum Corporation and the Courtney Petroleum Company. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal.

CRAIG, J.

By a contract dated February 26, 1925, the appellants leased to the defendant Courtney Petroleum Company for a period of five years certain real property upon which the latter agreed to drill to a depth of 5,200 feet for oil, gas, and other allied products, and to pay as rental $2,500 from the first production, and one-sixth of all other production. The lessee drilled to a depth of 4,158 feet, whereupon, by written assignment and a collateral contract, it delivered possession to respondent Julian Petroleum Corporation. The lessors do not appear to have consented to the assignment. On December 20, 1926, the lessors commenced this action against their original lessee and its assignee by a complaint consisting of three causes of action, embracing said lease and contemporaneous agreements, alleging that the Julian Corporation had not drilled to a depth exceeding 4,162 feet, that both companies had ceased operations, and that, through their negligent and unworkmanlike conduct of the project, production had failed. The original lease provided that "the terms and conditions hereof shall be binding upon, and accrue to the benefit of the heirs, executors, successors and assigns of the respective parties hereto, and an acceptance of an assignment hereof, by any person, shall be construed as a promise on his part to be bound by and perform all of the lessee's covenants herein contained. Time is of the essence of this lease." By the assignment it was agreed that the Courtney Company sold and conveyed to the Julian Corporation "all of the right, title and interest of the original lessee and present owner in and to said lease and all rights thereunder." The collateral agreement recited that said assignment was made upon conditions and covenants not contained therein, but which were contained in the collateral contract; that, if the well be put on production at a depth less than 4,600 feet, but should make less than 350 barrels, it should be deepened to a specified horizon located approximately 5,000 feet to 5,100 feet; that the assignee "does not undertake to complete said well as a producing oil well at said depth, but does agree to properly drill the same to said depth and there endeavor in the usual and customary manner to place the same on production." By the terms of the original lease, it was recited that it was impossible to determine from current developments as to the necessary depth of the well, but that at a later date the parties would confer regarding the progress of other wells in that vicinity, and "determine what is the best to do for their mutual interests," and the lessors, reserved the right to terminate the lease for failure to perform any of its terms or conditions upon ten days' notice of election so to do. Neither of these two provisions appears to have been observed by the parties. The plaintiffs alleged that, "had a well been drilled on said leased property as so required by said lease to a depth of fifty-two hundred (5,200) feet, or production at a lesser depth, a well producing oil and gas in large and commercial quantities would have resulted"; that one-sixth of the production would have been worth $65,000; that the Julian Corporation failed to continue drilling to a depth of 5,200 feet, or to a lesser depth at which mineral in paying quantities might be found; and that it had not paid the $2,500 nor placed the well on production by diligent or continuous operation in good faith.

The respondent Julian Corporation interposed a demurrer to the complaint, upon general grounds, and specifically urging that it failed to allege any obligation of said corporation to drill to a depth of 5,200 feet, what if any would have been the initial production, how long the well would have produced, or at what rate, or the price of oil over any period of production, or upon what basis the plaintiffs computed the amount of $67,500 for which they prayed judgment. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend as to the Julian Corporation, and the plaintiffs appealed.

[1] The first point advanced by appellants is well taken. While the respondent, by accepting an assignment of the lease, became liable only to the lessee, its entry into possession created the relation of landlord and tenant between the original lessor and the assignee, and its holding created a privity of estate. Bonetti v. Treat, 91 Cal. 223, 27 P. 612, 14 L. R. A. 151; Webb v. Jones, 88 Cal. App. 20, 263 P. 538.

[2, 3] It is observed that the sublessee did not agree with the lessee to drill below 5,100 feet, nor to complete a producing well, and that the original parties did not confer regarding surrounding developments as to means or methods contributing to their mutual benefit. However, regardless of these omissions, without some knowledge as to the necessary depth, the probable regularity or volume of flow, if any, or the market price of such products, the amount of damages or rentals is wholly unascertainable. While, as argued by appellants, a demurrer admits the pleaded facts, the allegations and constituent contracts concede that respondent's sole neglect or evasion consisted of a failure to drill to a depth of 5,200 feet, that it agreed to pay no rental except from production, and that it did not contract to furnish a producing well. Respondent agreed to drill but 5,100 feet, and its experienced drillers may have determined at a depth of 4,162 feet that further expenditures for that purpose would be futile. Damages for the breach of covenants such as are here presented may be agreed upon in advance, and an amount so fixed will be presumed as adequate compensation for losses incurred by a lessor through failure of performance by the lessee. Civ. Code, § 1670, 1671. When profits are wholly prospective and speculative or conjectural, and the success or failure of such an experiment is of mutual interest, neither party is the arbiter of the extent to which or the diligence with which operations shall proceed. Brewster v. Lanyon Zinc Co., 140 F. 801, 72 C. C. A. 213. Hence, if the compensation or penalty be not specified by the parties, or if it be impracticable or extremely difficult of estimation, they are relegated to proper proceedings in equity for relief. Hanlon Drydock, etc., Co. v. McNear, 70 Cal. App. 204, 232 P. 1002; Brewster v. Lanyon Zinc Co., supra; Craig v. Wade, 159 Cal. 172, 112 P. 891. "No damages can be recovered for a breach of contract which are not clearly ascertainable in both their nature and origin." Civ. Code, § 3301.

[4] In the instant case even the initial payment of \$2,500 is dependent only upon a mere venture, and is wholly contingent upon uncertainties the extent of which cannot be estimated or determined judicially in dollars and cents. It is a matter of common knowledge that the success or failure of such enterprises, and the casualties and incidental effort and expense of production, if any result, are matters ever held in suspense until mineral is found or the project is abandoned. By the most favorable reading of the complaint and the contract of the parties, this fact appears to have been recognized. It was expressly stated that "the lessee agrees as a further consideration to pay the lessors one-fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of the entire production from the lease, of all oils or other hydro-carbons;" "said twenty-five hundred dollars (\$2,500) oil bonus to be paid out of twenty-five per cent (25%) of the gross production of oil, gas and other hydro-carbons;" "a one-sixth royalty and the twenty-five hundred dollars (\$2,500) provided for in said lease to be paid out of twenty-five per cent (25%) of the first oil."

The principles above announced were aptly applied in the case last cited (Craig v. Wade, supra), wherein the plaintiff sought to recover upon alleged misrepresentations as to the value of certain oil properties. Our Supreme Court there said: "Twenty thousand dollars may have been expended in sinking a well which has not yet reached oil sands, and which may never reach them. To a sanguine man in the expectation of soon striking oil, the well may have a value of many hundreds of thousands of dollars. To the pessimistic man, who believes oil will never be struck, the $20,000 expended is money lost, and the well is valueless. So, too, if oil be in fact found, the duration of its flow is entirely uncertain, and the flow itself may increase or decrease without apparent reason. If the well yields 100 barrels of oil to-day, it may yield 1,000 barrels, or none at all, to-morrow. To place a value in terms of money upon such a flowing well must therefore itself of necessity be a matter of opinion merely, since it is not within human knowledge to foresee the contingencies which may result in greatly enhancing or utterly destroying its output."

There are other decisions in this state of like import. Esccondido Oil Co. v. Glaser, 144 Cal. 494, 77 P. 1040; Burrows v. Petroleum Development Co., 181 Cal. 253, 184 P. 5; Sledge v. Stolz, 41 Cal. App. 209, 182 P. 340.

Authorities upon which the appellants rely in support of their theory of recovery are not persuasive, since they either sound in tort or arise from facts furnishing fixed bases for the estimation of damages, such as the known production of other wells in the immediate locality, as was the case in Wheeland v. Fredonia Gas Co., 92 Kan. 50, 139 P. 1010. We think the rules applicable to the instant case are so well established that to confuse them with distinctions would serve no good purpose.

I concur: WORKS, P. J.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

I dissent. The third cause of action in particular alleges that the leased premises were in proven oil territory; that the drilling of a well to the required depth of 5,200 feet in a workmanlike and careful manner and with due diligence would have resulted in the production of oil and gas in large quantities; that, by reason of the negligent failure to drill to the depth mentioned, the property was drained of its oil and its gas pressure reduced by wells on adjacent and surrounding property; that, by reason thereof, plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $67,500. There is also an allegation that the defendants well knew that "highly prolific oil and gas producing sands underlay said property" at the time of the execution of the lease and prior to the assignment to the defendant. The last averment is tantamount to an allegation that the parties had in contemplation the possibility of the property being drained of its mineral substance by the surrounding wells, or at least it is readily amendable to state that ultimate fact. I do not find the California authorities relied upon to be in point. Concededly, they establish the rule of law that in similar instances liquidated damages are permissible on account of the extreme difficulty of fixing damages arising from the breach of such a contract.

The language of Parkinson v. Langdon, 36 Cal. App. 80, 171 P. 710, 712, indicates, however, that the difficulty of measuring the damage does not of necessity mean that he who is wronged by the breach of a solemn obligation shall be remediless. It is there said: "The line of distinction between profits which are remote, consequential, or not within the contemplation of the parties, and those which are proximate and absolute and certain, and within the contemplation of the parties, 'seems to rest in the question whether they are to arise directly out of the contract in question or its subject-matter, and to constitute the immediate fruits of the contract, or whether they are to result from collateral engagements or enterprises. Where the profit to be made was the inducement to the contract, such profit is the measure of damages. So a recovery may be had for the loss of profits which are the direct and immediate fruits of the contract itself. Such profits are not to be regarded as consequential, remote, or speculative in character, but are regarded as part and parcel of the contract itself, entering into and constituting a portion of its very elements, something stipulated for, and the right to the enjoyment of which is just as clear and plain as to the fulfillment of any other stipulation.' Id. The foregoing is about as satisfactory an explanation of the philosophy of the rule as we can find in the books, and, it seems to us, furnishes a safe guide to a solution of the question here. The contract plainly shows that the land was to be planted to a specific crop, and none other. Both parties understood this and contracted with reference to that understanding. Plaintiff's compensation was to be measured by an agreed per centum of this specific crop, and not otherwise. Given, land suitable for growing beans; condition of soil, climate, moisture, etc., favorable to the production of a profitable crop, and nothing supervening to prevent such result except the failure of the contracting party to do what his contract required of him, it seems to us we have a clear case where the loss to the lessor 'is such as might naturally be expected to follow from the breach,' and that he would be entitled to the 'profits which would ordinarily and naturally, and in the usual course of things, have been derived from performance,' and furnishes an instance where 'the loss flows directly and naturally from the breach of the contract itself,' and is recoverable, since the loss is 'naturally incident to the contract, and may be fairly supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties when it was made.'" To the same general effect, reference may be had to Sanford v. East Riverside Irr. Dist., 101 Cal. 275, 35 P. 865, and Meer v. Cerati, 53 Cal. App. 497, 200 P. 501.

I am convinced that the court should have permitted the plaintiffs to make proof, if such they could, of the allegation that they had been damaged by the draining of their property by surrounding wells. A few quotations from persuasive authorities in other jurisdictions will indicate the reasons I entertain for such opinion.

In Blair v. Clear Creek Oil & Gas Co., 148 Ark. 301, 230 S. W. 286, 288, 19 A. L. R. 430, we find two pertinent expressions of the court as follows:

"The record shows that drilling wells is very expensive and is only undertaken where the lessee has a large area of acreage in a block. It is a matter of common knowledge that the landowner is not equipped with machinery for drilling and could not purchase such machinery on short notice, if able to do so. Hence, when he leases his land to another with the exclusive right to drill for oil and gas on it for a stipulated period of time, there is an implied covenant on the part of the lessee to protect the land at least from wells drilled by him on adjoining property which will necessarily draw the gas from the lessor's land. If there had been no lease on his land, the lessor could have had all the time during which the wells were drilled on adjoining land to have arranged for the drilling of an offset well on his land and in case a producing well was brought in on the adjoining land which would draw the gas off his own land. Of course, if he failed to make such an arrangement, the loss would fall upon himself. In case, however, he has leased his land to another and has given the lessee the exclusive right to drill on his land for gas, it is obvious that the mere right of forfeiture in case the lessee would not drill a protection well would not afford him adequate relief. * * *

"It appears from the record that expert witnesses acquainted with the gas field may testify with reasonable accuracy as to the number of wells which should have been drilled on the leased land for protection from drainage. Such witnesses might also testify with reasonable accuracy as to the quantity of gas obtained from the wells. They did say that the sand in which the gas was found was sufficiently porous that a well would draw from underneath the ground gas for a distance of a quarter of a mile in all directions. The record in the case also shows that the three wells operated by appellee on the adjacent tract will in due course of time draw all the gas from underneath the land of appellants. The lessee under the facts disclosed by the record is liable to the lessors for their proportionate share of the gas taken by the wells drilled so near their boundary lines as to draw off the gas underneath their land. There is no reason why it cannot be ascertained with reasonable certainty what quantity and quality of gas has been and will be taken from appellants' land through the wells drilled and operated by appellee on the adjoining land. Culbertson v. Iola Portland Ce-

And on rehearing it was also said: "From the evidence already taken it would seem that the gas-producing on the leased premises and the land adjacent thereto is of uniform character, and that expert witnesses can with a reasonable amount of certainty tell the amount of gas that will be drawn from the leased premises by the wells dug near the boundary line by the lessee on the adjacent premises. When the amount of gas that will be drawn from the leased premises is ascertained, the amount of damages to be recovered can be readily fixed by the royalty that the lessor was to receive."

In Daughetee v. Ohio Oil Co., 263 Ill. 518, 105 N. E. 308, 310, in which case the plaintiff sought to recover damages for the breach of a covenant requiring the lessee to drill additional wells after the first one had proved the territory, the opinion reads in part as follows: "Plaintiff in error contends that, even if a right of action exists, no recovery can be had because the damages are uncertain, remote, and speculative. This point is preserved by an exception to the refusal of the trial court to hold as law a proposition embodying plaintiff in error's view upon this point. It is undoubtedly the law that, where speculation or conjecture must be resorted to for the purpose of determining whether the injury results from the wrongful act charged or from some other cause, then the law denies the injured party his action for damages. This is only another way of stating the familiar rule that damages must be the proximate result of the injury complained of. This rule was announced by this court in Indianapolis, Bloomington & Western Railway Co. v. Birney, 71 Ill. 391, which is relied on by plaintiff in error in support of this contention. The right of recovery being assumed, plaintiff in error cannot escape liability because the damages are difficult of exact ascertainment. The nature of the inquiry here is such that it is practically impossible to ascertain with mathematical certainty the exact amount of defendant in error's damages. This, however, affords no answer to a cause of action resulting from the breach of contract or a duty imposed by law. The unliquidated damages growing either out of breach of contract or the commission of a tort are seldom susceptible of exact measurement. If such exactness were required, the law of damages would be of little practical value. The rule is that, while the law will not permit witnesses to speculate or conjecture as to possible or probable damages, still the best evidence of which the subject will admit is receivable, and this is often nothing better than the opinion of well-informed persons upon the subject under investigation. Chamberlayne on Evidence, § 2332. Plaintiff in error does not contend that the court allowed improper and irrelevant evidence to be introduced in regard to the damages."

In Culbertson v. Iola Portland Cement Co., 87 Kan. 529, 125 P. 81, 83, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 610, we read: "Since the number of wells to be drilled on the land was not specified, there was an implied obligation on appellants to fully develop the land and put down as many wells as were necessary to secure to appellee his proportionate share of the pool of gas. Kleppner v. Lemon, 176 Pa. 502, 35 A. 109; Thornton on Oil and Gas, § 91. According to the findings, appellants failed to develop the land in such a way as to give appellee his proportionate share of the gas produced from the pool, and that to have done so would have required the sinking of at least another well. Having failed in this respect, the appellee is entitled to recover his share of the gas actually taken from his land, without regard to which side of the line the wells through which it was taken were sunk. The quantity so taken appears to have been fairly well established by the evidence. In Howerton v. Gas Co., 82 Kan. 367, 369, 108 P. 813, 814, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 46, it was said that: 'No reason is seen why witnesses of experience, acquainted with the gas field, may not testify with reasonable accuracy as to the number of wells which should have been drilled on the leased land, both for protection from drainage by neighboring leaseholds and to obtain the gas underneath the land.'"

And lastly I quote from Wheeland et al. v. Fredonia Gas Co., 92 Kan. 50, 139 P. 1010, as follows:

"This action was brought for failure to develop the land, a trial was had, and evidence was produced. Under these conditions, it was impossible for the appellees, there being no further development of the land, to prove the actual amount of damages they had suffered. The nature of the case is such that it is impossible to tell what a well will develop until it is sunk, and yet experts in oil territory are able to furnish reasonably accurate estimates of what a certain territory will produce, estimating from producing wells in the locality. This the appellants did in this case. The appellee demurred to their evidence, and the court sustained the demurrer. There was evidence tending to show that the one well was not sufficient development to protect the land from the gas being drawn from it by wells on adjacent lands. * * *

"The plaintiff in this action followed the procedure indicated by these decisions and offered the only evidence possible to establish a claim for damages, to wit, the opinions of experts. To say that the evidence in this case did not furnish a reasonable basis for estimating damages is to override the reasoning of all these cases. All the business of leasing lands for development is based upon the opinions of men engaged in the business as to the value of the tracts leased for that purpose, and it is competent evidence; although it is impossible thereby in a particular case to show the exact amount of damage which has been suffered, it is sufficient to enable a jury to estimate the damages and to find accordingly."

The judgment should be reversed.

104 Cal. App. 369

WISEMAN et al. v. SKLAR et al.★

Civ. 5770.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

March 6, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 1, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1930.

1. Assignments ⇨117—Original contractor for removal and alteration of building after illegal assignment thereof was entitled to recover amount due as being at all times responsible thereunder (Civ. Code § 1457).

Where contract for removal and alteration of building was illegally assigned without consent of owners, the original contractor was entitled to recover against owners for amount found to be due thereunder in view of fact that owners were not injured by reason of performance by another under assignment and original contractor, under Civ. Code, § 1457, was at all times responsible to owners under contract.

2. Assignments ⇨116—Neither contractor nor owners could complain of judgment against contractor in favor of assignee of contract performing it.

Where contract for removal and alteration of building was assigned without consent of owners and judgment thereafter recovered for amount due in favor of original contractor against owner, neither original contractor nor owners could complain of judgment in favor of assignee against original contractor in that owner had full protection from liability beyond single payment of judgment and original contractor was not out anything and thereby had no cause to complain.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1036(1)—Owners sued by assignee of contract for removal and alteration of building were not prejudiced by bringing in of original contractor as party plaintiff (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 389, 473, 578, 580).

Where contract for alteration and removal of building was assigned without owners' consent, the owners were not prejudiced by reason of action of court in subsequent action to recover by assignee in permitting original contractor to be brought in as a party plaintiff, in accordance with provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 389, 473, 578, 580, in view of fact that judgment rendered therein gave them full protection from liability beyond a single payment of judgment.

4. Pleading ⇨243—Court has power to allow amendment to complaint so it does not affect substantial rights of parties.

It is always in the power of the court to allow an amendment to a complaint, so it does not affect the substantial rights of parties, and, unless there is evidence of gross abuse of discretion in exercise of power, it is no ground for reversal of judgment.

5. Judgment ⇨235—Two or more persons joining as plaintiffs need not necessarily both recover.

Where two or more persons join as plaintiffs in an action at law, it is not the law that both must recover or none.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1036(1)—Defendant's objection to bringing in of additional party plaintiff will not, of itself, justify reversal.

When a judgment, if satisfied, will protect defendant from further suit, annoyance, or loss, and the action has afforded defendant opportunity to assert all defenses, causes of action on cross-complaint and counterclaims available to him, and time allowed for preparation for trial, defendant's objection to bringing in of additional party plaintiff, of itself, will not justify reversal.

CONREY, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by E. C. Wiseman and Sidney J. Kass against Joseph Sklar and another. From the judgment, plaintiff last named and defendants separately appeal.

Affirmed.

See, also, 274 P. 764.

Andreani & Haines, John L. Bisher, Jr., and Fred W. Morrison, all of Los Angeles, for appellants Sklar.

Edward Brody, of Los Angeles, for appellant Kass.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff Kass and the defendants Sklar appealed separately from the judgment of the superior court, but have presented their appeals under a combined transcript and on combined briefs. There is, therefore, no occasion for separate discussions of the appeals.

The defendants were the owners of an improved lot and a vacant lot in different sections of Los Angeles. They desired to have the building moved from the one lot to the other and there repaired, altered, and improved. They had had various dealings with plaintiff Sidney J. Kass, then engaged primarily in the real estate business, and had confidence in his integrity and ability. They asked said Kass to undertake the supervision of the proposed work. Intervening conversations, if any, are not shown by the evidence, but, on October 5, 1922, said Kass presented to defendants a form of agreement between defendants and plaintiff E. C. Wiseman. Defendants declined to execute such contract with Wiseman. Thereupon Wiseman's name was removed and the name Sidney J. Kass inserted, and the agreement was then signed by both defendants and by Sidney J. Kass. Immediately thereafter, and without the knowledge of defendants, said Kass assigned said agreement to Wiseman. Wiseman thereupon commenced the work and carried same to completion. During all of the work defendants thought that Wiseman was merely the foreman of Kass under the contract, and they did not know of the assignment until suit was commenced. The contract, after describing the properties, provides: "The party of the second part (Kass) agrees to furnish all necessary plans and details to complete this work; also to act as agent and generally superintend the work and purchase all materials and make all necessary contracts for labor, materials and other supplies pertaining to said construction. Best endeavors are to be used to make purchases at lowest possible price, discounts to be obtained where possible and allowed to parties of the first part. * * * The parties of the first part agree to pay all bills and make all payments and advance necessary funds upon certificates rendered by the party of the second part as the work progresses. All materials are to be contracted for in the names of the parties of the first part. In settlement for the above services and all other services rendered by the party of the second part, necessary and incident to the moving, alteration, construction and completion of said building improvement work, said parties of the first part agree to pay, and the party of the second part agrees to receive ten per cent. (10%) of the actual total net cost of all materials used and all labor performed in the construction and completion thereof; said ten per cent. (10%) commission to be paid as the work progresses, the first and fifteenth of each calendar month."

During the progress of the work defendants conferred from time to time with Kass; they paid $700 to Kass, who paid same to Wiseman; they paid Wiseman direct on bills presented $2,645, and they paid materialmen, etc., direct, the sum of $3,035.91, making a total expenditure by them of $6,380.91. There were left unpaid amounts aggregating $1,651.08.

Appellants in their opening brief state: "That during the progress of such removal operations, plaintiff Sidney J. Kass conducted himself as though he still retained the contract and that during the progress of the said work defendants frequently consulted said Kass relative to certain expenditures to be made to said Wiseman, whom the defendants believed to be an employee of said Sidney J. Kass."

Said Wiseman commenced this action as sole plaintiff; the trial judge decided that Kass was a necessary party to the full disposition of the matter and ordered Kass brought in either as a party plaintiff or defendant. He came in as a plaintiff with Wiseman and amended pleadings were filed accordingly. During the trial, and apparently by stipulation, the court appointed an expert, who inspected the work and reported to the court, and the court found that the work had been performed in a good, workmanlike manner and that the prices obtained were fair and reasonable. The court determined that the contract was not assignable, but that since the work had been done, and defendants had the benefit thereof, they should be required to pay therefor, hence the court gave judgment in favor of plaintiff Kass against both defendants for said $1,651.08, together with interest from the date of completion, making a total judgment of $2,113.38. The court then adjudged: "That plaintiff Sidney J. Kass holds such judgment in trust for his coplaintiff E. C. Wiseman and to that end the said Wiseman is entitled to a judgment against the said Sidney J. Kass for said sum of $2,113.38. That within ten days from notice of entry of this judgment the said Kass shall execute and deliver a good and sufficient assignment of his said judgment against the said Sklars, to said Wiseman, whereupon all claims of the said Wiseman against said Kass hereunder shall be satisfied and discharged. That if said Kass shall fail, refuse or neglect to execute said assignment within said period of ten days as herein ordered, the county clerk of Los Angeles county shall forthwith execute said assignment as the act of, and for the said Kass, with the same force and effect as if said Kass had executed the same, and forthwith deliver the same to said Wiseman, whereupon the said Wiseman shall be the owner of said judgment and all rights, benefits and privileges thereunder and all claims of said Wiseman against said Kass hereunder shall be satisfied and discharged."

The specifications of errors contained in the bill of exceptions have been combined into a lesser number in the points presented in appellants' opening brief, and we consider the points as stated in said brief to be the matters upon which appellants now rely. These points are: "(1) The evidence does not support the judgment in favor of plaintiff Sidney J. Kass against defendants or either of them; (2) The evidence does not support the judgment in favor of E. C. Wiseman and against plaintiff Sidney J. Kass or against defendants or either of them; (3) The court erred in permitting the amendment of the complaint making Sidney J. Kass a party plaintiff."

Upon point 1, appellants argue that because Sidney J. Kass assigned the agreement, together with all his right, title, and interest therein, to plaintiff E. C. Wiseman without the knowledge or consent of defendants or either of them, and further because said Kass testified "that he had no money due or owing to him from defendants or either of them, under or by virtue of the contract, or otherwise, for the reason that he had" assigned said contract, and, further, because Kass had agreed to render personal services and had not rendered any personal services or furnished any materials, under no circumstances could plaintiff Kass be entitled to a judgment against defendants or either of them. Appellants therefore conclude that the judgment in favor of Kass and against defendants is wholly unsupported by any evidence and is contrary to the findings of the court. Upon this subject, the court found "that at the time the said Kass assigned his interest in said contract to the plaintiff Wiseman, he, the said Kass, requested the said Wiseman to proceed with said work just the same as if he, the said Kass, were in charge thereof, and in truth and in fact all of said materials and labor and services were furnished and performed by the said Wiseman under his said assignment of said contract," also, "that the defendants Sklar have received the benefit of the goods, wares and merchandise, labor and services of the reasonable value of $8,031.30, ostensibly furnished by plaintiff Kass but in reality furnished by the plaintiff Wiseman."

These findings are supported by the evidence, but the real question is whether they (with the other findings of fact) will support the conclusion of law that Kass is entitled to a judgment against defendants.

"The burden of an obligation may be transferred with the consent of the party entitled to its benefit, but not otherwise, except. * * *" Civ. Code, § 1457.

"It is not meant by this section to imply that a third person cannot assume the obligations of a contract between other parties, but only that he cannot relieve a party therefrom his obligations without the consent of the creditor." Code commissioner's note (No. 10), under section 1457, Civ. Code, Kerr's 1920 Cyclopedic Codes of California.

The Supreme Court said in Anderson v. De Urioste, 96 Cal. 404, 407, 31 P. 266, 267, in reference to this note: "We think this the correct construction of the section, and it was in effect so held by this court in Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574, 25 P. 52, 10 L. R. A. 369, 21 Am. St. Rep. 63."

"The obligations of an assignor of a contract continue to rest upon him and he will be required to respond to the other party to the contract in the event of a default on the part of the assignee." 5 Cor. Jur. 977; Anderson v. De Urioste, supra; Brady v. Fowler, 45 Cal. App. 592, 595, 188 P. 320.

[1] It is therefore apparent that, irrespective of the legality or lack of legality of the assignment, plaintiff Kass was at all times responsible to defendants under the contract. If Kass was responsible to defendants, then it must necessarily follow that defendants were responsible to said Kass (or his assignee) under the contract. The court found, upon sufficient evidence, that the work was done in a good workmanlike manner and that the prices were fair and reasonable. It is therefore apparent that defendants have not been injured by the fact that performance was done by Wiseman under an assignment found by the court to be invalid for the reason that said contract was by law not assignable, rather than done by Wiseman as an employee of Kass, as supposed by defendants during the progress of the work.

Undoubtedly that part of the contract which called for the purchasing by Kass of materials in the name of defendants is not capable of assignment. But all accounts, if any, contracted by Wiseman in the name of defendants were inspected and paid by defendants prior to the commencement of this action. As to the materials and labor furnished and paid for directly by Wiseman, defendants made no objection to same not being directly in their names until in this action and, in fact, they paid on same all but above-stated balance. Since they have not been injured and have what they expected to get, they cannot now be heard to complain.

[2] We turn next to the second point raised by appellants, to wit, that the evidence does not support the judgment in favor of E. C. Wiseman and against plaintiff Sidney J. Kass or against defendants or either of them.

As regards the defendants, it will suffice to say they are not concerned with what happens to the judgment against them and in favor of Kass so long as they have full protection from liability beyond a single payment of said judgment. This protection they have under the judgment as rendered. Likewise, plaintiff Kass has no cause to complain. He has not been out anything, and cannot now be called upon for anything further under the contract.

[3] As to the third point, to wit, that the court erred in permitting the amendment of the complaint making Sidney J. Kass a party plaintiff, defendants argue that thereby and by the judgment they have been deprived of a complete defense which they had on the original complaint as against the plaintiff Wiseman, to wit, a lack of privity of contract.

"The court may determine any controversy between parties before it, when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must then order them to be brought in, and to that end may order amended and supplemental pleadings, * * * to be filed. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. § 389. "The court may in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, allow a party to amend any pleading or proceeding by adding or striking out the name of any party * * * The court may likewise, in its discretion, after notice to the adverse party, allow, upon such terms as may be just, an amendment to any pleading or proceeding in other particulars." Code Civ. Proc. § 473. "Judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants; and it may, when the justice of the case requires it, determine the ultimate rights of the parties on each side, as between themselves." Code Civ. Proc. § 578.

"The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint; but in any other case, the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." Code Civ. Proc. § 580.

[4,5] "It is always in the power of the Court to allow an amendment to a complaint, so it does not affect the substantial rights of the parties; and, except there is evidence of a gross abuse of discretion in the exercise of this power, it is no ground for the reversal of the judgment." Polk & Hensley v. Coffin & Swain, 9 Cal. 58; Curtis v. Nye & Nissen, 86 Cal. App. 507, 261 P. 747; Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., 198 Cal. 290, 244 P. 1077. Where two or more persons join as plaintiffs in an action at law, it is not the law that both must recover or none. Cullen v. Foster, 39 Cal. App. 625, 179 P. 695; Curtis v. Nye & Nissen, supra.

Appellants state in their reply brief: "The evidence fully discloses that Kass did not ask to be brought in as a party plaintiff, but was brought in over his objection by order of court." We cannot agree with this statement. The bill of exceptions shows that "plaintiff (Wiseman) upon the suggestion of the trial court, asked leave to amend the complaint by adding plaintiff Sidney J. Kass as a party plaintiff, to which defendants objected; thereupon the court ordered the complaint to be amended making Sidney J. Kass also a party plaintiff." Thereafter the amended complaint was filed. Defendants answered without demurrer and thereafter went to trial. The order re amendment was made March 4, 1927, and the trial was thereupon continued to and had on March 31, 1927. The findings of fact as made by the trial court contain the following recital: "The said Sklars further urge the defense that as Kass was the real contractor and was not a party to the action they could not offset any claim, which they claimed to have against him for failure to do the work properly and for excessive charges and other defenses. * * * "It therefore became apparent to the court that a complete determination of the controversy could not be had without the presence of said Kass as a party hereto, thereupon the said court ordered plaintiff Wiseman to immediately bring in the said Kass, either as a party defendant or a party plaintiff, and by amended or supplemental pleadings, in order that full and complete justice might be done between all the parties hereto." Said Kass did come in as a party plaintiff, he did not object to so doing, and his appearance was voluntary, i. e., without service of any process. Had he not have come in voluntarily, doubtlessly he would have been brought in as a party defendant, but the fact remains that he did come in voluntarily.

In the case of Martin v. Howe, 190 Cal. 187, 193, 211 P. 453, 456, the Supreme Court again declared, as said court had declared theretofore in Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal. 514, 99 Am. Dec. 423: "Legal and equitable relief are administered in the same forum, and according to the same general plan. A party cannot be sent out of court, merely because his facts do not entitle him to relief at law, or merely because he is not entitled to relief in equity, as the case may be. He can be sent out of court only when, upon his facts, he is entitled to no relief, either at law or in equity."

In the case of Taboada v. Sociedad Espanola, etc., 191 Cal. 187, 215 P. 673, 675, 27 A. L. R. 1508, the Supreme Court said: "It is clear that a right result was reached, and under the provisions of section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the requirements of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, no miscarriage of justice having resulted, the error, if any, of the trial court in overruling the demurrer, cannot be availed of to secure a reversal of the judgment. Atlas Development Co. v. National Surety Co., 190 Cal. 329, 212 P. 196. In Pleasant School Tp. v. Fultz, 79 Ind. App. 27, 137 N. E. 60, the court, applying a statute similar in effect to the provisions of the above-cited sections of the Code and Constitution, held that 'no objection taken by demurrer and overruled shall be sufficient to reverse the judgment if it appear from the whole record that the merits [of the cause] have been fairly tried and determined.'"

[6] When a judgment, if satisfied, will protect defendant from further suit, annoyance, or loss, and the action has afforded defendant the opportunity to assert in that action all the defenses, causes of action or cross-complaint and counterclaims available to him as against the cause of action, and time has been allowed for preparation for trial, defendant's objection to the bringing in of an additional party plaintiff, of itself, will not justify a reversal of that judgment.

We deem it unnecessary to determine here-in whether or not the coming in of Kass as a party plaintiff was in law an error, because we cannot see that defendants have in any manner been prejudiced thereby. No judgment shall be set aside for any error as to any matter of pleading or of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire case, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Const. We have made such examination and have found no miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed as to both appeals.

I concur: HOUSER, J.

CONREY, P. J. (dissenting).

I dissent. If it be true, as seems to be conceded, that Wiseman had no cause of action against the defendants, it must follow that the controversy between the plaintiff and the defendants would necessarily be determined completely by the judgment that would have been rendered. Kass had no interest, either legal or equitable, in the controversy between those parties. The defendants had a right to have that controversy ended by a decision on its merits, without the intervention of a new plaintiff who had no interest in the pending claim of the plaintiff against the defendants.

If Wiseman had any right of action against Kass, it was a right of action at law for money due on a contract of employment. He had no lien of any kind on the indebtedness of the defendants to Kass. From every point of view, the decision of the trial court is clearly against law.

PRITCHARD v. KING et al.
Civ. 7048.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 12, 1930.

Appeal and error ⇨78(3)—Until judgment in main case had been entered, defendant could not appeal from judgment dismissing cross-complaint (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1).

Defendant could not take appeal from judgment dismissing cross-complaint, as Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1, does not authorize an independent judgment on the amended cross-complaint, and record did not disclose that any judgment in main action had been entered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Complaint by Sadie E. Pritchard against Hazel Hubbard King and others. Hazel Hubbard King filed a cross-complaint, and, from judgment dismissing cross-complaint, defendant King appeals.

Appeal dismissed.

George Clark Sargent, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Aaron M. Sargent, of San Francisco, amicus curiae.

C. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, and Hamilton A. Bauer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff filed a complaint in which she alleged that F. G. King, deceased, at the time of his death, had in his possession certain properties purchased with partnership funds, and the plaintiff asked for a judgment ascertaining and defining her rights as surviving partner. The defendant filed an answer, and at the same time she filed a cross-complaint. To that cross-complaint the plaintiff demurred. The demurrer was sustained, and the defendant filed an amended cross-complaint. Later, the plaintiff served a motion to strike out the amended cross-complaint. After serving that notice, the plaintiff died, and Jennie M. Baxter was appointed administratrix, and she was substituted as plaintiff. Thereafter she presented the motion to strike. It was granted, and a purported "judgment upon cross-complaint" was entered. From that judgment the defendant has attempted to appeal, and has brought up a bill of exceptions. The record does not disclose that any judgment in the main action has been entered. We think we are not at liberty to pass on the appeal. The statute did not authorize an independent judgment on the amended cross-complaint. The purported judgment on the cross-complaint, as separate from the judgment in the main case, is not appealable.

BROWN v. BROWN et al.
Civ. 4029.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 13, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 12, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 12, 1930.

1. Money received ⇨6(6)—Plaintiff advancing money to investment company purchasing property could recover for money had and received on sale under trust deed in violation of agreement to one of company's sole owners.

Where plaintiff advanced money to investment company to enable school district to purchase land for school, and deed was executed by owner to company and trust deed executed by company to owner for balance of purchase price, and investment company agreed to protect title to property and advanced funds necessary to protect property from sale under trust deed, and district refused to purchase property which was sold under trust deed to one of sole owners of investment company, transaction in effect transferred title to investment company and its sole owner free from terms of trust deed, and, where company and owners denied any obligation to plaintiff on account of moneys advanced by her entering into real purchase price of premises, they immediately in law became charged with so much money in their hands, and action for money had and received would immediately lie.

2. Jury ⇨28(17)—Jury trial may be permitted after waiver thereof.

A trial court has discretion to permit a jury trial even after such trial has been waived.

3. Money received ⇨16—Plaintiff, advancing money to company to purchase property for school district, had only action against company breaching agreement, and was not required to join district.

Where plaintiff advanced money to investment company to purchase realty to be sold to school district and investment company, in violation of agreement, permitted property to be sold under trust deed securing balance of purchase price and to be transferred to one of its sole owners, only action plaintiff had to recover money advanced was for money had and received, and hence failure to bring school district and other parties into action was not error.

4. Appeal and error ⇨757(3)—Appellate court will not search record to determine if testimony supports verdict, where insufficiency is not pointed out and testimony is not printed (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Where appellants failed to comply with Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, relating to appeals by alternative method and requiring printing in briefs of portions of record desired to be called to attention of court, and less than 20 pages of testimony was printed in record, though reporter's transcript covered over 300 pages, appellate court will not search record and ascertain if testimony is sufficient to support verdict, especially when its insufficiency is not pointed out.

5. Appeal and error ⇨758(2)—Appellate court need not look for reasons why court rulings were incorrect, where none are assigned.

Where no reasons were assigned or set forth in brief why rulings of court were not correct, it is not incumbent on appellate court to look for reasons.

6. Appeal and error ⇨757(3)—Appellate court will not search record to determine if there is sufficient testimony to send cause to jury.

Where appellants did not print testimony in their brief or as appendix thereto, appellate court will not search record to ascertain if there is sufficient testimony to send cause to jury.

7. Money received ⇨18(3)—Plaintiff advancing money to defendants to purchase land for school district was not required to show defendants actually received money, but merely that defendants had benefit thereof to recover for money had and received.

In action for money had and received, based on advancements made by plaintiff to defendants to purchase land for school district, it was not necessary for plaintiff to show that defendants actually received money advanced by her, but proof that defendants had use and benefit thereof and were enjoying fruits of same, raised obligation to pay for value received.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by Florence Brown against Lora De Yoe Brown and another, as executors of the last will and testament of N. E. De Yoe, deceased, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant T. H. Kewin and others appeal.

Dennett & Zion, of Modesto, for appellants.
Gumpert & Mazzera and C. H. Hogan, all of Stockton, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendants T. H. Kewin, C. D. Swan, and Modesto Investment Company, a corporation, in an action for money had and received. From this judgment said defendants appeal.

The transcript shows that on or about the month of September, 1925, the members of the school board of the Modesto city school district decided to purchase a certain school site known as and called the "Dry Creek Site." The site in question was then owned by one De Yoe. At the time mentioned, the school board did not have the necessary funds with which to make the first payment on the property, and the board requested the plaintiff, with others, to advance to the board of education a sum sufficient to make such payment. In accordance with this request, the plaintiff advanced the sum of $5,000. The sum of $2,000 was advanced by one Walter Beard, and the sum of $3,000 by the appellants. These sums, aggregating $10,000, were used in making the first payment on the property on the 27th day of October, 1925. On that date De Yoe delivered to the Modesto Investment Company a grant, bargain, and sale deed conveying said property to the company, and on the same date the company executed and delivered to De Yoe a trust deed covering the property for the purpose of securing the payment of the remainder of the purchase price in the sum of $12,800. Thereupon the Modesto school district entered into an agreement with the Modesto Investment Company, under and by virtue of the terms of which the Modesto Investment Company agreed to sell to said school board and the school board agreed to buy the property. At the same time the Modesto Investment Company placed in escrow a deed conveying the property to the school district. On the 28th day of October, 1925, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, plaintiff signed a certain purported agreement between plaintiff and the Modesto Investment Company. This agreement is hereafter set forth. After the execution of all of the papers to which we have referred, a recall election was had, and three members of the board of the Modesto city school district were recalled. The members of the school board elected in place of the three recalled persons refused to complete the purchase of the property in question, and some time later it was sold by the trustees named in the deed of trust and the property purchased by the defendant T. H. Kewin. The record likewise shows that the appellant C. D. Swan objected to signing some of the papers, or rather objected to the money being turned over until the following paper was signed, which appears to have been executed some days after the plaintiff had advanced her $5,000. This agreement is in the words and figures following:

"Whereas, W. F. Beard has advanced the sum of Two Thousand Dollars, and Florence Brown has advanced the sum of Five Thousand Dollars, to the Modesto City School Board to be used in purchasing The Northwest quarter of the Southeast quarter of Section 28, Township 3 South and Range 9 East, Mount Diablo Base and Meridian, "And Whereas, said property is being conveyed to the Modesto Investment Company, a corporation, and said corporation is advancing the sum of Three Thousand Dollars, which together with the $7,000.00 above mentioned is being paid to N. E. De Yoe, as a part of the purchase price of the property above described, and said corporation is executing a Deed of Trust for the balance of said purchase price, amounting to Twelve Thousand Eight Hundred Dollars,

"And Whereas, the Modesto School District has agreed to purchase said property for the sum of Twenty Two Thousand Eight Hundred Dollars, and pay the purchase price in the manner provided for in an agreement between said Modesto Investment Company, and said Modesto School District, dated the ——— day of October, 1925,

"And Whereas, said Modesto Investment Company is taking over said property for the purpose of accommodating said school district only, it is the understanding of said Modesto Investment Company that it is to be repaid in full for all moneys expended in connection with the purchase and sale of said property, together with interest thereon at the rate of Seven per cent per annum.

"Now therefore, it is agreed that said W. F. Beard and Florence Brown are to receive the money which they have advanced, above mentioned, only when paid to them by the Modesto School District, and in case said School District for any reason should not take said property, and they should not receive their pay from funds of the said School District, then in that event, they agree that said Modesto Investment Company shall sell the above described land, and that from said sale, said Modesto Investment Company shall receive all of the money which it has been out in said transaction, together with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent per annum, and said W. F. Beard and Florence Brown shall be entitled to any money remaining of the sale or disposition of said land, and they will not look to said Modesto Investment Company for said money or any portion thereof except as above provided.

There is some dispute in the testimony as to the date when this instrument was signed; the plaintiff testifying that it had been signed by all the other parties whose names are attached thereto, preceding her own signature, and that she signed the paper on the 28th day of October, 1925.

The record shows that the Modesto Investment Company had on the 15th day of October, 1925, passed a resolution authorizing the purchase of the De Yoe property, or rather to take the title to the property for the purpose of transferring the same to the Modesto school district according to the terms of the various instruments executed by the parties in relation thereto. At the time of the transactions being considered, it appears that the following instrument was also executed, being based in part upon the advancement of money by the plaintiff herein in the sum of $5,000. This agreement is in the words and figures following:

"Whereas, the Modesto Investment Company has acquired or is about to acquire the title to the real property hereinafter described, subject to a deed of trust for the sum of $12,800.00, executed or to be executed by said Modesto Investment Company to N. E. De Yoe, from whom said real property has been or is about to be acquired; and

"Whereas, the Modesto City School District is desirous of acquiring said real property for purpose of a school site, and has by majority vote of the Modesto City Board of Education, its governing body, authorized the purchase of said real property and authorized J. W. Guyler and Walter M. Johnson to negotiate said purchase; and

"Whereas, the said Modesto City School District has no funds available with which to pay for said property; and

"Whereas, the following persons have agreed to advance the money necessary for the first payment in the following amounts, to-wit:

"W. F. Beard, $2,000.00

"T. H. Kewin and C. D. Swan, $3,000.00

"Florence Brown, $5,000.00

"Now therefore, it is agreed that if the said persons shall advance and pay to the said Modesto Investment Company the sums hereinbefore mentioned, aggregating $10,000.00, the Modesto Investment Company agrees to make, execute and deliver to said Modesto City School District, or to such of its component school districts as the Modesto City Board of Education may designate, a grant, bargain and sale deed in usual form conveying said real property to said School District, subject to said Deed of Trust for $12,800.00, in favor of said N. E. De Yoe, and subject to taxes now a lien thereon, and subject to the easements and rights of way mentioned in Preliminary Report No. 1889 of the Sunny Valley Land & Title Company, to which reference is hereby made, but free from all claims of Sue Chung Gow, and free from all other claims, liens, easements, and encumbrances, restrictions, reservations, and rights of way.

"And the said Modesto Investment Company further agrees that until such time as the said Modesto City School District can raise the necessary funds by taxation, bond issue, or otherwise, with which to make, and can actually take the payments hereinafter provided for, such period, however, not to exceed one year from this date, said Modesto Investment Company will pay all interest and other charges accruing under or payable by the terms of the Deed of Trust hereinbefore mentioned and save and protect said property from sale under said deed of trust, and otherwise save and protect said property so that upon making the said payments hereinafter provided for, the said Modesto City School District shall receive said property, after payment by it of said deed of trust, free and clear of all liens, charges, encumbrances, restrictions and reservations excepting only taxes and the reservations for rights of way mentioned in said Preliminary Report No. 1889.

"And upon the funds therefor becoming available, the undersigned members of the Modesto City Board of Education agree that they will take whatever action may be necessary to ratify or confirm this agreement or make the same a valid and binding obligation upon said district to purchase said real property, and will repay said W. F. Beard, T. H. Kewin, C. D. Swan and Florence Brown, the sums advanced by them as hereinbefore stated, including such legal and customary charges as are unavoidable, until maturity of above agreement.

"Dated this 28 day of October, 1925.

"C. D. Swan, Secty.

"[Seal.] Modesto City Board of Education

"J. W. Guyler, Prest.

"E. D. Abbott, Secty."

It will be noticed that, while the plaintiff's name is not signed as a party to this instrument, the instrument is executed for the benefit of, and for the purpose of protecting, the interest of all of the parties advancing money to aid in the purchase of the school site. By this instrument the Modesto Investment Company agrees to protect the title to the property, to advance the funds necessary, pay the interest, and to protect the property from sale under the trust deed. The instrument does state that it is limited for the period of one year, but time is not made of the essence of this contract.

We may also state here that the record shows that the appellants Kewin and Swan were practically the sole owners of the Modesto Investment Company. Stock standing in the name of others was only sufficient in number of shares to qualify such persons to act as directors. While there is considerable difference in the dates of the respective instruments set out in the transcript, thus, the deed conveying the property from De Yoe to the Modesto Investment Company is dated the 6th day of October, 1925, and the deed of trust from the investment company back to De Yoe bearing date of the same day, and other instruments are dated on different days during the month of October, 1925, the record sufficiently shows that all of the instruments were really a part of one transaction.

No effort appears to have been made by the Modesto Investment Company or by the appellants Kewin and Swan to sell the property, and, contrary to the terms of the last instrument we have set forth, the appellants permitted the property to be sold by the trustees named in the trust deed, and to be purchased by, or at least in the name of, the appellant T. H. Kewin. The purchase price, including costs, accumulated interest, etc., amounted to the sum of about $13,000. Since the purchase of the property, as herein stated, it does not appear that the appellants have made any effort to dispose of the same.

[1] On the part of the appellants, it is insisted that, as the property was sold for a less sum than sufficient to pay the plaintiff, the appellants are relieved from any further obligation. This contention, however, is untenable. The property was not sold pursuant to the agreement first herein set forth, nor was the title to the property protected for the benefit of the parties interested therein, pursuant to the second agreement hereinbefore set forth. All that the transaction legally amounted to was the transmitting of the title to the appellants in the name of T. H. Kewin, freed from the terms of the trust deed, and, as the appellants have denied any obligations to the plaintiff for and on account of the moneys advanced by her, entering into the real purchase price of the premises, they immediately, in law, became charged with so much money in their hands, and an action for money had and received would immediately lie. Fontaine v. Lacassie, 36 Cal. App. 175, 171 P. 812; Firpo v. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., 80 Cal. App. 122, 251 P. 657; Hillwig v. Boyer, 81 Cal. App. 763, 254 P. 662; Irvine v. MacGregor, 203 Cal. 583, 265 P. 218.

On the part of the respondent, it is urged that, as her money had already been advanced prior to the signing of the first agreement set forth in this opinion, the agreement is without consideration, and therefore void. But whether the instrument is based upon a valid consideration, or whether it is not, the transaction, as it appears in the record, leads to the conclusion which we have stated, that the appellants are chargeable as for so much money had and received, and therefore we need not follow the argument either of the respondent or of the appellants as to the validity of the first agreement.

With this preliminary statement we may next consider the alleged errors upon which the appellants base their claim that the judgment "must be reversed."

[2, 3] It is first claimed that the court erred in permitting the jury trial, and in this behalf it is insisted that the demand for a jury trial was made too late. This alleged error, however, need not be further considered, because it is well settled that a trial court has discretion to permit a jury trial, even after such a trial has been waived. Nor does there appear any error in the fact that the Modesto school district and other parties named were not brought in and made defendants; that the only action the plaintiff had in this case was one for money had and received against the appellants.

[4] The appellants in this case have not complied with the provisions of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to appeals by the alternative method, in which section it is required that, "in filing briefs in said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." Omitting the answer of the appellants, less than twenty pages of the testimony in this case are printed as required by the section, although the reporter's transcript covers over three hundred pages. Under such circumstances the law is well settled that an appellate court will not search the record and ascertain if the testimony is sufficient to support the verdict, and especially is this true when its insufficiency is not pointed out. 2 Cal. Jür. p. 727, and the cases cited on page 133 of the 1928 supplement.

[5, 6] The appellants, following their objections which we have noted, set forth some thirty-odd exceptions upon which they base their claim for reversal on account of errors committed by the trial court in the admission of testimony, denial of their motion for a nonsuit, and also for a verdict in favor of the appellants, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury. No reasons are assigned in appellants' brief as to why a single ruling of the court in relation to the admission of testimony is erroneous, save as to exception appearing as No. 14. One example stands for all:

"Q. I will ask you, Mr. Guyler, if there has been called any election of the Modesto School District for the purpose of authorizing the Board of Trustees to purchase the school lot or site, prior to the execution of this instrument in duplicate which I have shown you?

"Mr. Zion: Object as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial; not the issues of this case."

The court overruled the objection—exception 5. No reasons are assigned why the ruling of the court was erroneous, and the same appears down the line until we reach exception No. 14. Here the objection made is to the whole line of testimony based upon the theory of the first cause of action set out in plaintiff's complaint, to wit, an action for money had and received. No reasons being assigned or set forth in the brief why the rulings of the court were not correct, it is not incumbent upon an appellate court to look for reasons. The motion for nonsuit of course is based upon all the testimony in the record. Here again appellants have not printed the testimony in their brief or as an appendix thereto, and under such circumstances an appellate court will not search the record to ascertain if there is sufficient testimony to send the cause to the jury. The same is true as to the motion for a directed verdict. However, we may state that what we have set forth herein shows very clearly that the appellants have had and hold the benefit of the moneys advanced by the plaintiff, and, under the cases which we have cited, are under obligations to return the same.

[7] Finally, it is urged that the court erred in its instructions given to the jury. Here again the instructions to the jury are not printed in the appendix to appellants' brief. However, we have read the instructions, and it appears therefrom that the jury was fully and correctly instructed. It would serve no useful purpose to analyze the various instructions and point out that the alleged errors are not sufficient to warrant reversal. We may further add that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to show that the appellants actually received the $5,000 advanced by her. All that was necessary was to show that the appellants had had the uses and benefits thereof and were enjoying the fruits of the same. This raises the obligation to pay for the value received. No question appears to be raised in the briefs that the school site was not reasonably worth the sum paid to De Yoe by the parties concerned herein.

No appeal lies from the order denying a new trial, and hence need not be considered.

The judgment is affirmed.

FALL RIVER JOINT UNION HIGH SCHOOL
DIST. v. SHASTA UNION HIGH SCHOOL
DIST.★

Civ. 3871.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 11, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 10, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 8, 1930.

Schools and school districts ⚡110—Taxes collected by school district from lands not legally within exterior boundaries were not recoverable by district in which lands actually were (Pol. Code, §§ 1756, 1757).

Money received by school district from lands apparently but not legally within its exterior boundaries by virtue of taxes levied and collected for its uses and purposes and devoted for such purposes were not recoverable by district within whose territory the lands actually were, where no levy had been made or taxes collected for its uses and purposes, and where both districts involved obtained exactly the amount of money for which their budget called in accordance with Pol. Code, §§ 1756, 1757, and neither district obtained or had the use of moneys intended for the other.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; James W. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by the Fall River Joint Union High School District against the Shasta Union High School District. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

W. D. Tillotson, of Redding, for appellant.
Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, and Annette Abbott Adams, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendant in the sum of $8,293.84, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. from the date of entry of judgment, in an action for money had and received by the defendant for the uses and purposes of the plaintiff, based upon allegations that the defendant had collected and had the use and benefit of certain moneys raised by taxation which should have been had, obtained, and enjoyed by the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

After alleging the existence of the two high school districts named in the title to this action, the complaint sets forth that on the 4th day of February, 1925, a certain school district, known as the "Bunker Hill School District," formed under the laws of the state, was situate entirely within the exterior boundaries of the Fall River joint union high school district in the county of Shasta; that on the same date that certain school district, known as "Kosh Creek School District," was an elementary school district situate entirely within the boundaries of the Shasta union high school district in the county of Shasta; that the boundary line between the two elementary school districts constituted the boundary line between the two high school districts; that on the 4th day of February, 1925, the board of supervisors of the county of Shasta made an order purporting to transfer to the Kosh Creek school district certain lands and premises theretofore situate within the Bunker Hill school district. This order, if effective, would have transferred from the Fall River union high school district to the Shasta union high school district the lands and premises described in the plaintiff's complaint.

It is further alleged in the complaint that in making the order of transfer, dated February 4, 1925, the board of supervisors did not comply with the requirements of the Political Code, and that thereafter, and in the month of November, 1928, after an action had been prosecuted in the superior court of Shasta county for that purpose, a judgment was entered declaring the purported transfer of property from the Bunker Hill elementary school district to the Kosh Creek elementary school district null and void. The complaint then sets forth that during the years intervening between the purported transfer of the lands described in the complaint and the entry of judgment adjudging the transfer null and void, Shasta union high school district collected in taxes on the property involved in the transfer the following sums, to wit: For the year 1925, $3,834.57; for the year 1926, the sum of $1,151.87; for the year 1927, the sum of $3,019.50; for the year 1928, the sum of $207.90; aggregating a total of $8,293.84. The complaint contains no allegations that the plaintiff did not receive, during said years, all of the money necessary to maintain its union high school district, nor is there any allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff did not receive, during said period of time, all of the moneys that had been collected for the uses and purposes of the Fall River joint union high school district; nor is there any allegation in the complaint that the Shasta union high school district received any moneys that were not necessary for the support of its high school; nor is there any allegation in the complaint that the Shasta union high school district received any money not intended for its uses and purposes; nor that any taxes were levied upon the property involved in the transfer that were not intended for the uses and purposes of the Shasta union high school district.

The appellant demurred to the plaintiff's complaint on several grounds, one of which was that it did not state a cause of action. The demurrer being overruled, the appellant declined to amend, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount sued for.

The respondent, in support of the judgment in its favor, makes the following contention: "That there is but one question involved in this appeal, and that is whether an action for money had and received will lie to recover from a High School District moneys which it has received from taxes for High School purposes, assessed and collected upon lands wholly outside of its boundaries, and wholly within the boundaries of plaintiff district." This, however, is not a full or complete statement of the issues involved. The question really at issue is whether money received by one district, from lands apparently but not legally within its exterior boundaries, levied and collected for its uses and purposes and devoted to its uses and purposes, can be recovered by a district within whose territory the lands actually lie, where no levy has been made or taxes collected for its uses and purposes, and where both districts involved obtained exactly the amount of moneys for which their budget called, and neither district obtained or had the use of money intended for the other.

During the time involved in this action, sections 1756 and 1757 of the Political Code specified that the school board of every high school district should file with the board of supervisors annually, at the time specified in the section, an estimate of the amount of money required for maintaining the high school district for the current school year. Section 1756, supra, sets forth how the items shall be stated on the estimate, and the procedure that shall be taken preceding the actual levy of the taxes, and that, after the estimate has been properly passed upon by the county school superintendent, the board of supervisors shall proceed to levy a tax upon the property in each school district sufficient to raise the amount of the estimate determined as necessary for the maintenance of the school for the current year. Section 1757, supra, provides for the levy of a special tax. All of the moneys to be raised by taxation are paid to the county treasurer, and by him allotted to the respective school districts for which the tax has been levied and the moneys collected.

Before beginning a review of the authorities relied upon by the respondent, we may state that the complaint fails to show that the plaintiff suffered any deficit in its school funds, or that the defendant obtained any surplus in its school funds by reason of the levy and collection of taxes upon the properties mentioned in the complaint. The contention in this case appears to be based upon the theory that each high school district has an inherent right to all moneys collected by way of taxation upon lands lying within the exterior boundaries of its district, whether or not the levy and collection of such moneys was intended for, or had for its uses and purposes, and whether it did or did not receive all the money set forth as necessary in its estimate, and irrespective of whether there was or was not a deficit in its funds, and whether there was or was not a surplus in the funds of the district for which the tax was levied and collected.

This is not a case where taxes were levied and collected for one district, and, by mistake, turned over or paid to another district. So far as the complaint is concerned, each district in this action had and enjoyed all the money necessary for its uses and purposes, and no money was paid by mistake to the appellant, derived from taxes levied and collected for the uses and purposes of the plaintiff, as no such taxes were levied or collected.

With these statements in view, we will now consider the cases cited as supporting the ruling of the trial court. In the case of Independent School District of Town of Kelley v. School Township of Washington, 162 Iowa, 42, 143 N. W. 837, 840, it was held that, where the county treasurer, by mistake, paid school taxes levied upon property in one district for school purposes and for the contingent and teachers' funds, to an adjoining district, the district in which the land was located could recover the sum so paid by an action for money had and received. An examination of this case shows that a tax was levied and the money collected for the uses and purposes of the plaintiff, and, by mistake of the treasurer, credited to the defendant district. In the opinion of that case we find the following: "We think the language used in the case of District Township of Spencer v. District Township of Riverton, 56 Iowa, 88, 8 N. W. 785, is apropos to the discussion here. This was an action by the plaintiff district to recover of the defendant district certain moneys which it was claimed had been paid by the treasurer of the county from moneys belonging to the plaintiff, by reason of which defendant district received or would receive more than it was entitled to. * * * 'We come, then, to inquire whether, as the treasurer made a mistake, the plaintiff has any equitable claim upon the defendants. In our opinion it has. The treasurer was charged by law with the duty of refunding a portion of the tax from the funds belonging to the defendants. By a mistake respecting his duty he refunded the whole from funds belonging to the plaintiff. By reason of that mistake the defendants have received, or will receive, from the treasurer more funds than they were entitled to. A court of equity, it appears to us, has the power to rectify the mistake and properly adjust the burden by compelling a contribution.'" Nothing of that kind appears in this case. The funds belonging to the respondent have not been depleted, and the funds belonging to the appellant have not been augmented to any degree, or the estimates submitted by the respective districts to the board of supervisors as to the funds necessary to maintain their schools in any wise departed from. An examination of the case of District Township of Spencer v. District Township of Riverton et al., 56 Iowa, 85, 8 N. W. 785, shows that it is based upon an error of the treasurer in paying to one school district funds derived from a tax levy made for the uses and purposes of another district.

In Independent School District No. 5 v. Solon Independent School District No. 8, 162 Iowa, 686, 144 N. W. 592, the question involved was whether sums paid by one district to another, for and on account of the tuition of pupils supposed, at the time of payment, to be residing in the defendant district, but who were afterwards found to be actually residing within the plaintiff district, could be recovered. It was so adjudged. Here, the money was paid under mistake, and the defendant district had the uses and benefits of tuition fees that should have remained in the treasury of the plaintiff. In other words, the funds of one district were improperly augmented at the expense of the other district, and equity, of course, necessarily required a refund.

In the case of Board of Trustees of Graded Free Colored Common School of Mayfield v. Board of Trustees of Graded White Common School of Mayfield, 181 Ky. 303, 204 S. W. 86, the only question involved was one of a division of school moneys between schools maintained for white and colored pupils, based upon statutes relating to the same and not applicable to any issues involved herein.

In the case of School District No. 9, Town of Lake, v. School District No. 5, Town of Lake, 118 Wis. 233, 95 N. W. 148, the questions involved related to a division of tax moneys, where the districts had been divided after the levy of the tax. This statement, of course, shows it is inapplicable to the issues here presented.

In Center School Township et al. v. State ex rel. Board of School Commissioners, 150 Ind. 168, 49 N. E. 961, the questions involved had to do with the distribution of moneys received from a certain dog tax. The facts show that one district received a surplus portion which should have been distributed to a different district. It was really an action to require a division of funds, and not an action to recover funds which had been provided for the support of a defendant district.

In Jefferson School Township of Greene County v. School Town of Worthington, 5 Ind. App. 586, 32 N. E. 807, it is held that a proper remedy for a school town to recover taxes appropriated to it, but paid by the county treasurer to the trustees of a school township, and converted by such township, is by action against the township, and not by mandamus either against the county treasurer or trustee. With this statement of the law we readily agree, but the facts involved are clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. In the case at bar, as we have heretofore stated, the taxes were levied and the moneys collected for the uses and purposes of the appellant, and were not levied and collected for the uses of the respondent, and improperly apportioned. A few excerpts from the case of the Board of Commissioners of Carter County v. Joint School District No. 34, etc., 134 Okl. 140, 272 P. 468, 469, show that the facts considered therein are readily distinguishable from the circumstances presented in the case at bar. In the opinion of the case just referred to we find the following: "The proper remedy for a school town to recover taxes apportioned to it, but paid by the county treasurer to the trustee of a school township, and converted by such township, is by action against the township, and not by mandamus against either the county treasurer or trustee." (Italics are ours.) The word which we have italicized discloses the fact that the moneys collected had been apportioned to one district and erroneously paid to another. This, of course, would leave a deficit in the funds of one district and create a surplus in the other. The opinion further quotes from 37 Cyc. 1592, the familiar rule that "a city or other municipality may maintain an action at law against the county which has collected taxes for it and failed to pay them over." This in no wise supports the respondent's contention. The cases seem to be uniform that, where an officer collects taxes belonging to a district or city, and pays the same to the wrong district or to the wrong municipality, the amounts so wrongly apportioned or paid over may be recovered. Thus, in the instant case, if the taxes had been assessed and collected for the purposes of the respondent district, and erroneously paid over to the officers of the appellant district, an action would lie by the respondent district to recover such funds from the appellant district. The record would show upon its face a surplus in favor of the appellant and a deficiency of funds on the part of the respondent.

Finally, respondent urges upon our attention the cases of School District No. 127 v. School District No. 45 of Reno County, 80 Kan. 641, 103 P. 126, and the case of School District No. 8, Shawnee Township, v. Board of Education of Kansas City, 115 Kan. 806, 224 P. 892. The latter case is based in part upon the decision in the former case and upon a statute bearing upon the correction of errors in the apportionment of school funds to which we will refer. There is also a distinct difference between the opinion in the Reno County Case and in the facts involved in the Shawnee Township Case, which apparently was overlooked by the court in the latter case.

In the case of School District No. 127 v. School District No. 45, supra, it appears that both districts had levied a tax upon a disputed territory claimed to be within the exterior boundaries of each district. One had levied an assessment at the rate of 13 mills, and the other at the rate of 25 mills on the dollar. District No. 127 collected the sum of $321.13. The court determined that the strip of land involved lay within the exterior boundaries of district No. 45, and held that district No. 127 should refund the sum of $321.13 collected by it. The record in that case also shows that all the parties had full knowledge of the circumstances, which, of course, included the fact that district No. 127 had full knowledge that it was levying a tax upon land outside of its district. The record also shows that the county treasurer had knowledge of the circumstances involved, and that he had no right to pay the money over to the wrong district. Here, district No. 45 had made an estimate of the moneys necessary to maintain its educational facilities, had levied a tax upon the property within its territorial boundaries, and was entitled to the amount of revenue to be derived from taxation upon the territory in question, and, unless it received the same, while it does not appear to be mentioned in the opinion, there would necessarily have been a deficit in its funds. District No. 45 was suing for something of which it had been deprived. In the case at bar such fact does not appear.

In the case of School District No. 8, Shawnee Township, v. Board of Education of Kansas City, supra, the facts show that the taxes were levied on property in one district for the purposes of that district, and through mistake paid to the officers of another district. In the decision of this case we find that the court refers to the revised statutes of the state of Kansas, quoting a section which is too lengthy to be inserted here, but which statute provides that the county clerk, previous to a certain date of each year therein mentioned, is empowered to correct errors in the apportionment of taxes and in fixing the situs of both personal and real estate, and also providing for the refunding of money, if errors are discovered and claims made for refund, or a transfer from one district to another, or, rather, to the proper district or municipality, of the funds to which it is entitled.

In addition to setting forth the statute relative to the correction of errors, the court also relies upon the case of School District No. 127 v. School District No. 45, supra, mentioning the fact of the property being detached from one district and attached to another, and fails to point out the difference between the facts of that case and the circumstances involved in the Shawnee Township Case, to wit, that in the case of District No. 127 v. School District No. 45, supra, the taxes were levied by and for the uses and purposes of the district claiming the same, and that in the Shawnee Township Case taxes levied for one district were collected and improperly paid over to another district. Neither of these cases involve the question of whether money, where taxes have been levied and collected for the uses and purposes of a particular district, after the same have been devoted to the uses and purposes of the district for which they are collected, should be paid over to an adjoining district because the orders of the board of supervisors in making a transfer of territory from one district to the other, was subsequently adjudged void.

Respondent quotes at length from the opinion in the Shawnee Township Case, but, after an examination of the facts involved in the case, and also of the case of School District No. 127 v. School District No. 45 relied upon, it will be found that the quotation is the language and not the law of the case, and, so far as the language is concerned, its reasoning is very clearly answered by the dissenting opinion, which, however, we do not quote as authority, but as illustrating what we have said as to misapprehension of the facts involved in the two cases cited to us as authority.

We will next consider the authorities upon which appellant relies. In 35 Cyc. 1037, the rule of law which appeals to us as being the proper one applicable to this case is thus stated: "One school district may recover from another district taxes which have been levied by the former and unlawfully collected by the latter; but a school district does not become a trustee for one taxpayer of an excessive amount collected from another taxpayer, and one school district cannot recover from another district taxes which, through a mistake as to location, have been levied by, and voluntarily paid to the latter upon lands within the former district, although the tax rate, as extended in the former district, is thereby made greater than it otherwise would have been. But the fact that one school district unlawfully levies and collects taxes on land in another school district, does not prevent the latter from levying and collecting taxes on the same land." The latter statement applies to what was really involved in School District No. 127 v. School District No. 45, supra.

In 27 Ruling Case Law, 591, we find the following: "Where one school district collects by mistake, taxes on land lying in another district, the latter, if it can recover from the former at all, cannot recover more than the amount it would have received had there been no mistake. So, where the rate of taxation in the former district is greater than the rate in the latter, the excess collected cannot be recovered by the latter district, nor can it recover at all if the full amount of the levy made by it on the lands in question has been received." It is then stated that the taxpayer cannot collect where the taxes have been voluntarily paid.

In the case of School City of Terre Haute v. Harrison School Township, 184 Ind. 742, 112 N. E. 514, the Supreme Court of Indiana held that, "where the auditor of a county, in distributing the county's share of the tuition revenue of the state arising from the income on the common school fund, fails to take into consideration certain matters, as required by Burns' Ann. St. 1914, § 6475, so that the trustees of some of the school corporations thereof receive more than their proportion, there is no liability on the part of such corporations, after expenditure of the fund, to the school corporations thereof which received less than their proper proportions." That case is similar to the conditions here prevailing, in that, while not so alleged in the complaint, it is evident that the school funds involved have all been consumed and used by the appellant district for the purposes for which the tax was levied and collected.

In Arthur et al. v. School District of Polk Borough, 164 Pa. 410, 30 A. 299, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that no recovery could be had where one school district unlawfully levies and collects taxes on lands lying in another district. We may state, however, in that case it is also held that the second district might have levied and collected taxes. The point really involved, so far as the instant case is concerned, is that moneys derived from taxes levied upon lands, though not within its district, for the uses and purposes of the district levying the tax, may be contested by the landowner or taxpayer, but cannot be recovered by the district wherein the lands are situate, after the same have been collected and used for the purposes of the collecting district.

In the case of Walser v. Board of Education of School District No. 1, 160 Ill. 272, 43 N. E. 346, 31 L. R. A. 329, we have a case on all fours with the questions presented upon this appeal. It was there held that, "Where, by the mistake of the county clerk, real estate in fact located in school district No. 2 was entered upon the collector's book, for a certain year, as in school district No. 1, * * * and the property was taxed and the taxes were voluntarily paid to No. 1, and there applied, No. 2 cannot recover the amount thus collected." To the same effect is the decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio in the case of Board of Education of Lyme Township v. Board of Education of Special School District No. 1, 44 Ohio, 278, 7 N. E. 12.

In Mabelvale Special School District v. Halstead Special School District, 169 Ark. 645, 276 S. W. 584, the Supreme Court of Arkansas held as follows: "Special school district, in suit to recover taxes on disputed lands, held not entitled to recover taxes which had been regularly though erroneously distributed to other school district and consumed in educational purposes, but to be entitled only to taxes in hands of treasurer at time suit was commenced," etc.

In Carter Special School District v. Hollis Special School District, 173 Ark. 781, 293 S. W. 722, it was again held by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, in the opinion rendered in 1927, that a school district rightfully entitled thereto could not recover school funds erroneously distributed to, and consumed in educational purposes by, the district to which the funds had been apportioned.

In the case of School Directors of District No. 153 v. School Directors of District No. 154, 232 Ill. 322, 83 N. E. 849, the Supreme Court held, upon facts identical with those here presented, that, "where property has been assessed for school taxes in one district and the taxes collected by that district, an adjoining district cannot recover the taxes from the first district on the ground that, by a mistake * * * in making a map of the school districts of the county, the property was taxed by the wrong district."

Somewhat to the same effect is the case of State ex rel. School Dist. v. Beale, 90 Mo. App. 341, where it was held that the judgment could only apply to taxes thereafter levied and collected, and that no refund of moneys already collected and used for school purposes could be had.

If it be a fact, as contended by the respondent, that the taxpayers in the respondent district paid somewhat in excess of the moneys they should have paid, if the true situs of the territory involved had been known and assessed accordingly, the effective answer thereto is that, so far as the record before us shows, all of the taxes were voluntarily paid, and the parties paying the taxes are not before us.

The appellant makes the further point that, as each district has received the funds according to the estimate submitted by it, and that the contested funds have been used for educational purposes, the finances of the district ought not to be disturbed by any judgment ordering a refund, and that to do so would be inequitable, as all the parties herein acted in good faith. From what we have said, however, it is apparent that the judgment of the trial court must be reversed, and therefore we need not consider the question of a disarrangement of the funds of the respective districts. We agree with the appellant that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and, in view of what we have said, it is evident that no cause of action can be stated.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the trial court is reversed, with directions to sustain the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint, without leave to amend.

BISHOP v. JORDAN.★

Civ. 205.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

March 4, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 31, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 28, 1930.

1. Waters and water courses ☞231—Tax sale for unpaid assessment levied to pay irrigation district bonds was illegal, bonds being issued at time when land was owned by federal government.

Plaintiff after filing application to homestead certain land involved in this action to quiet title went into possession in 1888 of land which was then public domain of United States. Organization of irrigation district, which included plaintiff's land, was thereafter effected under Wright Act (St. 1887, p. 29). In 1889, bond issue of district was confirmed by court decree, and five years later plaintiff received his patent from United States. In 1918, assessment was levied on plaintiff's land for purpose of making payments on outstanding bonds, and land was sold at tax sale, under which defendant claimed title. Held tax sale was illegal, since land was property of federal government at time bonds were issued, and hence not subject to any local tax or assessment, in view of act admitting California into Union (1 Hittell's Gen. Laws, § 242).

2. Public lands ☞35(5)—Entry under homestead act gives merely right of possession which will ripen into title upon performance of statutory conditions (Homestead Act [43 USCA § 164]).

Under Homestead Act (43 USCA § 164), right of possession which entryman acquires by virtue of entry is merely inchoate, but may be perfected into title by continued occupation and improvement of land.

3. Waters and water courses ☞231—Homesteader on federal land agreeing to pay local assessment assumed no liability, since assessments on such land would be illegal.

Where person occupying federal land, under Homestead Act (43 USCA § 164), signed instrument purporting to obligate him to comply with local irrigation laws and to pay taxes or assessments levied thereunder, he assumed no legal liability to pay tax, nor did he thereby give his consent to inclusion of property within irrigation district for taxation purposes, since land owned by United States government is not subject to state taxation.

4. Waters and water courses ☞231—By agreeing to assume liability imposed by irrigation laws, homesteader on federal land did not waive right to assert that assessments on such land were illegal.

Where homesteader on federal land signed instrument which purported to obligate him to pay assessments for irrigation district, he did not thereby waive his right to object to inclusion of land within district, in view of agreement that he assumed no greater liability thereby than was imposed by irrigation laws, since such laws could not be construed to impose assessments upon land of United States.

5. Waters and water courses ☞231—By agreeing to pay local assessments, homesteader on federal land was not estopped to assert that assessments thereon were unlawful.

Homesteader on federal land agreeing to pay assessments and assume liability imposed by irrigation laws was not thereby estopped to assert that federal lands could not be included within irrigation district for purpose of assessment.

6. Estoppel ☞110—Estoppel must be pleaded.

Defense of estoppel is one that must be pleaded by party relying on it.

7. Equity ☞88—Laches must be pleaded to be available.

Laches is affirmative defense which must be pleaded by party wishing to avail himself of it.

8. Judgment ☞715(3)—Judgment holding irrigation district legally organized and its bonds lawfully issued was not res judicata of contention that federal land could not be locally assessed.

Judgment of court confirming organization of irrigation district and approving issue of bonds was not res judicata of question whether federal land could lawfully be included within such district for purposes of assessment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Harrie Wilder Bishop against C. Hughes Jordan. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Ray W. Hays, of Fresno, for appellant.
Brown & Bissell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

Appellant brought this action to quiet his title to land in Kern county. Respondent appeared by answer and cross-complaint and denied appellant's title, and asserted title in himself. Judgment was rendered quieting title to the property in respondent.

About September 7, 1887, appellant filed his application with the United States Land Office at Visalia, Cal., to homestead the land involved under the laws of the United States.

The land was then part of the public domain belonging to the federal government. Appellant commenced to reside on the property in March, 1888, and continued to so reside thereon until after November 17, 1894, when his patent was issued to him.

On September 22, 1888, the Poso Irrigation District was formed under what is commonly known as the "Wright Act" (St. 1887, p. 29) and continued to exist as a legal entity until March 1, 1923, when it was dissolved by a decree of court. The property involved in this action was located within the exterior boundaries of this district. No question is raised as to the legality of the organization and existence of the district up to the date of its disincorporation. Some time prior to September 10, 1889, the district took the necessary steps to issue bonds with which to raise money to carry out the purpose of its organization. On the last-named date, the bonds were confirmed and approved by a decree of court.

On March 20, 1918, the board of supervisors of Kern county levied an assessment on all the real property in the district for the purpose of making payments on the outstanding bonds, and an assessment of $159.18 was placed upon the property involved herein. The assessment was not paid, and the property was sold to satisfy the same, and a certificate of sale issued to W. J. Williams and J. W. Deyoe, who assigned their interests therein and thereunder to Byron R. Marsh on July 25, 1922. On June 26, 1925, a deed was made to the property by the treasurer of Kern county, to Marsh, who, with his wife, deeded it to respondent on August 4, 1925. It does not appear that respondent, or any of his predecessors in interest subsequent to the tax sale, were ever in possession of any portion of the property. Appellant commenced this action to quiet his title to the property on May 19, 1926. At the trial appellant tendered to respondent all money expended by him in paying the assessment, his expenses, and interest, which tender was refused.

[1] The main question to be decided in this case is whether or not the land involved, being a part of the public domain of the United States of America, at the time of the formation of the Poso Irrigation district, the issuance of its bonds, the proceedings to affirm and confirm the organization of the district and its bonds, was included within the district in so far as its power to tax the property is concerned. We believe that this question must be resolved in favor of appellant.

The act admitting the state of California into the Union (1 Hittell, art. 242) contains the following provision: "That the said State of California is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of said State, through their Legislature, or otherwise, Shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the lands within its limits, and shall pass no law and do no act whereby the title of the United States shall be impaired or questioned; and they shall never levy any tax or assessment of any description whatever, upon the public domain of the United States."

Our courts have construed the law to permit the taxation of property by the state of California, or its agencies, when a private person had a perfect equity therein, with only the dry legal title remaining in the United States, but not otherwise. Central Pacific R. Co. v. Howard, 52 Cal. 227; Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. San Francisco, 139 Cal. 205, 72 P. 920, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 608, 96 Am. St. Rep. 100.

The Homestead Act in force at the time appellant filed his entry upon the land (8 Fed. Stats. Ann., 2d Ed., p. 558 [43 USCA § 164]) provided in part as follows: "No certificate [however] shall be given or patent issued therefor until the expiration of three years from the date of such entry; and if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within two years thereafter, the person making such entry, or if he be dead his widow, or in case of her death his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, proves by * * * two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have * * * resided upon and cultivated the same for the term of three years succeeding the time of filing the affidavit and makes affidavit that no part of such land has been alienated, except as provided in section 174 of this division of this chapter, and that he, she, or they will bear true allegiance to the Government of the United States, then in such case he, she, or they, if at that time citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided by law."

[2] This act has been construed to give the entryman no title by virtue of his entry, but merely the right of possession which might be perfected into a title by his continued occupancy and improvement of the land. Flint, etc., R. Co. v. Gordon, 41 Mich. 420, 2 N. W. 648. The right of possession which he acquired by the entry, in so far as the United States is concerned, is inchoate and conditional upon his performing the conditions imposed by law, and is not perfected until he has performed all of such conditions. Norton v. Evans (C. C. A.) 82 F. 804; Shiver v. United States, 159 U. S. 491, 16 S. Ct. 54, 40 L. Ed. 231.

The same question presented in the case before us was decided in the case of Nevada National Bank v. Poso Irrigation District, 140 Cal. 344, 73 P. 1056, 1057. In that case the Supreme Court held: "Appellant, Augustine V. Russell, filed a complaint in intervention, and, after putting in issue the allegation of the complaint as to the validity of the bonds and the right of plaintiff to recover thereon, further alleged that she was the owner of the southeast quarter of section 6 of township 26 south, range 27 east, M. D. B. & M.; that said land lies within the exterior boundaries of said Poso Irrigation District; that said district was organized September 22, 1888; that her said land was then public land of the United States; that John L. Russell filed his application to homestead said land under the land laws of the United States on February 6, 1892; that a patent therefor was issued to him on January 18, 1894, and that in November, 1896, said Russell conveyed the same to her, and that she is now the owner thereof.

* * * Assuming the regularity and validity of the organization of the district and the issuance of the bonds, except as to the land now owned by the intervener, and hereinbefore described, the question is presented whether her said land is liable, by assessment under the act of the Legislature, or in any manner, for the payment of the bonds held by the plaintiff. I think it is not. The intervener's land was not represented in the organization of the district by any person authorized to vote for or against its organization. If the act of the Legislature under which the district was organized had expressly declared that public lands of the United States situated within the exterior boundaries of an irrigation district should be a part thereof, and assessed for its proportion of the liabilities of the district, no one would hesitate to say that such provision would be void; that neither the state nor any of its agencies could impose a tax assessment, or liability upon the public lands of the United States. It is clear, therefore, that so long as the said land now owned by the intervener remained public land of the United States, no liability created by the state or district attached thereto. The further question then arises: Did the sale and conveyance by the United States to the intervener or her grantor operate to charge it with a pre-existing liability not created or assented to either by the government or its grantee? This question must also be answered in the negative, for, if the grantee of the United States must take the land burdened with the liability of an irrigation district made to include it without the assent of the government or the purchaser, it attaches a condition to the disposal of the property of the government without its sanction or consent, and which must, in such cases, interfere with its disposal."

Respondent tries to distinguish this case from the one at bar for the reason that in May, 1894, appellant, with many property owners in the district, signed an instrument in the nature of a ratification of a declaration of trust in which respondent argues that there appeared a consent of the grantee of the government (appellant) to the burden of the liability resulting from the bonds issued by the district, being placed upon the property. The last sentence of the instrument is as follows: "It is understood that by this instrument we obligate ourselves to comply with the said irrigation laws, known as the 'Wright Act' by the payment of the taxes or assessments levied thereunder and that we do not hereby assume any greater obligation or liability than such as are imposed by said laws, assuming them to be valid."

[3] If, as said in the case of Nevada National Bank v. Poso Irrigation District, supra, appellant's "land is not a part of the Poso Irrigation District, is not subject to any lien of said judgment in favor of the plaintiff [the bondholder], nor to any assessment for the payment thereof, or of any debt or liability of the said Poso Irrigation District," there existed no obligation or liability imposed by law upon appellant to pay any tax or assessment on the government land described in his entry, at the time of the execution of the foregoing instrument, then he did not give his consent to the inclusion of this property within the district for the purpose of assessment or taxation.

[4-7] Respondent contends that by signing this instrument appellant ratified the inclusion of the lands here involved within the district, and waived his right to object to their being so included. In view of the last sentence quoted above, the document cannot be so construed. Neither can he be estopped by the instrument to assert that the lands were not included within the district for the purpose of assessment and taxation. Attention might be called to the fact that the document only described a portion of the lands here involved and also that estoppel is defense that must be pleaded by one relying upon it. 10 Cal. Jur. 653. Respondent failed to plead this defense. Nor can we agree with respondent that the record before us shows that appellant was guilty of any laches. Laches is also an affirmative defense which respondent failed to plead. Trail v. Firth, 186 Cal. 68, 198 P. 1033.

[8] Appellant, by his suit, is not making a collateral attack upon the organization of the Poso irrigation district. He is merely relying upon the rule that government land cannot be considered as included within the district for the purposes of taxation or assessment. Because his land escapes such a burden as a result of this action will furnish no precedent for a like decision in favor of any other owner of property within the district, unless the land of such other owner was also government property. For the same reason the judgment of court holding the district legally organized, and the bonds lawfully issued, does not make the doctrine of "res judicata" apply here.

PER CURIAM.

In denying the petition for a hearing in this court, after decision by the district court of appeal, we do so with the realization that the judgment herein is contrary to and in effect overrules the case of People v. Spencer, 54 Cal. App. 54, 201 P. 130. We are satisfied with the reasoning and conclusions of the district court of appeal in the present case, and pronounce it a correct declaration of the law. We therefore deem it unnecessary to grant the petition herein merely for the purpose of entering a like judgment in this court based on the same reasoning and conclusions.

Civ. 6380.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Rehearing Denied March 31, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 8, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations ☞601—Restricting specified institutions or businesses to certain zone is within police power of city.

City has authority in proper exercise of police power to divide its area into districts within which may be confined operation of specified institutions or businesses.

2. Municipal corporations ☞601—Institutions for insane are subject to zoning regulations, as they may become dangerous to health, safety, and comfort of community if not properly managed.

While institution for treatment of insane is not of such noxious character that either health, safety, or comfort of community necessarily would be endangered by reason of its presence, nevertheless by mismanagement it may become so and is subject to zoning ordinance.

3. Municipal corporations ☞626—Ordinance restricting institutions for insane to densely populated district, while excluding them from sparsely populated district, was oppressive, discriminatory, and void.

City ordinance which permitted operation of institution for insane in thickly populated and densely settled district, while excluding them from comparatively sparsely settled districts, was oppressive, discriminatory, and void.

HOUSER, J.

By the terms of an ordinance duly adopted by the common council of the city of Los Angeles and approved by its mayor, it thereafter became unlawful outside a described district in said city for any person to "operate, maintain or conduct any hospital, asylum, sanitarium, home, retreat or other place for the care or treatment of insane persons, persons of unsound mind or persons affected by or suffering from mental or nervous diseases." Territorially considered, the effect of the ordinance was that within from one-third to one-half of the area of said city the operation or maintenance of a hospital or a sanitarium for the care and treatment of persons who were "suffering from mental or nervous diseases" of whatever kind or severity was permitted; while in the remaining portion of said city the conduct of such an establishment was forbidden. Regarding the character of the several areas thus affected, it appears that in general the permissive district included some of the most densely populated portions of the city and its central downtown retail business district, within which were and are located many hotels, apartment houses, and two public parks. More specifically as to the residential area included in such permissive district, the record herein discloses the fact that one part thereof contained a residential district of 6,390 acres in which were located 32,044 families consisting of 118,563 persons, or an average of about 19 persons to the acre; also, a second like area of 151 acres which contained 3,971 families with a total of 11,913 persons, or about 79 persons to the acre. Concerning the territory within which the operation or maintenance of such hospitals or sanitariums was forbidden, comparatively speaking it appears that much of it was sparsely inhabited. To illustrate: One so-called residential district which contained 3,200 acres, of which more than one-half thereof was given over wholly to farming operations, housed an aggregate of 1,351 families with a total of 5,141 persons, or an average of less than 2 persons to the acre. Another of such forbidden districts comprised 4,910 acres, on which were living 802 persons, or one person to every 6 acres.

At the time the ordinance in question became effective, four different sanitariums devoted respectively to the care and treatment of either "mild mental cases" of adults, or of feeble-minded children, were in operation within the forbidden area of the city of Los Angeles. The maximum penalty prescribed by the terms of such ordinance for its violation was either a fine of $500, or imprisonment for a period of six months in the city jail of said city, or both such fine and imprisonment. To obviate the happening of untoward results from the operation of their respective institutions, each of the owners thereof sought the injunctive aid of the lower court to the end that the enforcement of such ordinance be forbidden and restrained. From a judgment denying to them, or any of them, the relief prayed, each of the respective plaintiffs in said actions has appealed to this court. By stipulation of the respective parties and by order of the court, the several appeals from the respective judgments therein were consolidated and as far as is here practicable are to be treated and considered as one appeal.

The principal contention of appellants is that the ordinance to which reference has been had is unreasonable and discriminatory, and consequently unconstitutional and void, in that it prohibits the operation or maintenance of a specified institution or business in any part of certain outlying, sparsely inhabited districts of the city, and at the same time permits the operation or maintenance of the same kind of an institution or business within the closely built-up and densely populated sections of the city.

[1] That in the proper exercise of police power the authority of a city to divide its area into districts within which respectively may be confined the operation of specified institutions or businesses is no longer open to inquiry or legal argument. Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A. L. R. 1479. In considering a questioned zoning ordinance of a city, frequently the only duty of the court is to determine whether such ordinance is necessary and has any reasonable tendency to subserve the legally recognized ends and purposes of police power, in that it bears a proper and substantial relation to either the public health, safety, morals, comfort, or general welfare. However, in the exercise of its powers the court may also be charged with additional duties, among which may be that of determining whether in the anticipated enforcement of the ordinance its provisions are unreasonable or are arbitrary and discriminatory.

[2] The opinion in the case of Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 P. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152, contains clear expressions to the effect that an institution of the nature of that conducted by the appellants herein is not of such a noxious or offensive character that either the health, safety, or comfort of the individuals comprising the surrounding community necessarily would be endangered or affected by reason of the presence and operation of such an institution therein. Nevertheless, it is manifest that by reason of either mismanagement or neglect of an institution of the nature of that conducted by the appellants it might so retrograde that its continued operation would present such a situation that either a legal nuisance would be evident, or that some one or more of the general elementary foundational conditions requisite to the exercise of the police power would be so palpably present as to authorize, if not imperatively demand, the passage of a zoning ordinance which would have the effect of suppressing the evil, or possibly prohibiting future operation of the establishment as formerly conducted. But aside from any direct question as to whether either a nuisance, or other asserted reason, should form a proper basis for the exercise of police power as far as the instant case is concerned, if the general right of the city to zone its area and in so doing to confine the operation of institutions of the character of those here involved to a specific district be conceded, there still remains for determination by this court the question of whether in exercising its right to zone its area the city has unjustly and unreasonably discriminated in favor of densely inhabited areas and against the several institutions located within sparsely inhabited sections of the city and which institutions are respectively owned and represented by the appellants whose several appeals are submitted to this court.

Notably in the case of Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A. L. R. 1479, and in other cases to which reference might be had, so much has been so forcefully written in the announcement of the application of legal principles relating to the authority of a municipality to divide its area into various districts, each to be devoted to some particular use or uses, that it is deemed at least inadvisable for this court to attempt any elaboration in connection therewith. At the outset, in dealing with the general question of police power, especially as affects the authority of a municipality to zone its territory, as was remarked by Mr. Justice Henshaw in the case of Curtis v. City of Los Angeles, 172 Cal. 230, 234, 156 P. 462, "one is embarrassed rather with the multiplicity than the paucity of authorities, and it would be a waste of time to undertake a review of them." A brief reference to a few of the authorities in this state which are deemed to have the greater bearing upon the facts of the case and the legal principles applicable thereto will suffice. Although, as far as this court is aware, the specific point here at issue heretofore has not been determined either by this or by any other court, the principle of law upon which must rest a decision herein has been discussed in each of several cases to which attention will be presently directed.

In the case entitled In re Throop, 169 Cal. 93, 145 P. 1029, 1031, by ordinance of the city of South Pasadena, its entire area, comprising approximately 2,200 acres, was divided into three parts or zones. The first of such districts contained about 25 acres and embraced the retail business section of the city; the second, which was "densely surrounded by residences and other buildings on all sides for a distance of many blocks in every direction, and * * * very largely built up," contained approximately 11½ acres, which by the terms of the ordinance was devoted to industrial uses; and the third, or so-called "residential district," had an area of 2,163 acres. As to the last-mentioned district, it appeared that it was "sparsely settled, one area containing 500 acres, being unimproved, undeveloped and practically uninhabited." By the express terms of the ordinance, many different kinds of business establishments, including stone crushers, were specifically excluded from operation in the third or "residential" district, but inferentially were permitted to operate in district number two, which, as stated by one of the witnesses on the trial of the action, was "immediately surrounded by a poorer class of residences." The test of the legality of the ordinance arose from the operation of a stone crusher in a "wash" which was located in a part of the "unimproved, undeveloped and practically uninhabited" portion of the so-called "residential district." After devoting some attention to the importance and necessity of stone crushers and their effect as affecting the public health, comfort, safety, and welfare of a populous community, the court reached the conclusion that: "In the case now under consideration, it is plainly manifest that the attempted regulation of the business conducted by the petitioner has no relation to the ends for which the police power exists, namely to protect the public health, comfort, safety, or welfare. An ordinance which prevents the operation of a stone crusher in a sparsely settled territory of 2,163 acres, 500 of which are undeveloped and practically uninhabited, and allows its operation in a small area of 11.65 acres in the center of a city surrounded by 'poorer classes of residences,' does not subserve the ends for which the police power exists."

Another case in which the facts are somewhat similar to those in the instant case is that of Curtis v. City of Los Angeles, 172 Cal. 230, 156 P. 462. The situation there presented and the ruling thereon are concisely stated in the syllabus of the case as follows: "An ordinance of a municipality which absolutely prohibits the maintenance of stables within a small district of the city which was comparatively sparsely settled, while permitting their maintenance in other districts more thickly populated and densely settled and exclusively devoted to residence purposes, is oppressive, discriminatory, and void."

The facts in the case entitled In re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 P. 180, 182, were not unlike those herein, in that in the Smith Case, by ordinance, the county of Los Angeles singled out a specified "sparsely settled rural district" and prohibited the maintenance of gas works therein—the effect of which, inferentially, was to permit the maintenance of gas works in every other part of the county. In passing upon the reasonableness of the ordinance (and perhaps as properly indicative of a ruling here), in part the court said: " * * * In city ordinances, as distinguished from county ordinances, the interest and requirements for protection of a thickly settled and growing community will often be widely different from those of sparsely settled and thinly inhabited rural districts. An ordinance limiting, regulating, or even prohibiting, in a certain district within the corporate limits of a city, may be perfectly reasonable, where like limitations, restrictions, and prohibitions as to some district within the county, arbitrarily carved out, would be oppressive and unreasonable in the extreme. * * * " It was held that the ordinance in question was unreasonable, oppressive, an invasion of constitutional rights, and therefore void.

The prevailing principle of law announced in the case of Brown v. City of Los Angeles, 183 Cal. 783, 192 P. 716, is that where by ordinance, in the proper exercise of the police power, the conduct of an undertaking establishment is reasonably limited to a specified area, the fact that in other portions of the city "exactly similar" to that inside the permissive area the maintenance of an identical business is forbidden does not militate against the reasonableness of the ordinance. And so in the Hadacheck Case, 165 Cal. 416, 132 P. 584, L. R. A. 1916B, 1248, it was held that in the proper exercise of the police power a municipality had the right to prohibit the operation or conduct of brick yards or places for the manufacture or burning of brick within a specified area of the city, even though the maintenance of such yards was not prohibited in other districts of the city where their existence was equally injurious to their neighbors.

In the Brown Case, 183 Cal. 783, 192 P. 716, the plaintiff was attempting to conduct his undertaking establishment on a lot located 170 feet outside the limits of a zone in which the maintenance of such a business was permissible and which zone comprised "some 60 blocks, including practically all of the business and some of the semi-business property in the central portion of the city." It will thus be noted that in its foundational facts the Brown Case was the exact opposite of the situation presented in the instant case. That the ruling made by the court was not intended to apply to facts such as are here presented is made manifest by the following language occurring in the opinion: " * * * It is also pointed out that there are vast tracts of uninhabited land contained in the annexed districts of Los Angeles city, and that the ordinance in effect prohibits the establishment of undertaking parlors in these localities. If appellant was located in this uninhabited and outlying territory he would be in a position to raise that question, but, having selected a location in the heart of the city, he is not concerned with the validity of the ordinance as affecting such outlying territory. * * * " And that even as against the provisions of the ordinance, had the plaintiff "located his undertaking establishment in some remote and comparatively uninhabited part of Los Angeles city, upon property which was only valuable for use as an undertaking establishment, we would have a case paralleling In re Throop, supra. In this case, however, the situation is entirely different, and comes clearly within the principle enunciated in Ex parte Hadacheck, supra. * * * " Such language is indicative of at least two things: First, that in circumstances "paralleling In re Throop," the law as there announced should be followed; and, secondly, that where the situation is "entirely different" and parallels the Hadacheck Case, the law as therein stated should be controlling. In such circumstances, the duty of this court is, if possible, to determine which of such cases in its facts presents the nearest parallel to the facts in the instant case, and in its judgment to be rendered thereon to be governed accordingly. Adverting to the Throop Case, it will be remembered that in effect the stone crusher was proposed to be permitted in a "very largely built up" section of the city, and was to be prohibited in a "sparsely settled" community; just as here, sanitariums are proposed to be permitted in a "densely populated" portion of the city and to be prohibited in portions of the city which are "sparsely inhabited." In the Hadacheck Case, the difficulty was not that the brick yard was permitted in a "densely populated" community and prohibited in an "uninhabited" area; but in effect was that it was not permitted in a described district which was altogether similar to other districts in which the operation and maintenance of brick yards were permitted. In addition to the Throop Case, it is difficult, if possible, to distinguish this case from the legal principles and their application to the respective facts as stated in each of the cases of Curtis v. City of Los Angeles, 172 Cal. 230, 156 P. 462, and In re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 P. 180.

[3] Basing its judgment upon such authorities, this court is of the opinion that the ordinance here in question is unreasonable and discriminatory, and consequently unconstitutional and void.

of board of directors than if it had been made real party plaintiff through action of majority.

2. Corporations $\S$ 110—Corporation suing to cancel stock sold from treasury must restore, or offer to restore, everything of value received from purchaser (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 1689, 1691).

Where corporation sues to cancel stock sold from treasury and for which it received full purchase price, it is in no better position than individual suing for rescission of contract on any grounds mentioned in Civ. Code $\S$ 1689, and it must have restored, or offered to restore, everything of value it received from the other party under section 1691.

3. Licenses $\S$ 39—In suit to cancel contract for sale of stock, purchaser could show purchase was in good faith without knowledge of infirmities.

In suit to cancel contract for sale of corporate stock on ground that sale violated conditions in permit of commissioner of corporations, in which evidence tended to show that corporation ratified sale and accepted and retained benefits, purchaser was entitled to show that purchase was made in good faith without knowledge of any infirmities, since result of such showing would be that corporation was guilty of misrepresentation and estopped to claim invalidity of sale.

4. Equity $\S$ 39(1), 66—One seeking equity must do equity, and court of equity assuming jurisdiction has jurisdiction of all equities in suit.

Where party seeks equity, he must do equity, and when court assumes jurisdiction in equity suit, it has jurisdiction of all equities in case.

5. Licenses $\S$ 39—In suit to cancel contract for sale of stock, findings against defendant on issues of fraud held unsupported.

In suit to cancel contract for sale of corporate stock on ground that sale violated conditions in permit of commissioner of corporations, in which plaintiffs failed to plead facts constituting fraud, conspiracy, or bad faith of defendant and failed to prove anything more than general suspicions, and defendant was denied opportunity of disproving charges, on ground that proof was immaterial, findings against defendant on such issues held wholly unsupported by pleading or proof.

6. Licenses $\S$ 39—Plaintiffs suing to cancel contract for sale of stock should by allegations in complaint have tendered back consideration.

In suit to cancel contract for sale of corporate stock on ground that sale violated conditions in permit of commissioner of corporations, plaintiffs should by appropriate allegations of their complaint have made tender of consideration of sale to defendant on behalf of corporation through judgment; plaintiffs having brought suit as minority of board of directors and joined corporation as party defendant.

7. Licenses $\S$ 39—Failure of plaintiffs suing to cancel stock sale contract to tender back consideration was not fatal.

In suit to cancel contract for sale of corporate stock on ground that sale violated conditions in permit of commissioner of corporations, plaintiffs' failure to tender back consideration by appropriate allegations in complaint was not fatal to cause of action, since in equity case court may do exact justice between parties and is not limited to offers and demands of pleadings.

8. Evidence $\S$ 441(1)—Evidence in suit to cancel stock sale contract respecting notice to plaintiffs, and directors' authorization that president sell stock, held admissible to show plaintiffs waived written notice and waiver, not being objectionable under parol evidence rule.

In suit to cancel contract for sale of corporate stock on ground that sale violated conditions in permit of commissioner of corporations, evidence of written notice to plaintiffs as required by permit, and that directors voted unanimously to authorize president to sell stock, held not objectionable under parol evidence rule, since minutes of meeting are not written instruments, but was admissible for purpose of disclosing what actually took place, and as tending to prove defense that plaintiffs waived right to written notice and written waiver.

9. Estoppel $\S$ 52—One may waive right given by contract or advantage of law intended for his benefit (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3513).

Any person may waive advantage of law intended solely for his benefit under Civ. Code, $\S$ 3513, and may waive right given to him by contract or otherwise.

10. Licenses $\S$ 39—Defendants in suit to cancel stock sale contract could show plaintiffs did not exercise option to buy (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1756).

In suit to cancel contract for sale of corporate stock on ground that sale violated conditions in permit of commissioner of corporations, in which it appeared commissioner imposed condition giving each stockholder option to buy pro rata share of new stock, defendants could show that plaintiffs did not exercise option nor demand delivery within reasonable time under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1756.

11. Licenses $\S$ 39—Defendants in suit to cancel stock sale contract could show acts of plaintiffs tending to prove they ratified transaction and accepted benefits.

In suit to cancel contract for sale of corporate stock on ground that sale violated conditions in permit of commissioner of corporations, it was competent for defendants to show plaintiffs' acts tending to prove that they ratified transaction and accepted benefits without protest, where plaintiffs planted case firmly on strict wording of permit providing waiver of right to purchase must be in writing, since same result might have been reached by ratification.

12. Corporations $\S$ 386—Acts wholly beyond corporate powers are void and cannot be ratified, but acts irregular for failure to follow statutory regulation or condition are voidable.

Generally speaking, those acts which are wholly beyond corporate powers are void, and cannot be ratified by any subsequent act of corporation; but when act is merely irregular because corporate officers have failed to follow some statutory regulation or condition, it would be more proper to say that act is voidable rather than void.

13. Corporations ⇨72—Corporation may sell stock (Const. art. 12, § 11).

A corporation has power to sell its stock for a valuable consideration under Const. art. 12, § 11.

14. Corporations ⇨72—It is competent for Legislature to declare that conditions for benefit of individual in sale of stock may be waived by individual.

Limitations and conditions upon manner of sale of stock by corporation can be imposed by Legislature, but conditions which Legislature may exact it may also excuse, and therefore it is wholly competent for Legislature to declare that conditions for benefit of individual may be waived by individual.

15. Corporations ⇨103—Corporate officers' breach of statutory conditions in sale of stock may be ratified by corporation (Const. art. 12, § 11).

In sale of stock by corporation under Const. art. 12, § 11, breach of statutory conditions by corporate officers may be ratified by corporation.

16. Corporations ⇨388(2)—Corporation having received benefits of stock sale induced by officers' fraud cannot claim stock issue is void.

Where corporate stock has been sold through fraud of corporate officers, corporation is estopped, after having received and retained benefits of transaction, from claiming that issue of stock is void.

17. Licenses ⇨39—Defendants in suit to cancel stock sale transaction may show plaintiffs took no steps to restore consideration to purchaser.

In suit to cancel contract for sale of corporate stock on ground that sale violated conditions in permit of commissioner of corporations, it was competent for defendants to show that plaintiffs had taken no steps to restore, or offer to restore to purchaser, consideration which corporation received, notwithstanding plaintiffs' contention that they were not in control of affairs of corporation, and therefore in no position to make such offer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Suit by Aaron Michaels and another against the Pacific Soft Water Laundry and others, to declare sales of treasury stock void. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

NOURSE, Acting P. J.

The two plaintiffs, as stockholders in the defendant laundry corporation, sued to have it declared that the sales of treasury stock of the corporation to defendants Bull and Thompson were void. The cause was tried by the court without a jury and resulted in a judgment for plaintiffs as prayed. The defendants Bull, Fletcher, and Craft joined with the corporation in an appeal from the judgment. The defendant Thompson prosecutes a separate appeal. Both appeals are presented on a joint bill of exceptions.

The two plaintiffs constituted the minority of the board of directors of the laundry company. The defendants Bull, Fletcher, and Craft constituted a majority of the board. The corporation was capitalized for $200,000, divided into 200,000 shares. Seventy thousand shares had been issued and were outstanding at the time the events mentioned herein arose. Of this number Michaels owned and held 37,000 and was in control of the corporation affairs and business. The three director defendants petitioned the state corporation commissioner for leave to issue 30,000 additional shares from the treasury in order to liquidate outstanding indebtedness of the corporation. The two plaintiffs opposed the petition before the commission, but on December 15, 1925, after hearing thereon, the petition was granted upon the condition that the stock should first be offered to existing stockholders in proportion to the stock then held by them. The permit contained the following stipulation, which is the basis of the controversy: "Sixty days after such offer shall have been made in writing to said stockholders, or upon receipt of the written waiver of such stockholders of the exercise of the right herein given to subscribe to said shares, any shares remaining unsubscribed for may be offered and sold to any other stockholders of said company, or to the public, for the consideration hereinbefore recited."

On January 5, 1926, at a meeting of the board of directors, at which the five directors mentioned were present, the matter of the sale of the additional shares was discussed. The minutes of this meeting received in evidence recite that Michaels moved "that the stock be sold at once. Mr. Pervine seconded the motion. The motion was put before the directors and discussion asked for. Mr. Michaels then stated he did not want the stock sold. The president read the permit and gave Mr. Michaels a copy. Mr. Craft and Mr. Fletcher said the permit was for the purpose of paying the mortgage, and would leave the matter in the hands of the president."

More than 60 days after this meeting the president negotiated the sale of 21,500 shares of said stock to defendant Thompson, and at the same time 600 shares of said stock were sold to defendant Bull. The funds received from these sales, $22,100, were paid into the treasury of the corporation and were used by the corporation to pay off a note and mortgage owned by the California Bank. The next meeting of the directors of the corporation was held on March 17, 1926, and at that time the president informed the members of the board that the stock for which a permit to sell had been granted had nearly all been disposed of and that the money was being used to pay off this mortgage which became due in April. No objection to these proceedings was made by any member of the board, and no request or demand was made by the plaintiffs that they be permitted to purchase any portion of the stock offered. At the close of plaintiffs' case it was stipulated that the plaintiff Michaels had tendered $18,000 to purchase his proportion of the stock from the corporation in accordance with the terms of the permit. Objection was made to this tender on the ground that it was too late because the corporation did not have sufficient shares to sell to the plaintiff.

No tender was made by either of the plaintiffs as individuals or on behalf of the corporation to repurchase the stock sold to either Thompson or Bull, and no offer was made to restore to them the moneys received by the corporation from them and used by the corporation in the liquidation of its indebtedness. Notwithstanding this, the trial court rendered judgment for the corporation, declaring the sale void and ordering the certificates canceled without restoration to the purchasers of any part of the profits of the alleged "void" sale.

[1] At the beginning of the inquiry it is proper to determine the exact nature of the action. It is an action brought by the corporation to recover for some conceived wrong done to the corporation itself, but because the majority of the governing board of directors refuses to prosecute the action in the name of the corporation, it is in reality instituted by two of the stockholders on behalf of the corporation and the latter is joined as a party defendant. There are certain features of the proceeding in which the plaintiffs, particularly Michaels, are personally interested beyond the redress which they seek for the corporation. Thus, he alleges that by reason of the sale, he lost control of the corporation, and the inference is that if the stock is returned to the treasury and he is permitted to purchase his share this control would be retained. But the plaintiffs seek no relief, as individuals, against any of the defendants, as they might have done, and the prayer of the complaint and the judgment which followed it returning to the treasury of the corporation the entire number of 22,100 shares to be resold for the full price of $1 a share in accordance with the terms of the permit manifestly stamps the corporation as the real party plaintiff. In their briefs filed on this appeal, these plaintiffs insist with some spirit that they are not suing on behalf of the corporation, but that they are merely seeking individual redress. However, there has been filed with us an appeal in another action entitled Michaels et al. v. Pacific Soft Water Laundry et al., 286 P. 172, which is an action brought under section 315, Civil Code, to determine the validity of an election of directors of the laundry corporation. With the papers on the appeal in the instant case the parties have filed a stipulation that these two cases may be consolidated for all purposes of appeal and hearing. In the brief filed by these plaintiffs in Michaels v. Pacific Soft Water Laundry, supra, they state that the instant case was brought by them as stockholders "for the benefit and use of the corporation" for the reason that the corporation is dominated by the other defendants. We are satisfied that such is the nature of the action and that the case is like Turner v. Markham, 155 Cal. 562, 569, 102 P. 272; Difani v. Riverside County Oil Co., 201 Cal. 210, 215, 256 P. 210; and Eggers v. National Radio Co. (Cal. App.) 281 P. 58, an action to preserve the corporate property or corporate interests brought by a stockholder where the governing directors refused to act or are guilty of fraud or bad faith in the protection and preservation of the corporate interests.

[2, 3] This interest of the corporation as such is most important in connection with the appeal of Thompson. All that the respondents sought as individuals was the right to purchase their proportionate share of the stock issued and to pay therefor into the treasury of the corporation the purchase price fixed by the corporation commissioner. But to do this it was necessary that the corporation have returned to its treasury a sufficient number of said shares to enable it to sell to the respondents their quota. Thus in seeking relief for themselves they first must have the relief which they sought on behalf of the corporation—the return of the stock to the treasury. With this in view we are confronted with the question of the rights as they exist as between the corporation and the purchasers of the stock. Thus if the respondents had control of the governing body of the corporation and sued in the name of the corporation for the cancellation of the stock, what would be the rights of the corporation as between it and the stock purchasers? Manifestly, the corporation as such has no greater right and has no less obligation to do equity because it is joined as a party defendant by the minority of the board than if it had been made the real party plaintiff through the action of a majority. Thus, when a corporation sues to cancel shares of stock which it has sold from its treasury and for which it has received the full purchase price, is in no better position than an individual who sues for the rescission of a contract upon any of the grounds mentioned in section 1689, Civil Code. At the very threshold of such a suit it is necessary that the party seeking relief must have restored or offered to restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him. Section 1691, Civ. Code. Here the undisputed evidence is that the president of the corporation, acting under what he deemed to be the authorization of the directors of the corporation, negotiated the sale of the stock to Thompson; that he reported the transaction to the full board of directors; that the money was thereafter received and placed in the treasury of the corporation without objection or remonstrance on the part of any member of the board; that it was thereafter used for the liquidation of an outstanding indebtedness of the corporation with the knowledge and consent of the full board of directors; that the money so received was still retained by the corporation at the time of the trial; and that, though one of the respondents made an offer to purchase additional stock from the corporation, no one on behalf of the respondents or on behalf of the corporation at any time made any tender or offer to restore to the appellant Thompson any portion of the benefits received from him. Basing its judgment upon the finding that the three defendant directors were guilty of fraud in making the sale to Thompson, the trial court declared that all the shares of stock held by Thompson should be void, ordered the certificate to be canceled, and thus returned to the treasury of the corporation all these shares without affording Thompson any relief against the corporation. If there were any evidence supporting the finding of the trial court that the purchase made by Thompson was not made in good faith by him, but was made for the purpose of defrauding the respondents, there might be justification for exacting some penalty from him, but the complaint not only failed to sufficiently charge Thompson with fraud in this respect, but when the plaintiffs came to their proof they showed that they had nothing but mere suspicions upon which to base their allegations. When Michaels was asked the direct question as to whether he maintained that Thompson conspired with the other directors in the sale of the stock, he answered that he had no proof, but he entertained a suspicion that Thompson had made arrangements with the others; however, he would not say that this was true. No other testimony of any character connected Thompson in the slightest degree with any conspiracy or fraudulent scheme in connection with the sale, but the remarkable situation was that when this appellant attempted to prove his good faith, that he purchased the stock in the regular course of business, that he was informed by the president of the corporation prior to his purchase that written notice had been given to all the other stockholders and that written waivers had been received from them, and that he purchased the stock without notice or knowledge that anything irregular had been done, each question and each offer of proof was objected to on the ground that it was "immaterial," and every objection on that ground was sustained. Then, without the slightest evidence to support the findings and with a rigid denial of every attempt to prove the facts, the trial court made elaborate findings adverse to this appellant on every issue of fact involving good faith, knowledge, conspiracy, and fraud. He was thus skinned, drawn, and quartered without the opportunity even to offer a prayer.

To the charge that these findings are wholly unsupported by any evidence the respondents make no reply; the only defense made of the rulings rejecting the evidence which would have required findings favorable to this appellant is that, because the certificates of stock are not negotiable, it is immaterial whether Thompson was an innocent purchaser in good faith. But the negotiability of the instrument is beside the question. The good faith of the purchaser is of singular importance in relation to the rights of the corporation and the purchaser. In MacDonald v. Reich & Lievre, 281 P. 106, 108, we said: "When a corporation issues to the public certificates of stock, regular on their face, it amounts substantially to a representation that the certificates are regular and valid. Certificates of stock so issued by a corporation, but which were irregular or void for reasons not participated in by the stockholder, have been held to amount to a misrepresentation and fraud upon the part of the corporation officials for which the corporation is answerable. Green v. Caribou Oil Mining Co., 179 Cal. 787, 178 P. 950; Sykes v. Pure Food Cider Co., 157 Iowa, 601, 138 N. W. 554; Windram v. French, 151 Mass. 547, 24 N. E. 914, 8 L. R. A. 750." (Emphasis ours.) The issue involved in that case was the sale of corporate stock without a permit from the corporation commissioner. No question of waiver of a personal right or of ratification was involved. But here, where the evidence tended to show that the corporation ratified the sale and accepted and retained the benefits, the purchaser was entitled to show that the purchase had been made in good faith and without knowledge of any infirmities. If this appellant had been permitted to make this showing, then the result would have been that the corporation was guilty of misrepresentation and fraud as to him, and the corporation would then have been estopped to claim the invalidity of the sale. The rule of the cases cited by respondents would enter here—that the transferee of certificates of stock takes them subject to "all equities of the corporation." 6 Cal. Jur. p. 785, and cases cited. But the rule upon which respondents so confidently rely forces the inquiry: What equities has a corporation against an innocent purchaser in good faith of treasury stock sold to him through the misrepresentation and fraud of the corporation? That the corporation cannot rely on its own fraud to claim the invalidity of the sale to the injury of an innocent third party when the corporation is the party defendant is the rule of Smith v. Martin, 135 Cal. 247, 67 P. 779; Daily Telegram v. Ocean View Oil Co., 65 Cal. App. 608, 224 P. 1006; and Cortelyou v. Imperial Land Co., 156 Cal. 373, 104 P. 695. We cannot perceive how the rule could be less applicable when the corporation is the party plaintiff.

[4] It would be a reproach on the law if a party had no remedy in a case of this kind, and it is no answer to say that he might sue the corporation for the loss he has suffered. The suit which the respondents have here instituted is in equity. To seek equity one must do equity, and, when the court assumes jurisdiction, it has jurisdiction of all the equities in the case. To require the stock issued to appellant Thompson to be canceled and returned to the treasury of the corporation without restoring the purchase price to him is to accomplish through the guise of equity a greater fraud upon him than the fraud of which the respondents complain. The fraud charged in the complaint—the fraud of the majority of the directors—was the fraud of the corporation, yet this judgment determines that the corporation must profit by its own fraud and that these directors who were found guilty of the fraud must also, as stockholders, incidentally profit by their own fraud. But this is not all. The minority directors who are both stockholders in the corporation are also permitted to profit by the fraud which they both so strenuously condemn.

[5] As to the appellant Thompson the case is this: The respondents failed to plead any facts constituting fraud, conspiracy, or bad faith on his part. The respondents wholly failed to prove anything more than their general suspicions of the conduct of this appellant, while the appellant was denied every opportunity of disproving these charges upon the ground that such proof was immaterial. The findings on these issues are therefore wholly unsupported by pleading or proof, and the judgment as to him must be reversed.

[6, 7] In the record in Michaels v. Pacific Soft Water Laundry, supra, to which we are permitted to refer by the stipulation above mentioned, it appears that the respondents might have assumed control of the governing board of the corporation some time in the year 1927. The question will therefore arise on a retrial as to this appellant whether the respondents, after they had the ability to do so, made a sufficient tender or offer to restore to him within a reasonable time. But in this connection we should add that we do not hold that, before they instituted the action, the respondents must have tendered, or offered to restore, the consideration of the sale to Thompson. They should have, by appropriate allegations in their complaint, made such tender on behalf of the corporation through the judgment. However, their failure to do so is not fatal to their cause of action because, this being a case in equity, the court may do exact justice between the parties and is not limited to the offers and demands of the pleadings. Wills v. Porter, 132 Cal. 516, 521, 64 P. 896; Connell v. Crawford, 92 Cal. App. 715, 719, 268 P. 948. Thus, it is said, in Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 511, 47 P. 369, 52 P. 797, that one of the exceptions to the rule as to restoration, is "where, without any fault of plaintiff, there have been peculiar complications which make it impossible for plaintiff to offer full restoration, although the circumstances are such that a court of chancery may by a final decree fully adjust the equities between the parties." Cal., etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 739, 91 P. 593; Rosemead Company v. Shipley Co. (Cal. Sup.) 278 P. 1038.

The fact that the respondents were in the minority in the board of directors might excuse them from making an offer of restoration to Thompson because, in the final analysis, such restoration must be made by the corporate entity, but, if they have since assumed control of the corporation affairs, and no offer has been made on behalf of the corporation through them, the exception to the rule hereinbefore noted would no longer apply.

The cause as to Thompson, therefore, must be retried upon the issues whether the complaining stockholders have in fact assumed control of the corporate entity, whether, after assuming such control, a sufficient tender and offer to restore was made within a reasonable time, and whether, by accepting the benefits of the sale of the stock to Thompson, the corporation, and these respondents, validated the sale by ratifying the transaction. But here it should be noted that, if on a retrial as to the other appellants, judgment should go to them, such judgment would, of course, inure to the benefit of appellant Thompson.

[8-10] As to the other appellants, the cause must be reversed for the manifest errors occurring throughout the trial which denied to them the right to make any defense to the charges in the complaint. One hundred and eighty-two specifications are assigned as error in this respect. It would serve no purpose to consider these exceptions separately or to state how many of these constitute reversible error. It is sufficient to state generally that, stripped of all its trimmings, this is an action to cancel a contract for the sale of corporate stock upon the ground that the sale violated the conditions contained in the permit of the commissioner of corporations. To the issue of fraud charged to the three directors, defendants endeavored to prove: First, that they had complied with the spirit and purpose of the permit; second, that the stipulations therein for written notice and written waiver were expressly waived by the respondents; third, that the president of the corporation was authorized by the unanimous vote of the directors, including these respondents, to sell the stock in the manner in which he did; fourth, that the corporation and these two respondents ratified the sale and accepted the benefits thereof; and fifth, that the corporation as the real party plaintiff has failed to take the necessary steps to enable it to cancel the contract of sale.

Upon the first three points noted these appellants sought to prove that they had given to the respondents written notice as required by the permit when they handed them a printed copy of the commissioner's permit, and that, at the meeting held on January 5, the directors voted unanimously to authorize the president to sell the stock in accordance with his own judgment. Such evidence was not objectionable under the parol evidence rule. In Lawrence v. Premier Indem. Assur. Co., 180 Cal. 688, 697, 182 P. 431, 435, the Supreme Court said: "But minutes of a meeting are not a written instrument. Their function is merely to act as a written record of what took place at the meeting. That record may be true or it may not be, and in the absence of the element of estoppel, as where a party has acted in justifiable reliance upon the minutes, it is permitted to the corporation or to anyone else to show what actually did take place at the meeting. Gilson, etc., Co. v. Gilson et. al., 51 Cal. 341; Boggs v. Lakeport, etc., Ass'n, 111 Cal. 354, 43 P. 1106; 7 R. C. L. § 126. In the present case there is no element of estoppel, and it was permissible for the defendants to show the full transaction, although but a part of it appeared in the minutes." Here no element of estoppel was present in so far as the respondents were concerned, but the evidence was admissible not only for the purpose of disclosing what actually did take place, but as tending to prove the defense that the respondents waived the right to written notice and written waiver. Any one may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his benefit. Section 3513, Civ. Code. He may, of course, waive a right given to him by contract or otherwise. The effect of the condition imposed by the corporation commissioner was to give to each stockholder an option to buy a pro rata share of the new stock. Having such an option, it was wholly proper for the appellants to seek to prove that the respondents did not exercise it and did not demand delivery within a reasonable time as required by section 1756, Civil Code. It is sufficient to say that the evidence designed to establish these defenses was improperly denied admission.

[11-16] Under the fourth point mentioned it was competent for these appellants to show the acts of the respondents tending to prove that they ratified the transaction and accepted the benefits thereof without protest. Respondents planted their case firmly on the strict wording of the permit providing that a waiver of the right to purchase must be in writing. Now, if no express waiver of this right could be made unless in writing, the same result might have been reached by a ratification. Herein arises the important distinction between those corporate acts which are ultra vires and those which are merely irregular. Generally speaking, those acts which are wholly beyond the corporate powers are void and cannot be ratified by any subsequent act of the corporation. But when an act is merely irregular because the corporate officers have failed to follow some statutory regulation or condition, it would be more proper to say that the act is voidable rather than void. A corporation has power to sell its stock for a valuable consideration. Const. art. 12, § 11. Limitations and conditions upon the manner of sale can be imposed by the Legislature. But, the conditions which the Legislature may exact, it may also excuse. It is wholly competent, therefore, for the Legislature to declare, as it has done, that when these conditions are for the benefit of an individual, and not for the public, the individual may waive them. It is equally true that the breach of such conditions by the corporate officers may be ratified by the corporation. Thus, where corporate stock has been sold through the fraud of the corporate officers, the corporation is estopped, after having received and retained the benefits of the transaction, from claiming that the issue of stock is void. Winters v. Lindsay, 52 Cal. App. 93, 96, 198 P. 43; Smith v. Martin, 135 Cal. 248, 251, 67 P. 779; James Eva Estate v. Oakland B. & M. Co., 40 Cal. App. 515, 520, 181 P. 415; American Wire-Nail Co. v. Bayless, 91 Ky. 94, 15 S. W. 10, 11; Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Car Co., 139 U. S. 24, 60, 11 S. Ct. 478, 35 L. Ed. 55.

Disregarding the sale to Bull, who had full knowledge of all the transactions, but directing our attention solely to the sale to Thompson, we must conclude that the sale to him was not ultra vires in the strict sense. It would be more proper to say that the sale was voidable rather than wholly void because it could have been "validated" by the waiver by the respondents of their privilege to purchase, or by their ratification after the sale, which meets the same purpose.

[17] Under the fifth point mentioned it was competent for these appellants to show that the respondents had taken no steps to restore or offer to restore to the purchaser of the stock the consideration which the corporation had received. To this the respondents answered that they were not in control of the affairs of the corporation and were, therefore, prior to the commencement of the action, in no position to make such an offer. However, the evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing that the corporation, acting through its entire directorate, had ratified the sale and accepted the benefits, and that no offer had been made by the respondents, either directly or through the judgment prayed for, to restore the consideration. The cause must be reversed as to these appellants, with directions for a new trial on all the issues, but as to the appellant Thompson the retrial is confined to the issues heretofore mentioned.

Judgment reversed.

MICHAELS v. PACIFIC SOFT WATER
LAUNDRY et al.
Civ. 7256.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 6, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 5, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1930.

1. Corporations $\S$ 283(2)—Pledgee of stock may be represented in election of officers where pledgor fails to appear (Civ. Code, $\S$ 313).

Where purchaser and pledgor of corporate stock failed to appear at meeting for election of officers, either in person or by proxy to vote such stock, pledgee had right to be represented under Civ. Code, $\S$ 313.

2. Corporations $\S$ 283(3)—Evidence, in action to test validity of election of corporate officers, justified finding favorable to pledgee voting stock, on issue of good faith.

In action to test validity of election of corporate officers, in which question was whether pledgee of stock was legally entitled to vote it, trial court under evidence before it should have made finding favorable to pledgee on issue whether it accepted stock in regular course of business and in good faith as security for loan made in good faith without knowledge of facts affecting validity of stock.

3. Evidence $\S$ 582—Witness' testimony cannot be wholly disregarded, but unless impeached or contradicted or inherently improbable, it must be accepted as true.

General rule is that testimony of witness cannot be wholly disregarded, but that unless it is impeached or contradicted by other testimony, by some presumption, or by an inference deducible from facts proved, or unless it is inherently improbable, trial court must accept it as true.

4. Evidence $\S$ 73—Statutory presumption held evidence of good faith of pledgee voting corporate stock in election of corporate officers (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subds. 1, 19, 20).

In action to test validity of election of corporate officers, presumption against fraud, presumption that private transactions have been fair and regular, and presumption that ordinary course of business has been followed under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subds. 1, 19, and 20, were all evidence of good faith of pledgee of stock; controlling question in case being whether pledgee was legally entitled to vote such stock.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

In the matter of the application of Aaron Michaels and others, stockholders of the Pacific Soft Water Laundry, to test the validity of the election of W. C. Bull and others as directors of the corporation, in which the Pacific Soft Water Laundry was made a party respondent. From an adverse judgment, respondents appeal.

B. O. Tinglof and J. E. Haley, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, Acting P. J.

Petitioners sued under section 315, Civil Code, to test the validity of an election of directors of the respondent Pacific Soft Water Laundry Corporation. Petitioners had judgment from which three separate appeals were taken. The respondents Bull, Fletcher, and Craft joined with the corporation in one appeal, the respondent Thompson appeals in his own behalf, as does the respondent Marine Bank of Ocean Park. All appeals are by stipulation heard upon the same bill of exceptions.

The controversy comes out of the same transactions which were considered in Michaels et al. v. Pacific Soft Water Laundry Corporation, 286 P. 165, this day decided, and arises over the annual meeting of the stockholders of the laundry corporation held on May 19, 1927. At that meeting the Marine Bank of Ocean Park, represented by its agent and proxy, voted 21,500 shares of the capital stock of the laundry corporation as pledgee of the respondent Thompson; the shares of stock having been pledged to the bank as security for the sum of $10,000 which the bank loaned to Thompson. At that election the petitioners Michaels and Pervine and the respondent Craft were elected without controversy. If the stock represented by the bank was legally voted, the respondents Bull and Fletcher would have been elected; but if this stock was not legally voted, then the petitioner Wright would have been elected as a director and the respondents Bull and Fletcher would each have received a tie vote for one position. The trial court found that the stock which had been issued to Thompson was void and that the bank could not vote it at the stockholders' meeting. It therefore gave judgment declaring the directors to be Michaels, Pervine, Craft, and Wright, and directed a new election to be held on account of the tie vote between Bull and Fletcher. The sole question on this appeal is, therefore, whether the Marine Bank was legally entitled to vote this stock.

[1-4] It is conceded that the pledgor Thompson failed to appear at the meeting in person or by proxy to vote the stock. The right of the pledgee to be represented under such conditions is fixed by section 313, Civil Code. Here the bank pleaded that it accepted the stock in the regular course of business and in good faith as security for a loan which was made in good faith, and that it had no knowledge of any facts or circumstances affecting the validity of the stock. In support of the allegation the bank offered the positive testimony of its vice president, who was shown to have been the officer who had conducted all the proceedings relating to the loan. The petitioners offered no testimony of any character to the contrary, but the trial court found the allegation to be untrue. It was an essential part of the defense of the bank in this proceeding that it had received the stock in the ordinary course of business and in good faith and that it was not a party to any of the transactions complained of. What we have said in the other case concerning the rights of an innocent purchaser is applicable equally to the bank in this case, and the rule of Green v. Caribou Oil Min. Co., 179 Cal. 787, 178 P. 950, is determinative. Upon the evidence before it the trial court should have made a finding favorable to the bank upon this issue. The general rule is that the testimony of a witness cannot be wholly disregarded, but that unless it is impeached or contradicted by other testimony, by some presumption, or by an inference deducible from the facts proved, or unless it is inherently improbable, the trial court must accept it as true. 10 Cal. Jur. 1143; Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 410, concurring opinion, 221 P. 191; Sun-Maid Raisin Growers v. Papazian, 74 Cal. App. 231, 239, 240 P. 47. This rule is particularly applicable to a case such as we have here where the issue is fraud or good faith. The presumption against fraud, which approximates the presumption against crime (Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 581, 588, 53 P. 26), the presumption that private transactions have been fair and regular, and the presumption that the ordinary course of business has been followed (section 1963, subs. 1, 19 and 20, Code Civ. Proc.), are all evidence of good faith of the bank in this particular, and a contrary finding cannot stand without some evidence rebutting them.

The two other appeals raise the same questions which have been considered in the other case. As to these appellants the hearing on this petition consisted of a transcript of the record of the former case. As the judgment adverse to these appellants in that case has been reversed for further proceedings, it necessarily follows that the judgment here must be reversed to await the outcome of those proceedings.

Judgment reversed.

STRAUCH v. SAN MATEO JUNIOR COLLEGE DIST. OF SAN MATEO COUNTY.★
Civ. 6904.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 12, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 11, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 8, 1930.

1. Work and labor §10—Recovery could not be had on quantum meruit, where seller furnished heaters for school building without contract complying with statute (Pol. Code § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204).

Where clerk of board of trustees of junior college district placed order with seller for electric heaters to be installed in school building, which heaters were supplied by seller, but no attempt was made to comply with provisions of Pol. Code § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204, value of equipment could not be recovered in action of quantum meruit.

2. Schools and school districts §82(1)—No contractual obligation existed, where seller furnished heaters for school building without contract complying with statute (Pol. Code § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204).

Where clerk of board of trustees of junior college district placed order with seller for electrical heaters to be installed in school building, which heaters were supplied by seller, but no attempt was made to comply with provisions of Pol. Code § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204, no contractual obligation to pay for equipment existed.

3. Schools and school districts ⇨82(1)—Seller may recover value of property furnished school district, where attempt to comply with statutory provisions was made and district has used property.

Where contract or agreement upon which seller seeks to recover price of goods is within scope of powers of school district to make, and an attempt to comply with provisions of statute has been made, and it appears that district has accepted and used property of seller, recovery of value thereof will not be denied on ground that there was failure to conform strictly with procedure prescribed by statute.

4. Schools and school districts ⇨83—Contract made with school district without attempt to comply with statutory requirements is void, and no implied liability can arise thereunder.

When by statute power of board of trustees of school district to make contract is limited to certain prescribed method to which there has been no attempt to comply, contract attempted to be made is void, and no implied liability can arise for benefits received thereunder.

5. Schools and school districts ⇨89—School district's failure to return heaters on demand of seller held not to create liability in conversion, where contract was not made in compliance with statute (Pol. Code, § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204).

Where clerk of board of trustees of school district placed order with seller for electrical heaters to be installed in school building, but contract was not made in compliance with provisions of Pol. Code, § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204, and seller demanded that price of equipment be paid, or, in lieu thereof, that equipment be returned, which demand was refused by school district, judgment for value of property could not be rendered on theory that failure of district to return goods on demand created liability in damages for conversion.

6. Schools and school districts ⇨83—Seller could not recover value received by school district, where no attempt to comply with statute was made (Pol. Code, § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204).

Where clerk of board of trustees of school district placed order with seller for electrical heaters to be installed in school building, and thereafter seller installed heaters, but no contract was made or attempted to be made in compliance with provisions of Pol. Code, § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204, seller could not recover for value of heaters on implied liability arising for benefits received.

7. Schools and school districts ⇨82(1)—Seller furnishing school district electrical heaters without compliance with statutory requirements, where heaters could be removed without damage to building, held entitled to recover property (Pol. Code, § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204).

Where clerk of board of trustees of school district placed order with seller for electrical heaters to be installed in school building, and thereafter seller installed heaters, but no contract was made in compliance with provisions of Pol. Code, § 1612, as amended by St. 1917, p. 204, but heaters could be removed and returned to seller without injuring building, seller held entitled to recover heaters.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by A. Strauch against the San Mateo Junior College District of San Mateo County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

Thomas H. Breeze, of San Francisco, for appellant.

William T. Sweigert, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action to recover the value, or in lieu thereof the possession, of certain electrical heating equipment furnished by the plaintiff to the defendant. The cause was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts. Findings and conclusions of law were expressly waived, and judgment was entered against the defendant for the value of the equipment.

The facts are as follows: About the month of December, 1927, the clerk of defendant's board of trustees placed an order with plaintiff for several electrical heaters to be installed in defendant's school building, the price being $1,950. Thereafter the equipment was installed, and defendant has ever since used the same for heating purposes. The order was given without a previous notice or call for bids by the trustees, and no bid was made by plaintiff. At the time the order was placed and the equipment delivered no emergency existed whereby any repairs, alterations, work, or improvement was necessary to permit the continuance of existing school classes, and the order was not placed or accepted pursuant to the unanimous or any vote of the trustees of defendant, or with the approval of the county superintendent of schools of San Mateo county. At the time the order was placed and accepted defendant did not have an average attendance of one thousand or more pupils as shown by the report of the county superintendent of schools for the preceding school year, and the trustees had not previously secured from responsible bidders three or any estimates of the cost of furnishing such or similar equipment to the district. The parties agreed that the reasonable value of the equipment is the sum for which judgment was entered; that the equipment has not been permanently attached to the school building and could be removed and returned to the plaintiff without injuring the building; that demand that the price of the equipment be paid, or in lieu thereof that the equipment be returned, has been made, which demand the defendant refused; that the refusal is based solely on the ground that the contract for the purchase of the equipment was not entered into in compliance with the provisions of section 1612 of the Political Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 204).

[1, 2] It is admitted that there was no attempt to comply with the provisions of the above section, and that under the general rule in such cases there is no contractual obligation to pay for the equipment, and that the value thereof cannot be recovered in an action of quantum meruit. Reams v. Cooley, 171 Cal. 150, 152 P. 293, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1260. It is urged, however, that the district, having accepted and used the equipment, is estopped from claiming that the statute was not complied with, and also that its refusal to redeliver the property upon demand constituted a conversion. It is therefore contended that the judgment was proper and should be affirmed.

[3-6] It has been held that, where the contract or agreement upon which recovery has been sought is within the scope of the powers of the school district or municipality to make, and an attempt to comply with the provisions of the statute has been made, and it further appears that the district or municipality has accepted and used the property of the plaintiff, recovery of the value thereof will not be denied on the ground that there was a failure to conform strictly with the procedure prescribed by statute. McCormick Lumber Co. v. Highland School District, 26 Cal. App. 641, 147 P. 1183; Warren Bros. Co. v. Boyle, 42 Cal. App. 246, 183 P. 706; Miller v. Boyle, 43 Cal. App. 39, 184 P. 421; Clark v. Conley School District, 86 Cal. App. 527, 261 P. 723. The rule is well settled, however, that, when by statute the power of a board or municipality to make a contract is limited to a certain prescribed method to which there has been no attempt to conform, a contract attempted to be made is void, and no implied liability can arise for the benefits received thereunder (Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am. Dec. 96; Reams v. Cooley, supra; Clinton Construction Co. v. Clay, 34 Cal. App. 625, 168 P. 588; Nash v. City of Los Angeles, 78 Cal. App. 516, 248 P. 689), nor can the same be the subject of estoppel in pais (La Societa Italiana, etc., v. San Francisco, 131 Cal. 169, 63 P. 174, 53 L. R. A. 382; Wichmann v. City of Placerville, 147 Cal. 162, 81 P. 537; Foxen v. Santa Barbara, 166 Cal. 77, 134 P. 1142). Without holding that the district or municipality may not be held liable for damages for conversion in a proper case (43 Cor. Jur., Mun. Corporations, § 1737, p. 960), to permit the recovery of the value of property delivered pursuant to agreements which are void under the statute, where the district or municipality fails or refuses to redeliver on demand, would accomplish in the majority of cases the exact result which, as held in the above decisions, the law forbids (Floyd County v. Allen, 137 Ky. 575, 126 S. W. 124, 27 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1125). And we are of the opinion that the judgment in the present case for the value of the property rendered, on the theory that the failure of the defendant to return the same on demand created a liability in damages for its conversion, cannot under the facts be sustained.

[7] In such cases, however, the plaintiff is not without remedy, as the possession of the property, if it can be removed without injury to other property of the district or municipality, may be recovered (City of Bardwell v. Southern, etc., Works, 130 Ky. 222, 113 S. W. 97, 20 L. R. A. [N. S.] 110; La France, etc., Co. v. Syracuse, 33 Misc. Rep. 516, 68 N. Y. S. 894; Mineralized Rubber Co. v. Cleburne, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 621, 56 S. W. 220; Gamewell Fire Alarm, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles, 45 Cal. App. 149, 187 P. 163), and this has been held to be the only remedy available (Superior, etc., Co. v. School District No. 63, 28 Okl. 293, 114 P. 328, 37 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1054; Moe v. Millard, etc., Dist., 54 Utah, 144, 179 P. 980; Clark v. School Directors of Dist. No. 1, 78 Ill. 474). In the present case, as stated, the parties have stipulated that the equipment has not been permanently attached to the school building and could be returned to the plaintiff without injury thereto, and, further, that the equipment is replaceable.

For the above reasons the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the recovery of the possession of the property described in the complaint.

PEOPLE v. CABERERA.

Cr. 1110.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

March 8, 1930.

1. Assault and battery $\Rightarrow$ 97—Verdict of guilty of assault with deadly weapon held sufficient, though not naming person assaulted or describing weapon.

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, verdict reciting that jury finds defendant guilty of assault with deadly weapon held sufficient, though not giving name of person assaulted or describing weapon used.

2. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 894—Defendant charged with assault with deadly weapon waived any objection to form of verdict by failure to object thereto when returned.

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, defendant by failure to object to form of verdict at time it was rendered held to have waived any objection thereto.

3. Assault and battery $\Rightarrow$ 100—Statute providing for increased punishment for felony while armed with "deadly weapon" and defining latter phrase does not define "deadly weapon" used in statute defining assault with deadly weapon (Pen. Code, §§ 245, 1168).

Pen. Code, § 1168, providing for greater punishment where felony is committed while armed with "deadly weapon" and providing that words "deadly weapon," as used in this section, are defined to include specific named instruments or weapons, held not to define words "deadly weapon" in sense in which those words are used in section 245, defining crime of assault with deadly weapon, but to expressly restrict definition to words used in section 1168.

4. Assault and battery $\Rightarrow$ 97—Defendant's contention in prosecution for assault with deadly weapon that unless verdict described knife, he would suffer heavier punishment held without merit (Pen. Code, § 1168).

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, defendant's contention that under Pen. Code, § 1168, unless verdict shows that knife used in assault had blade shorter than five inches, defendant was bound to suffer heavier punishment than if verdict disclosed facts held without merit, since if enumeration of deadly weapons in section 1168 is to be construed as exclusive, then defendant was in no danger of suffering greater punishment where there was no evidence showing weapon was of kind defined therein, and if enumeration be construed as not exclusive, then it is immaterial that weapon was not described as deadly weapon, since defendant will then be subject to greater punishment regardless of kind of deadly weapon with which he was armed.

5. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1172(1)—Failure to define deadly weapon in prosecution for assault with knife, though erroneous, held not prejudicial (Pen. Code, § 245).

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, under Pen. Code, § 245, failure to give instruction defining deadly weapon, though error, held not prejudicial, since it is matter of common knowledge that knife, when used as instrument with which to stab or cut human being, is deadly weapon.

6. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1170½(5)—Questions on cross-examination of witnesses testifying regarding defendant's reputation, whether they heard defendant had committed acts of violence before assault upon prosecuting witness, held not prejudicial (Pen. Code, § 245).

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, under Pen. Code, § 245, permitting questions on cross-examination of defendant's witnesses testifying as to his reputation for peace and quiet, whether they heard defendant had been guilty of acts of violence prior to assault upon prosecuting witness, held not prejudicial where questions were apparently asked in good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Luz Caberera was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Sam Duker, of Tracy, and D. P. Eicke, of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J.

The defendant was charged with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder B. Poledo. The jury returned a verdict reading as follows:

"We, the jury in the above entitled cause, find the defendant, Luz Caberera * * * guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon."

The defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin. This is an appeal from the judgment.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the verdict is insufficient because it does not give the name of the person assaulted or describe the weapon used by him. The objection is without merit. People v. Gayle, 202 Cal. 159, 163, 259 P. 750; People v. Jochinsky, 106 Cal. 638, 642, 39 P. 1077; People v. Cecil, 72 Cal. App. 565, 568, 237 P. 568; People v. Somsby, 46 Cal. App. 377, 378, 189 P. 456. The defendant waived any objection to the form of the verdict by his failure to object thereto at the time it was returned. People v. Gayle, supra; People v. Chiappelone, 90 Cal. App. 472, 265 P. 976; People v. Cornell, 29 Cal. App. 430, 155 P. 1026.

A witness for the people testified that the weapon which the defendant said he used in making the assault is "a small penknife." The defendant testified that on the day following the assault he "used it to peel onions and potatoes" when he "made breakfast." There is nothing further in the record to show the character of the weapon except that it penetrated the coat and overcoat of Poledo and inflicted "a stab wound in the right chest" and other wounds, causing him to be "very weak, and bleeding very much from a wound above his nose, and another wound on his chest." The knife was introduced in evidence, and from an examination of it the jury could have had no difficulty in determining whether it was a deadly weapon. The defendant testified that the knife was open in his right coat pocket immediately prior to the assault.

Section 1168 of the Penal Code, provides that the minimum imprisonment for the commission of a felony by "a person not previously convicted of a felony, but armed with a deadly weapon either at the time of his commission of the offense, or a concealed deadly weapon at the time of his arrest" shall be seven years, and that "the words 'deadly weapon' as used in this section are hereby defined to include any instrument or weapon of the kind commonly known as a blackjack, slung shot, billy, sand club, sand bag, metal knuckles, any dirk, dagger, pistol, revolver or any other firearm, any knife having a blade longer than five inches, any razor with an unguarded blade and any metal pipe or bar used or intended to be used as a club."

[3, 4] Appellant contends that, under the aforesaid provisions of section 1168, "unless the verdict shows that it was a knife with a blade shorter than five inches * * * the defendant is bound to suffer a heavier punishment than if the * * * verdict disclosed the facts." It is clear that section 1168 does not purport to define "deadly weapon" in the sense in which those words are used in section 245 of the Penal Code, defining the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, but expressly limits the definition to those words "as used in this section." If the enumeration of deadly weapons in section 1168 is to be construed as exclusive, then the appellant is in no danger of suffering the greater punishment provided for by that section, because there is nothing in the record to show that the weapon with which he was armed is of a kind mentioned therein. If such enumeration be construed as not exclusive, then it is immaterial that the weapon is not described other than as a "deadly weapon," because the defendant will then be subject to the greater punishment, regardless of the kind of deadly weapon with which he was armed.

[5] Appellant complains of the court's failure to give the jury a definition of a deadly weapon. While such a definition should have been given, the defendant suffered no prejudice from the failure to give it, because it is a matter of common knowledge that a knife, when used as an instrument with which to stab or cut a human being, is a deadly weapon.

[6] The defendant produced witnesses who testified that his reputation for peace and quiet was good. On cross-examination these witnesses were asked whether they had heard that the defendant had been guilty of acts of violence, naming them, prior to the assault upon Poledo. Appellant contends that the asking of these questions constituted prejudicial misconduct and that it was error to overrule his objections thereto. If the questions were asked in good faith, and there is nothing in the record to show that they were not so asked, then there was no error or misconduct in connection therewith. People v. Gayle, supra; People v. Sieber, 201 Cal. 341, 257 P. 64; People v. Rice, 90 Cal. App. 590, 266 P. 295; People v. Heath, 79 Cal. App. 20, 248 P. 1027; People v. Simons, 70 Cal. App. 143, 232 P. 772.

It clearly appears from the evidence that the defendant is guilty of the offense of which he was convicted, and there is no prejudicial error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: R. L. THOMPSON, J.; PLUMMER, J.

March 14, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 12, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 12, 1930.

1. Corporations $\S$ 617(1)—Deed executed by corporation through officers when corporation was suspended for nonpayment of license tax, recorded for over five years before suit, held sufficient (Civ. Code, $\S$ 400).

Under Civ. Code, $\S$ 400, deed executed by corporation by and through its president and secretary after corporation had been suspended for nonpayment of its license tax, duly recorded in county wherein land was situated for more than five years before commencement of action, had same force and effect as if executed and delivered prior to suspension of corporation.

2. Corporations $\S$ 432(1)—Deed by corporation through officers having same force as though executed when corporation was authorized to transact business is presumed executed by authority of corporation (Civ. Code, $\S$ 400).

Where deed from corporation to another was executed in corporate name by president and secretary, with corporate seal affixed, and had same force and effect as though executed during period when corporation was authorized to transact business as corporation under Civ. Code, $\S$ 400, presumption arose that deed was executed by authority of corporation, and burden was on adverse party to overcome presumption by showing want of authority in such officer to execute instrument as that of corporation.

3. Landlord and tenant ☞199½—Tenant of corporation purchasing land on sale under trust deed by corporation's grantee held not liable for rent after purchase under doctrine of merger.

Where deed executed in name of corporation by president and secretary, with corporate seal attached, conveyed land to grantee, in absence of evidence overcoming presumption that deed was executed by authority of corporation and grantee executed deed of trust and tenant became purchaser of land on sale of land under deed of trust, tenant under doctrine of merger was not liable to corporation for rent after date of execution of deed to tenant.

4. Trial ☞35—Affidavit, contents of which were by stipulation admitted to be true, held properly rejected.

Where matters contained in affidavit were by stipulation of parties admitted to be true, trial court committed no error in rejecting affidavit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Landis Bros. Company against M. Lawrence and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

James F. Peck, of Oakland, Driver, Driver & Tade, of Sacramento, and C. F. Rafferty, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Bradford, Cross & Prior, and R. Platnauer, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover alleged unpaid rent that accrued under a lease of real property executed by plaintiff to defendants Lawrence and Comstock, copartners, doing business under the name of Lawrence & Comstock, and against Alex. F. Forni, to whom said lease was assigned; said Forni having died after the commencement of this action, the executrix of his estate, Nettie L. Forni, was substituted as a defendant in his place and stead.

The lease was executed on June 22, 1914, and was for a term of nine years, four months, and eight days, with a rental of $5,000 a year, $2,500 thereof to be paid on the execution of the lease, $5,000 on October 1, 1914, and $2,500 on the 1st days of June and October in each year thereafter up to and including October, 1922.

Lawrence & Comstock assigned the said lease to said Forni on January 3, 1917, and said Forni took possession of the leased premises and paid the rent on the same up to and including June, 1918. No rent was paid thereafter, nor was any demand made for the payment of the same up to the time of the commencement of this action.

Appellant was organized as a corporation on September 23, 1910, and continued to exist as such until March, 1917, when it was suspended for failure to pay its license tax. Thereafter, on July 2, 1923, upon payment of its license tax and penalties, it was restored to its rights to do business as a corporation, and since then has been, and now is, a duly existing corporation. At the date of the revocation of the right of appellant to do business as a corporation for the nonpayment of the license tax, the three directors were Harry Landis, Charles W. Landis, and Anthony Landis, they being the owners of the entire capital stock of said corporation, each of them owning one-third thereof.

On April 14, 1917, a deed for all of the real estate described in the said lease was executed in the name of said corporation by Harry Landis, its president, and Charles W. Landis, its secretary, to the said Charles W. Landis, with the seal of the corporation affixed thereto. This deed was recorded in Sacramento county records on May 17, 1917, and in the San Joaquin county records on June 13, 1917; these being the two counties in which said land is situated.

On April 30, 1917, the said Charles W. Landis and wife gave their note secured by a deed of trust on said land to H. C. Davey for a loan of $15,000 made to them by him. A portion of this money was used to pay obligations of appellant. Default having been made in payment of said note, the trustees in said deed of trust proceeded to sell said land, at which sale said Alex. F. Forni became the purchaser thereof for the sum of $17,300, and a deed for said land was by said trustees executed to said Forni on August 7, 1918. This deed was recorded in the records of the counties of Sacramento and San Joaquin on the 14th day of August, 1918, and the 13th day of August, 1918, respectively.

On September 13, 1916, the German Savings & Loan Society loaned to appellant $67,500, and on that date appellant executed its note to said German Savings & Loan Society for that sum, and secured the same by a deed of trust on the land described in said lease, the said German Savings & Loan Society having notice at the time of the existence of said lease. On July 19, 1918, the German Savings & Loan Society changed its name to the San Francisco Savings & Loan Society. On August 27, 1923, the last-named corporation assigned the said last-named note and deed of trust to C. L. Culbert.

Appellant ceased paying any interest on said last-named note after June 1, 1918, and thereafter, until the said land was sold in 1923 under said last-named deed of trust, the said interest was paid by the said Forni. The amount of interest so paid by Forni on said note aggregated the sum of $23,625. This was done without any direction from appellant or request that the same should be done.

Appellant having defaulted in the payment of said last-named note, the said land was sold under said last-named deed of trust, and the said Forni became the purchaser thereof for the sum of $68,000, and a deed for said land was executed to him on November 17, 1923, by the trustees named in the deed of trust last mentioned.

It is the contention of the appellant that from and after June 1, 1918, until the expiration of the term of said lease, the said Forni continued to be its tenant, and that the said Forni as such tenant and Lawrence & Comstock, his assignors, are indebted to appellant for the rent which had accrued and remained unpaid at the expiration of said lease. Respondents contend that the said Forni became the owner of the land described in the lease on August 7, 1918, by virtue of the aforesaid trustees' deed executed to him on that date; also that the said Forni acquired title to the said land by prescription. They further contend that, admitting that said Forni continued to be the tenant of appellant until the expiration of the term of said lease, to preserve his rights and interests in said land, the said Forni has been compelled to pay certain interest and taxes that should have been paid by appellant, namely, the interest on the note secured by the deed of trust executed by appellant to the German Savings & Loan Society, amounting to the sum of $23,625, and the taxes assessed against said land from the year 1918 until the sale thereof under said deed of trust, amounting to the sum of $5,987.97, and that the amount so paid by said Forni exceeds the full amount of the rent claimed by appellant in this action.

The validity of the trustees' deed which conveyed the said land to said Forni, under the deed of trust executed by Charles W. Landis, depends upon, and is based upon, the validity of the deed to said land executed by appellant by and through its president and secretary to the said Charles W. Landis.

[1] Appellant contends that this deed is invalid because it was executed after the corporation had been suspended for nonpayment of its license tax and that all of the trustees of said corporation did not join in its execution, that is to say, that Anthony Landis, one of the directors at the date of said suspension, and therefore one of the trustees, did not join with the other two trustees in the execution of this deed, and this contention is supported by the authorities. Civ. Code, § 860; Civ. Code, § 2268; Anthony v. Janssen, 183 Cal. 329, 191 P. 538; Newhall v. Western Zinc Min. Co., 164 Cal. 380, 128 P. 1040. However, this deed was executed by appellant by and through its president and secretary, it was duly recorded in the counties wherein the said land is situated, and prior to the commencement of this action more than five years had elapsed since the dates of said recordation. Therefore, by the provisions of section 400 of the Civil Code, it has the same force and effect as if executed and delivered prior to the said suspension of said corporation.

The said provision of said section 400 of the Civil Code is as follows: "Provided, however, that any deed executed in the name of such corporation by the president or vice-president and secretary or assistant secretary after a dissolution thereof or after a forfeiture of the charter of such corporation or after the suspension of the corporate rights, privileges and powers of such corporation, which deed shall have been duly recorded in the proper book of records of the county in which the land or any portion thereof so conveyed is situated, for a period of five years, shall have the same force and effect as if executed and delivered prior to said dissolution, forfeiture or suspension."

[2, 3] This deed from appellant to the said Charles W. Landis having been executed in its name by its president and secretary, with its corporate seal thereto affixed, and having the same force and effect as though executed during the period when the corporation was authorized to transact business as a corporation, the presumption arises that it was executed by authority of the corporation. 6 Cal. Jur. 686; Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 104 P. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609; Anderson v. Wickliffe, 178 Cal. 120, 172 P. 381. And the burden is upon the adverse party to overcome that presumption by showing want of authority in such officers to execute the instrument as that of the corporation. 6 Cal. Jur. pp. 686, 687. No evidence tending toward overcoming this presumption was produced by appellant. We are therefore of the opinion that the deed executed by appellant by its president and secretary, with the corporate seal attached, conveyed the said land to the said Charles W. Landis, and that the said Forni acquired the title to it by his purchase under the deed of trust executed by the said Charles W. Landis, and that, under the doctrine of merger, respondents were not liable to appellant for rent on said land after August 7, 1918, the date of the execution of the deed to said Forni as aforesaid.

[4] The trial court committed no error in rejecting the affidavit of B. F. Driver, as the matters contained in said affidavit were by stipulation of parties admitted to be true.

In view of the conclusions we have reached, we deem it unnecessary to consider the other grounds relied upon by respondents.

The judgment is affirmed.

PUTMAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

L. A. 11823.

Supreme Court of California.

March 28, 1930.

1. Judges ⇨49(2) — Statements of Judge — Disqualification.

Premature statement of trial judge that certain communication established partnership was not decision, finding, or order, and did not disqualify him.

This was a suit for partnership accounting. Defendant had written to plaintiff that defendant was working for their firm. Judge announced his conclusion that foregoing communication established partnership, and that such would be final holding of court, and that it would be practically useless for defendant to offer any evidence to contrary, and that case had reached stage where referee should be appointed.

2. Prohibition ⇨10(2) — Jurisdiction — Reference — Partnership accounting.

Trial court did not so far exceed jurisdiction in ordering reference for partnership accounting as to be subject to prohibition writ.

3. Partnership ⇨332 — Accounting — Power to order reference.

Court had power to order reference, where complaint alleged partnership and prayed accounting (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 638-645).

Plaintiff alleged defendant misappropriated partnership money while defendant denied existence of partnership and claimed reference should not have been made without giving him opportunity to prove nonexistence of partnership.

4. Partnership ⇨329, 332 — Accounting — Taking testimony — Order of reference.

Stage of proceeding in which to take testimony or to order reference for partnership accounting is not matter of jurisdiction but of order of proof.

5. Prohibition ⇨3(3) — Other remedy — Appeal — Reference.

Questions of powers and errors of referee are reviewable by appeal and not by writ of prohibition.

Petition by Clarence L. Putman for writ of prohibition against Superior Court of State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, and others, which was denied ex parte, and petitioner applied for and was granted hearing in Supreme Court.

Petition denied.

Ben S. Hunter and L. E. Dadman, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Randall & Bartlett, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J.

The petitioner herein applies for a writ of prohibition having for its purpose that of preventing the respondent judge herein from proceeding further with the hearing and determination of a certain action pending in the court over which he presides, and also prohibiting the other respondents herein from proceeding further to carry out the provisions of a certain order made by said judge in said action in the matter of the appointment of a referee therein during an early stage in the trial of said action before said court. The case in question was entitled Sidney F. Brock v. Clarence L. Putman, and was commenced in said court during the month of July, 1929, by the filing of a complaint therein, wherein it was alleged that a copartnership between said Brock and Putman had theretofore been entered into, having for the purpose of its members the "entering into the business of mining, locating and operating mining claims, buying and selling the same, and other business of a like nature." The complaint proceeds to allege the wrongful application by the defendant of certain of the moneys, receipts, and profits of said partnership to his own use and to the injury of the business thereof, the precise amount of which is unknown to the plaintiff; that after repeated requests on the part of said plaintiff for an accounting and repayment of said partnership of the moneys so misappropriated, the defendant has neglected and refused, and still neglects and refuses, to comply with said request or to make said accounting, and threatens to continue to misappropriate the funds of the copartnership to his own use and to sell the properties of the same and deprive the copartnership and plaintiff in said action of the proceeds of such sale, to the great and irreparable injury of both. The prayer of the complaint is that said copartnership be dissolved, and that an accounting be had of the dealings and transactions thereof; that the property of said copartnership be sold and the partnership debts and liabilities paid and the surplus, if any, divided between the plaintiff and defendant according to their respective interests in said copartnership, and for such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises. The defendant Putman answered, denying generally and specifically the existence of any such copartnership, and also denying all of the other allegations of the complaint, and praying that the plaintiff take nothing by his said action. The cause came on for trial in said court and before the respondent judge thereof on the 29th day of August, 1929; whereupon the plaintiff introduced in evidence a certain document, purporting to be a letter from the defendant to the plaintiff, dated April 24, 1928, the essential portion of which reads as follows: "I got the Bull Moose tied up and have a mill ready to ship upon the property. Have it financed. I let Boggs in on it so he would help finance it, so you see I am still working for the Brock and Putman firm. Will have everything working by the time you get home." Upon the introduction in evidence of this document and upon an objection made by the defendant's counsel to the introduction of certain further evidence on the plaintiff's behalf a colloquy occurred between the trial judge and counsel for defendant, during which the trial judge proceeded to announce his conclusion that the foregoing communication established a copartnership, and that such would be the present and final holding of the court in the action, and that it would be practically useless for the defendant to offer any evidence to the contrary. The judge of the court further proceeded to state that the action had arrived at a stage wherein, the court having settled the question that a partnership existed between the plaintiff and defendant, a referee should be appointed to take further evidence in the case upon the issues as to a partnership accounting. These pronouncements on the part of the trial judge were punctuated with objections thereto on the part of counsel for the defendant, but, notwithstanding these, the trial judge continued the further trial of the case, and within a few days thereafter made and entered a formal order appointing the respondent Anne O'Keefe a referee in said action for the purpose designated in said order. The court recited therein: "That the trial of one of the issues of fact in the above entitled matter requires the examination of a long account, and it further appearing that a prima facie showing has been made of the existence of a partnership between plaintiff and defendant, it is therefore ordered that the following matters be referred to Anne O'Keefe as sole referee." The order proceeds to recite a number of matters bearing upon the business and accounts of said purported copartnership, and as to these orders: "That the parties produce before the said referee all books, deeds, papers and writings in their custody or under their control relating thereto, and that they be examined upon interrogatories or otherwise as the said referee shall direct. * * * It is further ordered that said referee report her findings upon the matters referred to prior to the 27th day of September, 1929; and it is further ordered that the trial of the above entitled action be continued until the 27th day of September, 1929, at the hour of 10 A. M., at which time the report of said referee shall be presented to the court, and at which time the parties to the said action may introduce such evidence as they may have regarding the existence of a partnership between plaintiff and defendant and regarding any other issues presented by the pleadings." Upon the making and entry of the foregoing order, the petitioner herein applied to the District Court of Appeal in and for the Second Appellate District, Division 1, for a writ of prohibition, which was denied ex parte by said court, without an opinion, and a petition for rehearing therein having also been denied, without opinion, the petitioner applied for and was granted a hearing in this court, and the aforesaid matter having been heard herein has been submitted for decision.

It is the contention of the petitioner that, since in said action the existence of any copartnership between the plaintiff and the defendant had been denied, the trial court was without jurisdiction at the stage of the trial thereof during which the foregoing colloquy occurred between the trial judge and counsel for the defendant to determine the issue as to whether or not such a partnership as the plaintiff alleged to exist in fact existed, and was also without jurisdiction at that stage of the trial to make and enter its aforesaid order for the appointment of a referee therein without having first accorded to the defendant an opportunity to be heard and to introduce evidence as to the nonexistence of such copartnership. The petitioner further contends that the respondent judge in said action by his aforesaid premature pronouncement of his conclusion that such copartnership had been established, and that such would be his final ruling, had deprived and disqualified himself from exercising any further jurisdiction in relation to the trial of said action. Wherefore he applied for said writ.

[1, 2] It is conceded that the sole question to be determined upon an application for a writ of prohibition is the question of jurisdiction. It would seem to be too plain for further discussion that the attitude, action, and conclusion of the trial court in the aforesaid cause and at the time of the colloquy between himself and defendant's counsel was premature, unwise, and unjudicial. The oral and oracular statement of the trial court upon that occasion did not, however, amount to either a decision, finding, or order, and, as has been well said by this court in the case of Scholle v. Finnell, 173 Cal. 372, 376, 159 P. 1179, 1181: "No antecedent expression of the judge, whether casual or cast in the form of an opinion, can in any way restrict his absolute power to declare his final conclusion in the only manner authorized by law." It does not necessarily follow either that the trial judge disqualified himself thereby to further proceed with the trial of the action, or that in further proceeding therein to the extent of making and entering the formal order for the appointment of a referee therein, and for the continuance of the hearing until such time as the referee might take testimony and report her conclusions upon such matters as were committed to her by the terms of such reference, and in further ordering that upon the presentation of the report of the referee the trial of the action should proceed, during the course of which "the parties to said action may introduce such evidence as they may have regarding the existence of a partnership between plaintiff and defendant and regarding any other issues presented by the pleadings," the trial court so far exceeded its jurisdiction as to subject itself to the process of this writ.

[3-5] The action being one involving issues as to the existence of a copartnership between the parties thereto and as to the propriety and extent of an accounting, it was such an action as would come within the provisions of sections 638 to 645, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provide for references and trials by a referee. Section 638 thereof provides for the order of a reference upon the agreement of the parties filed with the clerk and entered in the minutes. Section 639 thereof provides as follows:

"When the parties do not consent, the court may, upon the application of either, or of its own motion, direct a reference in the following cases:

"1. When the trial of an issue of fact requires the examination of a long account on either side; in which case the referees may be directed to hear and decide the whole issue, or report upon any specific question of fact involved therein;

"2. When the taking of an account is necessary for the information of the court before judgment, or for carrying a judgment or order into effect;

"3. When a question of fact, other than upon the pleadings, arises upon motion or otherwise, in any stage of the action;

"4. When it is necessary for the information of the court in a special proceeding."

It will be noted that the section of the Code quoted places no restrictions upon the trial court as to the time during the pendency of said action when it first acquires jurisdiction to appoint a referee therein. The implication of the section is to the contrary, since subdivision 1 thereof provides that: "When the trial of an issue of fact requires the examination of a long account on either side; in which case the referees may be directed to hear and decide the whole issue, or report upon any specific question of fact involved therein." In the case of Fredendall v. Shrader, 45 Cal. App. 719, 188 P. 580, 582, it was held that the phrase in the foregoing section of the Code, "the whole issue," which by its terms the referee may be directed to hear and decide, refers to "the account, and does not include other issues in the case or issues having no direct or immediate connection with the account." But said case also goes on to decide that as to "the point urged by the appellants that the court was without jurisdiction to order a reference because it had not previously to the making of said order found that the interveners were entitled to an accounting and entered an interlocutory decree adjudging that fact, the answer thereto is that the statute provides for no such preliminary formality. Moreover, the procedure adopted in this case with respect to the order of reference appears to be in accord with the customary practice which has in that particular prevailed in California for many years, and which has received the approval of the Supreme Court," citing Gunter v. Sanchez, 1 Cal. 45, 48; Smith v. Rowe, 4 Cal. 6; Williams v. Benton, 24 Cal. 424; Jones v. Gardner, 57 Cal. 641. In the case last above cited, the court said that, with special reference to the section of the Code here under consideration: "The language of this first subdivision of § 639 of the Code of Civil Procedure indicates that the power of the Court to refer depends upon the pleadings on the one side or the other. The reference is made 'when the trial of an issue of fact' requires the examination of a long account. A reference for such purpose may, under our State Constitution, be made in any equity suit, when either party alleges facts showing an accounting to be necessary." In the case of Fox v. Hall, 164 Cal. 287, 291, 128 P. 749, 751, it was stated that: "The accounting might have been ordered through a reference, or the court might, with or without a preliminary interlocutory order, have proceeded to take and state the account itself (Emery v. Mason, 75 Cal. 222, 16 P. 894), rendering such final judgment thereon as might appear to be proper." The language of this court in the case last above cited would seem to indicate that the conclusion to be arrived at in our solution of the problem before us is that as to the stage in an equity proceeding before the court when it may proceed of itself and in the course of the trial to take testimony in the process of an accounting, or may order a reference for the purpose of taking such testimony, it is, after all, not a matter of jurisdiction, but rather of the order of proof in the particular case. In the present action had the trial court itself proceeded to take such testimony as the plaintiff had proffered, or had required the defendant to produce relative to the accounting, it would seem that the only objection which the defendant might have urged to the taking of such testimony would be that the proper foundation therefor had not been laid by the showing that a partnership relation existed between the parties to the action; and that the trial court in ruling upon such objection held, as it seems to have done, that the document above referred to was sufficient prima facie to show the existence of such partnership, the only remedy of the defendant, assuming such ruling to have been erroneous, would have been by way of appeal. The same principle would seem to apply to the proceedings before the referee, wherein, if the defendant were to be required to produce certain books or other documents, or to testify as to their contents before the referee, he might refuse so to do upon the ground that no sufficient foundation had been laid for such an inquiry into his private affairs; and upon the matter being, by virtue thereof, referred back to the court for its decision, the court would have the same question before it as that which, as above shown, would have arisen upon the hearing as to an accounting immediately before the court; and in that instance also the ruling of the trial court, if erroneous, would be remediable by appeal or by some other appropriate proceeding, but would not be the subject of assault upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to make the ruling complained of in either case. A reference to an equitable action resembles in some of its aspects the procedure and practice for the taking of a deposition before notaries or commissioners, who possess no judicial powers, and whose action determines finally no question of law or fact in the case. All questions touching the powers and the exercise thereof on the part of these lay ministers of justice are for the determination of the trial court in the course of the proceeding before it, and are matters which, if erroneous, are the subject of correction by appeal or other appropriate method, but are not the subject of attack for want of jurisdiction in the court even to err. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the application of the petitioner herein for a writ of prohibition is, to say the least, premature, and that whatever error the trial court may have been minded to commit or to persist in during the trial before it is a matter which may not be the subject of determination by means of the particular writ herein sought.

It is therefore ordered that the petition herein be, and the same is hereby, denied.

HANDLEY v. JOHNSON.
Civ. 6919.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 20, 1930.

1. Evidence $\S$ 157(5) — Agent's authority — Assignment — Parol evidence.

Assignment of insurer's right as subrogee, where automobile was damaged, not being one required to be in writing, extent of insurer's agent's authority could be established by parol.

2. Insurance $\S$ 606(1) — Subrogation — Agent's authority — Extent — Fact question.

Extent of agent's authority to assign insurer's right as subrogee was question of fact.

3. Principal and agent $\S$ 122(1) — Agent's authority — Nature and scope — Agent's testimony.

Agent's testimony is admissible to prove nature and scope of his authority.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 122(2) — Additional findings — Power to make.

Court of Appeals is authorized to make findings in addition to those made by trial court.

5. Insurance $\S$ 606(1) — Subrogation — Agent's authority — Sufficiency of evidence.

Evidence held to show automobile insurer's agent had authority to execute assignment of insurer's rights as subrogee to insured, where his automobile was damaged.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by J. J. Handley against Gail B. Johnson to recover for injuries to plaintiff's automobile. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

F. N. Foley, of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for appellant.

Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

An action to recover for injuries to plaintiff's automobile caused by defendant's negligence.

A trial by jury having been waived, the cause was tried by the court.

Damages were allowed by the court for the alleged cost of towing the automobile to a repair shop and the cost of repairs, a total of $512.05.

Defendant has appealed from the judgment which was entered against him for the above amount. He contends that the finding as to the first item is unsupported; further, that the plaintiff was insured against loss, and that the cost of repairing the car was paid by the insurance company; that the latter consequently became subrogated to that extent to plaintiff's right of action, and that the evidence was insufficient to show that this right was assigned to the plaintiff.

The claim for towage consisted of two items, one for $8 and the other for $9.60. It was stipulated that the first was correct. As to the second, defendant denied that the amount had been expended as claimed, and no evidence on the issue was adduced.

There was offered and admitted in evidence a writing purporting to assign to plaintiff the insurance company's claim against the defendant, but the authority of the person who signed the same to act for the company was not shown. This court, therefore, referred the question to a referee, before whom testimony was adduced by the respective parties. According to the testimony of the person by whom the document was signed he was then in the employ of the company as superintendent of its department of automobile claims, which position he has held for about eight years. He further testified that it was his duty to adjust losses and settle cases, in the course of which he made assignments of claims on behalf of the company. He also testified that he had authority from the company to do so in this and other cases, but whether such authority had been conferred in writing he could not recall.

[1-3] The assignment was not one for which a writing was required by statute; and where such is not the case the extent of the agent's authority may be established by parol (Bergtholdt v. Porter Bros. Co., 114 Cal. 681, 46 P. 738) and, like the existence of the agent's authority, is a question of fact (Grosse-Becker v. Becker, 102 Cal. 226, 36 P. 433; Farnum v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 83 Cal. 246, 23 P. 869, 17 Am. St. Rep. 233). It is also the rule that the testimony of the agent is admissible and competent to prove the nature and scope of his authority. Kast v. Miller & Lux, 159 Cal. 723, 115 P. 932.

[4-5] We are authorized to make findings in addition to those made by the trial court (Kirk v. Culley, 202 Cal. 501, 261 P. 994), and we accordingly find from the above testimony that the agent was authorized to execute the assignment in question for and on behalf of the insurance company.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $9.60, and, as so modified, is affirmed. It is further ordered that each party bear his own costs on appeal.

DAVIS v. CHIPMAN. ★

Civ. 6876.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 14, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 12, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 12, 1930.

1. Contracts ⇨161—All sentences in agreement must be considered together, and attention cannot be confined solely to last sentence.

In construing agreement containing only three sentences, all three must be considered, and attention cannot be confined solely to last sentence as if it were detached and unconnected with first two.

2. Brokers ⇨40—Real estate broker's past services held sufficient consideration to support promise to pay commission.

Services rendered by real estate broker prior to agreement to pay commission if designated party exercised option to purchase held sufficient consideration to support promise to pay.

3. Brokers ⇨42—Agreement relating to commissions for sale of realty secured through agent's "efforts" held to contemplate "negotiation" of sale of property to recover compensation for which agent was required to have license (St. 1919, pp. 1252, 1259, §§ 2 and 20).

Agreement, stating that option to purchase realty was secured through agent's "efforts" and that agent "interested" optionee, and containing promise to pay commission if sale was effected with party whose name and address had been furnished as one with whom agent had been dealing for sale of property, held to contemplate negotiation of sale of property to recover compensation for which agent was required to have license under St. 1919, pp. 1252, 1259, §§ 2 and 20; word "efforts" meaning the same as word "negotiations."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Negotiation; First and Third Series, Effort.]

4. Brokers ⇨75—Commission for securing sale of realty being payable ratably when purchase price was received, agent held only entitled to commission on each installment as collected.

Under agreement providing that commission for procuring sale of realty was to be due and payable ratably and proportionately if, as, and when such purchase price is received by owner, agent held only entitled to commission on each installment as collected.

5. Brokers ⇨42—Real estate broker can recover commissions if he possesses license when commission is earned and payable.

Real estate broker, though not possessing license at time of employment and rendition of services, can recover commission if he possesses such license when his commission is earned and payable.

6. Brokers ⇨86(1)—Facts showing negotiations with prospective purchaser held insufficient to support finding that prospect's name and address with whom agent had been dealing for sale of property was furnished as required.

In action to recover real estate broker's commission, where agreement required agent to furnish owner name and address of purchaser with whom they had been dealing for sale of property, facts showing agent attempted to interest purchaser in syndicate and disinterest him in obtaining property for himself held insufficient to support finding that prospect's name and address had been furnished as required by agreement.

7. Brokers 53—Agent introducing prospective purchaser at latter's request, whereupon purchaser and owner without agent's assistance negotiated sale, held not procuring cause.

Where, after expiration of option to procure purchaser, agent introduced purchaser at latter's request to owner, and purchaser and owner without aid or assistance of agent negotiated terms of sale, agent's efforts held not procuring cause of sale so as to entitle him to commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Harry F. Davis against W. F. Chipman, as trustee of the estate of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal, see 282 P. 992.

W. C. Sharpsteen, Cushing & Cushing, and William H. Gorrill, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fred L. Berry and Dozier & Kimball, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The judgment in the present action and the one in the companion action hereto, entitled Dozier, Jr., v. Chipman, as Trustee, etc., 286 P. 433, were by this court ordered reversed, and thereafter rehearings were granted so as to afford this court an opportunity to consider certain applications filed by the respective parties a few days prior to the date on which said judgments of reversal would have become final. The purpose of appellant's applications was to modify said judgments of reversal by adding a clause thereto directing the trial court to change its conclusions of law so as to conform to the views expressed in the opinions filed by this court and to enter judgments for the defendant in accordance with such conclusions of law; and to that end, if it was deemed necessary, that this court make findings of fact contrary to and in place of those heretofore made by the trial court. Respondents' applications were filed under the authority of rule XXXVIII of the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal and of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, to obtain permission to take additional testimony before this court relating to matters of fact occurring prior to the entry of the judgments in the trial court, which testimony respondents asserted would support said judgments.

After hearing the oral arguments in support of said applications and giving further consideration to the merits of said appeals, we are of the opinion that said applications should be denied, and it is so ordered. And being satisfied with the reasoning and conclusions set forth in the opinions heretofore written by Mr. Justice pro tem. Gray, and filed herein, we adopt the same as the opinions of this court. The one relating to the appeal in the present case reads as follows:

Challenging the sufficiency of the evidence to support certain findings, defendant appeals from a judgment awarding plaintiff one half of the unpaid balance of an agreed compensation (the other half having been assigned to Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., plaintiff in the companion case) for services, which the complaint, in the form of a common count, alleges, and the answer denies, were rendered to defendant, and for which the answer affirmatively alleges plaintiff cannot recover because he was not a licensed real estate broker.

The unquestioned findings picture the transaction between the parties, out of which the present dispute arose, as follows: Simultaneously, defendant executed and delivered to Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., his written option to purchase certain property therein described, within three months, for $250,000, and to plaintiff, his written agreement containing the following pertinent terms: "Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., has requested me to send you this copy of the above Option to Purchase, as he states that such Option to Purchase was secured through your efforts, and that you interested him in the property from a purchase standpoint. I hereby agree, if Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., * * * exercise the above option to purchase * * * to pay you a commission on the sale of the property of ten per cent. (10%) of the purchase price of the same, such commission to be due and payable ratably and proportionately, if, as and when such purchase price is received by me. * * * It is further understood and agreed that, on or before the expiration of said Option to Purchase, both Mr. Dozier and yourself are to furnish me with the complete names and addresses of all parties with whom you are or have been dealing for the sale of said property under said Option to Purchase and that no commission will be due and payable to you except it is effected within one (1) year of said expiration of said Option to Purchase and with one of the parties whose name and address has been previously furnished by one or both of you, and it is further understood that any party to whom a sale of the property is effected through your efforts must be a party with whom there have been no negotiations heretofore in connection with said property." Within the time limited, plaintiff and Dozier, jointly, furnished to plaintiff the names and addresses of persons, including the subsequent purchaser. Plaintiff also, after the expiration of the option, personally introduced to defendant this purchaser and the last two "directly and together conferred respecting the purchase of said property, the conditions and terms of sale of said property and negotiated solely and alone therefor * * * without the interposition or acts of plaintiff. * * * " While these negotiations were pending, plaintiff and Dozier wrote defendant "that we are willing to accept a commission of ten per cent. (10%) of each payment on the purchase price * * * such commission to be payable to us out of and from each payment on the purchase price, if, as and when received by yourself, without interest." Defendant has received the total purchase price of $250,000 in unequal installments over a period of eighteen months. Plaintiff was a licensed real estate broker only during the time when installments totaling $191,506.50 were received. Defendant paid commissions on the first three installments in accordance with the letter without interest, although plaintiff did not then have a license.

The court further found that plaintiff rendered services to defendant, at his request, for an agreed compensation of $25,000, which is due, owing, and unpaid; that plaintiff and Dozier furnished to defendant, in writing, the name and address of the purchaser, as required by the agreement; that plaintiff did not negotiate the terms of the sale or do other than introduce the purchaser to defendant, as a result of which the sale was effected; that a cause of action for the services accrued as each installment was paid; and that such services were rendered, not as a real estate broker, but consisted merely of finding and introducing a purchaser who was ready, able, and willing to purchase. By his claim that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings, defendant squarely presents for decision the question: What services were to be rendered under the agreement? He argues that the agreement employed plaintiff, as a real estate broker, to produce a purchaser, and that, as plaintiff's services were not the procuring cause of the sale, and as he did not have a license as a real estate broker at the time of sale, he cannot recover. In reply, plaintiff takes two somewhat inconsistent positions: (1) That the services to be rendered under the agreement consisted merely of furnishing names and addresses according to its terms and were not such as are performed by a real estate broker; and (2) if such services required a license, he can recover on those installments which were paid when he had such license.

[1-3] The nature and extent of the services for which plaintiff was to be compensated are to be determined solely by an examination of the above-mentioned agreement because a comparison of its terms with those in the letter of Dozier and the plaintiff, acceded to by defendant, when he mailed the first check for commission, clearly shows a modification solely as to interest. In construing that agreement all three sentences must be considered and attention cannot be confined solely to the last sentence, as if it were detached and unconnected with the first two sentences. Cole v. Low, 81 Cal. App. 633, 254 P. 676. The first sentence states that Dozier's option was secured through plaintiff's efforts and that plaintiff interested Dozier in the purchase of the property. The italicized words aptly and appropriately described services to be performed by a real estate broker. Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., 57 Cal. App. 1, 206 P. 653; Ross v. Major, 178 Mo. App. 431, 163 S. W. 880. It is apparent that such services were rendered prior to the agreement. However, such past services were a sufficient consideration to support the promise to pay, if Dozier exercised his option, as contained in the second sentence. Cole v. Low, supra. In the last sentence, defendant promised to pay the commission, if a sale was effected with a party whose name and address had been furnished as one with whom plaintiff had been dealing for the sale of the property under the option and with whom there had been no previous negotiations. The effect of this sentence was not to create a new and independent obligation, separate and distinct from the obligation created by the second sentence, but was intended "to protect plaintiff for his efforts during the life of the contract resulting in a sale not consummated until after the termination of the contract." Wright & Kimbrough v. Dewees, 52 Cal. App. 42, 46, 197 P. 957, 958, Hobson v. Hunt, 59 Cal. App. 679, 211 P. 242. The word "efforts," in the clause "it is further understood that any party to whom a sale of the property is effected through your efforts must be a party with whom there have been no negotiations heretofore," means the same as the word "negotiations." Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., supra. The services contemplated by the agreement, therefore, were the negotiation of the sale of the property to recover compensation for which plaintiff was required to have a license. St. 1919, pp. 1252, 1259, §§ 2 and 20; Kornman v. Nelson, 83 Cal. App. 616, 257 P. 150. The case of Shaffer v. Beinhorn, 190 Cal. 569, 213 P. 960, cited by plaintiff, is not in point, because the court was there not discussing a question of fact, but merely passing upon the sufficiency of a complaint, which contained an allegation expressly negating the statutory definition of a real estate broker.

[4, 5] Since the agreement provided "such commission to be due and payable ratably and proportionately if, as and when such purchase price is received by me" (the defendant), plaintiff was only entitled to a commission on each installment as collected. Arnold v. La Belle Oil Co., 47 Cal. App. 290, 109 P. 815; Miller v. Lerdo Land Co., 52 Cal. App. 662, 199 P. 1073. A real estate broker, although he possessed no license at time of employment and rendition of services, can recover his commission if he possesses such license when his commission is earned and payable. Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 267, 200 P. 55; Wise v. Radis, 74 Cal. App. 765, 242 P. 90. Were it not for the matters to be next discussed, plaintiff would therefore be entitled to a commission on the installments paid while he had such license.

"The duty assumed by the broker is to bring the minds of the buyer and seller to an agreement for a sale, and the price and terms on which it is to be made, and until this is done his right to commissions does not accrue." Sibbald v. [Bethlehem] Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 382 [38 Am. Rep. 441]. * * * If he failed to do that, he is not entitled to the commission, even though he made efforts to sell the property, and first called to it the attention of the party who subsequently made the purchase. * * * Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 512, 17 P. 642, 643. "It is not enough that he contribute indirectly or incidentally to the sale by imparting information which tends to arouse interest, but it is sufficient if it be established that he set in motion a chain of events which without break in their continuity caused the buyer and seller to come to terms, that his efforts constituted the proximate cause of the meeting of the minds of the principals. * * * Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., 57 Cal. App. 1, 206 P. 653; Sargent v. Ullsperger, 54 Cal. App. 384, 201 P. 934. It is necessary for the broker to prove therefore that he was the efficient or procuring cause of the sale; in other words, it must appear that his efforts had to do with the meeting of the minds of the seller and buyer. Webster v. Parra, 72 Cal. App. 639, 237 P. 804. * * * The expression "procuring and inducing cause," as used in the books, refers to the cause originating from a series of events that without break in their continuity results in the prime object of the employment of the agent." Roth v. Thomson, 40 Cal. App. 208, 180 P. 656, quoting approvingly the rule stated in Smith v. Preiss, 117 Minn. 392, 136 N. W. 7, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 820. In any event the question of whether or not the sale is primarily the result of the broker's efforts is one of fact, and the trial court's conclusions thereon will not be disturbed on appeal if there be substantial evidence to sustain them. Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., supra." Bail v. Glantz, 78 Cal. App. 49, 53, 248 P. 258, 259.

[6, 7] The following facts appear, without conflict, in the transcript of evidence: The purchaser had previously attempted to buy the property from a prior optionee. Dozier and plaintiff, within the life of Dozier's option, attempted to interest the purchaser in a syndicate, which they were then trying to form to acquire the property under the option. The purchaser informed them that he was not interested in joining the syndicate but was interested in acquiring the property for his own account. Learning this attitude, they attempted to disinterest the purchaser in obtaining the property for himself. During the option's term, Dozier and plaintiff furnished the name and address of such purchaser, as that of a party with whom they had been dealing for the sale of the property. Obviously the attempt to interest this purchaser in the syndicate and disinterest him in purchasing the property for himself was not dealing with him for the sale of the property, and hence defendant's objection that the evidence does not support the court's finding that such name and address had been furnished as required by defendant's agreement is well taken. After the expiration of the option, plaintiff introduced the purchaser, at the latter's request, to defendant, and, as the court found in accord with the evidence, the purchaser and defendant, without aid or assistance of plaintiff, negotiated the terms of the sale. Measured by the rule stated in the above-cited cases, these facts clearly show that plaintiff's efforts were not the procuring cause of the sale, especially in view of his efforts to disinterest the purchaser. Necessarily included within the court's finding that plaintiff rendered services to defendant at his request is an implied finding that plaintiff's efforts were the procuring cause of the sale, which finding is unsupported by the evidence. Furthermore, this finding is based in part on the agreement which contemplated the services of a real estate broker. As plaintiff's efforts were not the procuring cause, such services were not rendered, and this finding is unsupported in the evidence.

Judgment reversed.

Rehearing Denied April 12, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 12, 1930.

Appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Frank J. Murasky, Judge, in an action for real estate broker's commission. Reversed.

W. C. Sharpsteen, Cushing & Cushing, and William H. Gorrill, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dozier & Kimball and Fred L. Berry, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

In conformity with the views expressed in the opinion this day filed in the companion case hereto, entitled Davis v. Chipman, as Trustee, etc., 286 P. 429, it is ordered that appellant's application to modify the judgment of reversal herein, and respondent's application for an order to take further testimony under the authority of rule XXXVIII of the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, be and the same are hereby denied; and, furthermore, that the opinion heretofore written by Mr. Justice pro tem. Gray and filed herein be adopted as the opinion herein. It reads as follows:

"This is a companion case to 'Harry F. Davis, respondent, v. W. F. Chipman, as trustee of the estate of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased, appellant,' this day decided (282 P. 992). Respondent herein, as assignee, recovered judgment for the other half of the commission involved in the other case. For the reasons stated in the opinion in the other case, judgment is reversed."

It is so ordered.

MORRISSEY v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Civ. 6896.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 18, 1930.

I. Carriers ⇨328(3) — Boarding moving street car — Contributory negligence.

Attempt to board moving street car does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence, but whether it does depends on circumstances.

2. Carriers ⇨347(5) — Boarding moving street car — Negligence — Question of fact.

Whether person attempting to board moving street car while in possession of physical vigor and free from hindrance is negligent is question of fact.

3. Carriers ⇨347(5) — Moving street car — Slackening speed — Invitation to board — Question of fact.

Whether slackening of speed by moving street car is invitation to board car while in motion is question of fact.

4. Carriers ⇨346(1) — Boarding moving street car — Contributory negligence — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Evidence held to support conclusion that man 58 years old, suing for injuries sustained while attempting to board moving street car, was not contributorily negligent.

Evidence showed plaintiff, a vigorous man in full possession of his faculties, signaled motorman, who thereupon slackened speed and brought car almost to standstill, that plaintiff grasped rearmost stanchion used by passengers in boarding car with his left hand, and reached right to grasp other, and that, when in act of placing right foot on step, car suddenly and violently lurched forward.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Robert A. Morrissey against the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Walter A. Dold, Chief Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thomas S. Molloy, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff, a man about fifty-eight years of age, was injured while attempting to board a moving street car of the Municipal Railway of San Francisco. The accident occurred about noon on April 19, 1926, on Balboa street at a point where the cars usually stop. The plaintiff testified that he signaled the motorman, who thereupon slackened speed so that when the rear step came abreast of plaintiff the car was moving so slowly as to be nearly at a standstill; that he grasped with his left hand the rearmost stanchion used by passengers in boarding the car, and reached his right hand toward the stanchion on the right-hand side of the step, and was in the act of placing his right foot upon the step when the car was suddenly and violently propelled forward, causing him to be thrown to the track in the rear of the car.

There was conflicting evidence as to how the injuries occurred, but the trial court found in accordance with plaintiff's version of the affair.

[1-4] Defendant contends that the way plaintiff attempted to board the car constituted contributory negligence.

An attempt to board a moving street car does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence. Whether it is such depends upon the circumstances (Hart v. Fresno Traction Co., 175 Cal. 489, 167 P. 885; Finkeldey v. Omnibus Cable Co., 114 Cal. 28, 45 P. 996; Nilson v. Oakland Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 103, 101 P. 413); and, if the person making such attempt is in possession of physical vigor and free from hindrance, the question of negligence is one of fact to be determined by the jury or the trial court (Finkeldey v. Omnibus Cable Co., supra), as is also the question whether the slackening of speed is an invitation to board the car (Starkey v. Market Street Railway Co., 90 Cal. App. 249, 265 P. 839). While the manner in which a passenger boards or alights from a moving car may change what would otherwise be the act of a prudent person into that of a negligent one (3 Michie on Carriers, p. 2253), in the present case the evidence shows that plaintiff was a vigorous man in the full possession of his faculties; and, while he testified that he had not boarded a moving car for twenty years, we cannot say that the way he attempted to board the car in question was under the circumstances negligent. The question was properly one for the determination of the trial court, and its conclusion that plaintiff used due care was fairly supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SAMPSELL et al.*
Cr. 1555.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 11, 1930.

Rehearing Denied March 26, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 10, 1930.

1. Indictment and Information $\S$ 19—Statutory short form indictment held sufficient to state public offense and charge robbery rather than larceny (Pen. Code, $\S$ 951).

Indictment in short form prescribed by Pen. Code, $\S$ 951, for robbery of a branch bank, held sufficient to state a public offense, and to charge robbery rather than larceny.

2. Robbery $\S$ 24(1)—Evidence held to support conviction of first degree robbery.

In trial for robbery of a branch bank, evidence held sufficient to support conviction of robbery in the first degree.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 372(6)—Prosecution may prove crime charged was committed in furtherance of conspiracy to commit series.

On trial for particular crime, prosecution may show that it was committed in furtherance of conspiracy to commit a series of like or other criminal acts, though such evidence proves that accused committed other and distinct crimes in furtherance of common object.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 374—Conspiracy to commit series of crimes, including crime charged, may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

Circumstantial evidence is admissible to prove a conspiracy to commit a series of criminal acts, of which the particular crime charged is one.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 374—Proof parties met and made agreement, or previously arranged plan to execute conspiracy, is unnecessary to prove conspiracy to commit series of crimes.

To prove conspiracy to commit a series of criminal acts, of which particular crime charged was one, it is not necessary to show that parties met and actually agreed to perform unlawful acts or previously arranged a detailed plan for execution of conspiracy, but it is sufficient if circumstances proved satisfy jury of existence of conspiracy.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 424(1)—Evidence of acts committed after crime charged, in furtherance of common design of conspiracy, is admissible.

Since common design of criminal enterprise may extend beyond actual commission of crime charged, evidence is admissible to prove acts committed after, as well as before, perpetration of such crime, if it reasonably appears that they were committed in furtherance of common design.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 736(1)—When common design of conspiracy was accomplished or abandoned, and whether acts committed after crime charged were ordinary and probable effect of such design, are jury questions.

Questions as to when common design of conspiracy was accomplished or abandoned, and whether acts committed after commission of particular crime charged were ordinary and probable effect of such design, are for jury to determine from facts and circumstances of each case, and nature and purposes of conspiracy.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 1159(5)—Jury's findings, supported by any evidence, as to whether acts committed after crime charged were ordinary and probable effect of common design of conspiracy or foreign to object thereof, are conclusive on appeal.

If there be any evidence supporting jury's findings on questions whether acts committed subsequent to commission of crime charged were ordinary and probable effect of common design of conspiracy or fresh and independent products of mind foreign to object of original scheme they are conclusive on appeal.

9. Criminal law §372(6)—Evidence of defendants' conspiracy to commit series of bank robberies, and purchase of firearms after commission of robbery charged, held admissible.

In trial for robbery of branch bank, evidence of defendants' conspiracy to commit a series of bank robberies, and purchase of firearms after commission of offense charged, to resist arrest and prevent seizure of loot, held admissible.

10. Criminal law §1169(2, 5)—Admission of evidence that defendants purchased firearms after bank robbery held not reversible error, in view of overwhelming evidence of their guilt and court's instruction.

Reversal of conviction for admission of evidence that defendants purchased firearms after committing bank robbery charged held not warranted, even if claimed conspiracy to commit series of such robberies ended with commission of that charged, in view of overwhelming evidence of their guilt of such robbery, and instruction to consider evidence of events before and after date thereof, for limited purpose of determining whether conspiracy existed, and offense charged was committed pursuant to common design.

11. Criminal law §1144(15)—Jury must be presumed to have understood and followed court's instructions.

On appeal from judgment on a verdict of conviction, it must be presumed that the jury understood and followed the court's instructions.

12. Criminal law §404(2)—Admission of prosecuting officer's pistol, identified as similar to that used by defendant, and cartridge clip and loader found on defendants' yacht, held not error.

In trial for bank robbery, introduction in evidence of prosecuting officer's pistol, which witness testified was similar to that used by defendant, and magazine or cartridge clip and loader belonging to pistol of such type, which were found on defendants' yacht, held not error.

13. Criminal law §351(10)—Evidence that defendant testified falsely before grand jury as to relevant circumstances held admissible.

In trial for bank robbery, evidence that defendant testified falsely before grand jury as to circumstances relevant to case held admissible; inference being that false testimony was given with preconceived design of misleading and deceiving those whose official duty was to ascertain truth.

14. Criminal law §351(10)—Accused's false declarations for purpose of misleading or warding off suspicion may be proved to show consciousness of guilt.

False declarations by accused for purpose of misleading or warding off suspicion may be proved to show a consciousness of guilt, though not conclusive of guilt.

15. Criminal law §593, 594(1)—Refusal of continuance to procure counsel and absent witnesses' testimony held not error, where counsel appeared and all witnesses desired were present, except one whose deposition defendants made no application to obtain.

No error in refusing defendants a continuance to complete arrangements with counsel and procure testimony of absent witnesses was shown, where attorney with whom they were negotiating appeared and agreed to proceed with trial after conferring with them, jury was then impaneled and case tried without further attempt to urge application for continuance, and all witnesses, whose presence defendants desired, were in attendance and available to them, except one, whose deposition they made no application to obtain.

16. Criminal law §741(2)—Whether defendant was present and aided and abetted in crime is fact question for jury.

Question whether defendant, if present at time and place of commission of crime, aided and abetted therein, or, if not present, advised and encouraged its commission, is one of fact for jury to determine from all circumstances established.

17. Criminal law §552(2)—Defendant's unexplained presence at time and place of crime is evidence of complicity.

Unexplained presence of defendant at time and place of commission of crime may be deemed a circumstance tending to show his complicity therein.

18. Robbery §24(1)—Defendant's unexplained presence at scene of robbery and possession of fruits thereof held to support jury's conclusion that he was principal (Pen. Code, §31).

Evidence of defendant's unexplained presence at scene of bank robbery shortly before its commission and possession of fruits of crime held sufficient to support jury's conclusion that he was a principal within Pen. Code, §31.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Homer R. Spence, Judge.

Lloyd E. Sampsell and Ethan A. McNabb were convicted of robbery in the first degree, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

Leslie D. Summers, Lloyd E. Sampsell, and Ethan A. McNabb, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J.

Appellants were indicted by the grand jury of Alameda county for the robbery of the Dwight way branch of the Bank of America, located on the corner of Dwight way and Shattuck avenue, Berkeley. The indictment charged also that the appellant Sampsell had been previously convicted of robbery and bigamy, and that the appellant McNabb had been previously convicted on two charges of robbery. They pleaded not guilty to the present charge and admitted the prior convictions, and upon trial the jury found them guilty of robbery in the first degree. Following the denial of motions for a new trial they were sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term prescribed by law, and they now prosecute this appeal, jointly, from the judgments of conviction and the orders denying their motions for a new trial.

[1] Appellants first challenge the legal sufficiency of the indictment, contending that it fails to state a public offense; or if a public offense be charged, it is that of larceny and not robbery, and that, therefore, having been found guilty of robbery, they were convicted of a crime with which they were not charged. We find no merit in either point. The indictment is in the short form prescribed by section 951 of the Penal Code as amended in 1927, and is no different in substance from the one considered and sustained in the case of People v. Fallai (Cal. App.) 278 P. 449. Therefore, upon the grounds and for the reasons stated in the decision in that case, we hold that the indictment here conforms to the requirements of the present law.

[2] It is next contended that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict against the appellant McNabb. An examination of the reporter's transcript discloses, however, that this point too is without merit, for it appears therefrom that there is ample evidence, both direct and circumstantial, to support the jury's finding. In substance, it is as follows: About 3 o'clock on the afternoon of June 14, 1929, an unmasked robber armed with a Luger pistol entered said bank, and, after threatening those present, with the pistol forced them to lie down on the floor behind the counters. He then robbed the bank of $405 in gold coin including two $2.50 pieces, between seven and eight thousand dollars in currency, a small amount of silver coin, travelers' checks issued by the American Express Company and by the Bank of Italy amounting to $9,000, and a number of bank checks payable to and indorsed by a laundry company, together with the deposit tags for said checks made out in the name of said company. The gold coin was contained in a small metal "barrel" bank and was kept in a tin "cash" box in the vault. The "barrel" bank and the tin box were also taken. After gathering up the property mentioned the robber rushed out of the front door of the bank, along the sidewalk for about 100 feet, entered a waiting automobile, and escaped. Shortly before the robber entered the bank, a strange man was seen by one of the bank employees, standing outside of the bank peering curiously through the windows into the bank, and because of the man's peculiar and suspicious actions the bank employee carefully scrutinized his features. Four days later, and on June 18th, appellants were arrested in an apartment which they were occupying jointly in a Leavenworth street apartment house, in San Francisco; and Sampsell was positively identified by several people who witnessed the robbery, both from within and without the bank, as the man who robbed it, and McNabb was positively identified by said bank employee as the man who was peering through the bank windows. The evidence further shows that appellants had been living in said apartment since June 12th under the fictitious names of Summers and Meline, and that their arrest took place under the following circumstances: The police detectives entered the apartment while appellants were absent, and soon afterwards a young woman walked in, representing herself to be Mrs. Summers, and while the detectives were interrogating her McNabb unlocked the door at the entrance of the apartment and came in. He refused to state whether or not his name was Meline, but Mrs. Summers stated in his presence that it was. He was then placed under arrest. When he entered the apartment he was carrying a bundle which the detectives unwrapped, and it was found to contain a Winchester rifle and a Maxim silencer. He was armed also with a Colt automatic pistol, fully loaded, which he carried in the front pocket of his trousers, and he had on his person between twelve and thirteen hundred dollars in currency. Shortly after the arrest of McNabb, Sampsell appeared at the door of the apartment and was placed under arrest. He too was armed with a loaded automatic pistol, which he carried concealed beneath his clothing, and he had on his person $250 in currency. Upon searching the apartment, in the presence of appellants and the woman, the detectives found all the loot which had been stolen from the bank except a portion of the currency. They found the tin cash box, the small metal "barrel" bank, all of the gold coin including the two $2.50 pieces, all of the travelers' checks, between three and four thousand dollars in currency which was still bound with the bank's wrappers bearing the initials of the manager of the bank, and all of the laundry checks and deposit tags. They also found a "Defiance" gas rifle, loaded with four gas shells and two extra gas shells; a box of Luger automatic pistol cartridges loaded with "dumdum" bullets, and a box of rifle shells. At the trial appellants asserted an alibi, claiming that they were in San Francisco on the day of the robbery, but it was contradicted and shown to be false in several respects, and it was also shown that the appellant McNabb had made a number of contradictory statements in connection with other material matters. Numerous additional circumstances disclosed by the evidence tending to establish McNabb's guilt might be pointed out, but it would seem that the foregoing is more than sufficient to demonstrate that the verdict against him was not wanting in evidentiary support.

At the outset of the trial, the district attorney stated that he intended to prove that several weeks prior to the perpetration of the crime, for which appellants were then on trial, they entered into a conspiracy to commit a series of bank robberies, and to divide the loot received from such enterprises, and to arm themselves for the purpose of resisting arrest and preventing seizure of the loot they stole; and, in support of such theory, and as a part of its case, the state introduced evidence as to the action and conduct of appellants both before and after the robbery of the Dwight way bank. Summarized, the salient features of such evidence were as follows: Appellants, while serving time in the penitentiary and in prison road camps, were friends and companions, and, after their release from prison, they lived together in Seattle with the woman posing as Sampsell's wife. Early in April, 1929, all three came to San Francisco and rented an apartment from April 8th to April 29th, during which time and on April 17th the College avenue branch of the Oakland Bank, located on College avenue in Berkeley, was robbed, and besides having appellants identified as the perpetrators of that crime, it was shown that the robbery was executed in the same manner and at the same time of the day as the robbery of the Dwight way bank was perpetrated; that on April 25th, under fictitious names, appellants and Mrs. Summers fled to Long Beach, and after remaining there at one of the leading hotels for a few days, they returned separately to San Francisco and registered at one of the principal hotels, and within a few days thereafter departed for Seattle, Sampsell and Mrs. Summers traveling by airplane; that soon after their arrival in Seattle they purchased a sea-going "gas" yacht, obtained limited navigators' licenses and cruised back to San Francisco, arriving at the yacht harbor on June 12th, and two days later robbed the Dwight way bank. On the day following the latter robbery, McNabb purchased from an arms company in San Francisco the "Defiance" gas rifle, the gas shells, Winchester rifle and silencer, and two Colt automatic pistols which were subsequently found in their possession. Appellants contend, however, that the admission of all of such evidence, and the argument made by the district attorney to the jury based thereon, and the instructions given by the court upon the subject of conspiracy constituted prejudicial error.

[3-8] The law is definitely settled that upon the trial of an accused for the commission of a particular crime, the prosecution may show as a part of its case that such crime was committed in furtherance of a conspiracy to commit a series of like or other criminal acts (People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 426, 165 P. 555; People v. Arnold, 199 Cal. 471, 250 P. 168), and the fact that such evidence may prove that in furtherance of the common object of the conspiracy the accused committed other and distinct crimes does not render such evidence inadmissible. People v. Zimmerman, 3 Cal. App. 84, 84 P. 446; People v. Anderson, 59 Cal. App. 408, 211 P. 254. Furthermore, such conspiracy may, and of necessity invariably must, be proved by circumstantial evidence for, as the courts have said, it is not often that the direct fact of an unlawful design which is the essence of a conspiracy can be proved otherwise than by the establishment of independent facts, bearing more or less closely or remotely upon the common design (5 Cal. Jur. 521); and it is not necessary to show that the parties met and actually agreed to undertake the performance of the unlawful acts (People v. Schmidt, supra), nor that they had previously arranged a detailed plan among them for the execution of the conspiracy (People v. Sartori, 43 Cal. App. 304, 184 P. 879). But, the question as to the existence of the conspiracy being one of fact, it is sufficient if the circumstances proved satisfy the jury, leaving the weight and sufficiency of the evidence to the triers of the questions of fact. People v. Schmidt, supra. Moreover, it is held that the common design of the criminal enterprise may extend in point of time beyond the actual commission of the act constituting the crime for which the accused is being tried; and that consequently evidence is admissible to prove acts committed after (Hollingshead v. State, 21 Okl. Cr. 306, 207 P. 104), as well as before (People v. Arnold, supra), the perpetration of the crime for which the accused is being tried, provided, of course, that it reasonably appears that such acts were committed in furtherance of the common design of the conspiracy. And the questions as to when the design is accomplished or abandoned, and whether the acts proved are a part of the design of the conspiracy are also for the jury to determine from the facts and circumstances of each case, and the nature and purposes of the conspiracy. In other words, it is for the jury to say from all the evidence before it whether or not the acts committed subsequent to the commission of the crime are the ordinary and probable effect of the common design, or whether they are a fresh and independent product of the mind outside of and foreign to the object of the original scheme; and if there be any evidence to support the jury's findings on any of the foregoing questions its determination is conclusive on appeal. See People v. Lorraine, 90 Cal. App. 317, 265 P. 893 and cases therein cited.

[9-11] In view of the foregoing legal principles, it seems manifest that in the present case the trial court was justified in receiving the evidence relating to the asserted conspiracy, also as to the circumstances attending the arrests; and, that being so, it follows that neither the argument of the district attorney to the jury, based on such evidence, nor the instructions of the court upon the subject of conspiracy, constituted error. Even assuming, as appellants contend, that the conspiracy, if any there was, ended at the time of the commission of the robbery of the Dwight way bank, and that consequently the evidence as to the purchase of the firearms thereafter was erroneously admitted, a reversal of the judgment upon that ground is not warranted, for, as will be observed, aside from all the rest of the proof in the case, the evidence relating to the robbery for which appellants were indicted and tried is overwhelming in establishing their guilt thereof; and under such circumstances it cannot be reasonably maintained that the verdict finding them guilty of such crime has resulted in a miscarriage of justice, in which event only is a reversal of a judgment justified. Moreover, and in this connection, it should be stated also that the court was careful to instruct the jury that appellants were "on trial solely for the offense charged in the indictment, to-wit: robbery alleged to have been committed on June 14, 1929, as set forth in the indictment"; and were "not on trial for conspiracy nor for any offense other than the offense charged in the indictment"; and that, although evidence was received as to events happening before and after the 14th day of June, such evidence was to be considered by the jury for the limited purpose of determining whether a conspiracy existed between appellants to commit a series of bank robberies, to protect undivided loot secured therefrom, and to arm themselves for the purpose of preventing arrest; and of determining also whether the offense for which they were being tried was committed in pursuance of the common design of such conspiracy. It must be presumed that the jury understood and followed such instructions (People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 576, 114 P. 48, 54); and, if it did, its verdict was reached in a fair and legal manner.

Appellants complain also of the giving of several instructions. Some relate to the law of conspiracy and others to the duties of jurors generally. The objections urged are untenable, and in our opinion do not possess sufficient merit to call for a discussion of the instructions separately. In this connection it may be stated that we have examined the entire charge and are convinced that the jury was fully, fairly, and clearly advised upon all legal principles pertaining to the case.

[12] The evidence shows that the robbery of the College avenue bank on April 17th was accomplished with the aid of a Luger automatic pistol; and an employee of the Dwight way bank, named Faust, testified that a pistol was used by Sampsell in robbing the latter bank; but not being familiar with firearms, the witness was unable to specify the type of pistol used. In order, therefore, to establish such fact the prosecution displayed at the trial, and afterwards introduced in evidence, a Luger automatic pistol, which the district attorney stated belonged to one of the prosecuting officers; and upon exhibiting the pistol to the witness he testified that it was similar to the weapon used by Sampsell on the occasion mentioned. A week after appellants were arrested the police officers found on appellants' yacht a magazine or cartridge clip, and loader, belonging to a Luger automatic pistol, and these articles, too, were introduced in evidence. Appellants contend that the above proceedings and the introduction in evidence of the articles mentioned was error. We are unable to agree to such contention. At the time the pistol was produced it was definitely stated that the same was being used merely for the purpose of illustration. And, as to the articles found on appellants' yacht, it was shown that up to the time of their arrest they occupied the yacht part of each day and night, and therefore the objection that the articles found were left there by some one else went rather to the weight than to the admissibility of the evidence.

[13, 14] Nor are we able to sustain appellants' contention that the court erred in permitting the prosecution to show that the appellant McNabb testified falsely before the grand jury as to circumstances relevant to the case. As held in People v. Peete, 54 Cal. App. 333, 202 P. 51, false declarations made by an accused for the purpose of misleading or warding off suspicion, though not conclusive of guilt, may, nevertheless, strengthen the inference arising from the facts; and, therefore, proof of such false and fabricated statements is admissible on the same theory that evidence of flight and concealment is admissible, to show a consciousness of guilt. See, also, People v. Cole, 141 Cal. 88, 74 P. 547; People v. Garcia, 83 Cal. App. 463, 256 P. 876. Here it may be fairly inferred that the false testimony was given before the grand jury with the preconceived design of misleading and deceiving those whose official duty was to ascertain the truth.

[15] Appellants claim also that the trial court refused to grant them a continuance, and, in so refusing, committed error. It appears that the attorneys retained by appellants in the beginning, and who represented them until after the case was set for trial, withdrew a few days prior to the date of trial, and that thereupon appellants accepted the services of the public defender. On the morning of the trial appellants asked permission to terminate the services of the public defender and to file and present in their own behalf a motion for a continuance upon the ground that they had been unable to complete arrangements with other counsel with whom they had been negotiating, and upon the additional ground of the absence of certain witnesses. After considerable discussion the attorney with whom appellants had been negotiating appeared in court, and after conferring with appellants agreed to proceed with the trial of the case. Thereupon, and without any further attempt being made by appellants to urge the application for continuance, the court proceeded with the impanelment of the jury and the trial of the case. It further appears that all of the persons, whose presence at the trial appellants desired as witnesses, were in attendance during the trial and were available to appellants, except one who was a barrister and solicitor in Vancouver, and appellants made no application at any time to obtain his testimony by deposition. Under the circumstances stated, no error has been shown.

[16-18] Appellant McNabb makes the further contention that even assuming that he was at the scene of the robbery shortly prior to its commission, peering through the bank windows as testified by the witness Faust, such fact alone does not prove that he aided or abetted in the commission of the crime, and that therefore he cannot be held to be a principal in its commission. Throughout the trial, and in his testimony before the jury, he insisted he was not in Berkeley at all on the day of the robbery; and, having so testified, the prosecution was deprived of any opportunity to cross-examine him as to his purpose in being there and acting in the manner described by said witness. However, assuming that despite the state of the record above set forth he may now urge this defense for the first time on appeal, we are convinced that it is not maintainable for the following reasons; the question as to whether or not a person who is shown to have been present at the time and place of the commission of the crime has aided and abetted therein, or, not being present, has advised and encouraged its commission, is one of fact for the jury to determine from all the circumstances established (People v. Wilson, 93 Cal. App. 632, 269 P. 951; People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 92 P. 861; People v. Wilson, 135 Cal. 331, 67 P. 322; People v. Woodward, 45 Cal. 293, 13 Am. Rep. 176); and if he was present and his presence be unexplained, such fact may be deemed a circumstance tending to show complicity in the crime (People v. Woodward, supra). Here the jury, by its verdict, declared that he was at the scene of the crime, which leaves his presence there unexplained; therefore such fact, coupled with the additional evidence showing possession of the fruits of the crime, was amply sufficient to support the conclusion reached by the jury that he was a principal within the meaning of section 31 of the Penal Code. The remaining points raised by the appeal are not of sufficient importance to require special attention, all being without merit.

The judgments and orders appealed from are affirmed.

In re NELSON'S ESTATE.
Civ. 4036.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 20, 1930.

1. Husband and wife ⇨264—Community interest — Evidence — Quantum of proof.

One asserting community interest in property has burden to establish his claim by preponderance of evidence.

2. Husband and wife ⇨264—Community property — Bank deposit — Joint account.

Fact that money was originally deposited in joint names of husband and wife does not conclusively determine bank account was community property.

3. Joint tenancy ⇨6 — Joint bank account — Husband and wife — Rights of survivor.

Title to bank account payable to either husband or wife or survivor vests in survivor at death of either, regardless of which one originally held title.

4. Husband and wife ⇨264 — Community property — Source — Uncertainty.

Uncertainty regarding source of personalty listed in inventory of deceased wife's estate does not require such items to be considered community property.

5. Husband and wife ⇨249—Community property — Separate property — Subsequently acquired.

Property acquired by wife after marriage, except that acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, is deemed community property (Civ. Code, § 162).

6. Husband and wife ⇨49½(7)—Voluntary conveyance — Gift — Presumption — Separate property.

Absent fraud, undue influence, or evidence to contrary, presumption exists that voluntary conveyance from husband to wife is intended as gift which wife takes as separate property (Civ. Code, § 158).

Civ. Code, § 158, provides, in substance, that husband or wife may enter into engagement or transaction with other or with any other person respecting property which either might if unmarried.

7. Husband and wife ⇨262(1) — Community property — Presumptions — Purchase price — Husband's money.

Absent evidence showing intention that property should become community, it will be deemed separate property of wife to whom it was conveyed, notwithstanding purchase price was partly paid by husband and community funds.

8. Husband and wife ⇨249 — Conveyance to wife — Husband's knowledge and consent — Separate property.

Conveyance from third party to wife with husband's knowledge and consent constitutes such realty wife's "separate property" (Civ. Code, § 164).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Separate Property," see Words and Phrases.]

9. Husband and wife ⇨249 — Conveyance from third party — Intention — How inferred.

Intention that realty conveyed to wife should be separate property must be inferred from surrounding circumstances, declarations, and conduct at time of transfer.

10. Husband and wife ⇨262(1) — Community property — Conveyance to wife — Separate property — Presumption.

Conveyance to wife with husband's knowledge is presumptively gift, absent fraud or undue influence, and therefore separate property.

11. Husband and wife ⇨137(1) — Wife's separate property — Management by husband — Effect.

Fact that husband managed operations on wife's ranch held not to destroy wife's right thereto as her separate property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Annie D. Robertson Nelson, deceased. From a decree directing partial distribution, the heirs of decedent's deceased former husband appeal.

Affirmed.

J. F. Coonan, of Eureka, for appellants.

Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for respondents.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a decree of partial distribution. The appellants as heirs of a former deceased husband of Annie D. Robertson Nelson, deceased, claim they are entitled to participate in the distribution of said estate under subdivision 8 of section 1336 of the Civil Code.

Jonathan Robertson was employed as a farm hand by Mr. Dale, the father of said deceased, at $30 per month. Mr. Robertson and Annie Dale were married June 11, 1891. There were no children born as the issue of this marriage. For a period of time they leased upon shares the Dale ranch in Humboldt county. Their income from this farm was small. Robertson had no other source of income or means so far as the record discloses. Shortly before Annie Dale's marriage to Mr. Robertson, she inherited about $3,000 from the estate of an old gentleman by the name of Grinnell whom she had nursed during his last illness. After her marriage to Mr. Robertson, she was given $1,000 by her father. In 1912 she was given by her father $10,000 additional upon the sale of his 640-acre tract of timber land. At the death of her father in 1916, she inherited the further sum of about $9,000. In 1897 she purchased the valuable Walker ranch in Humboldt county, taking the title deed in her own name. As a part of the purchase price, she executed a mortgage upon this ranch to her father for $4,000, which was subsequently released. This ranch was operated for several years by the joint efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Robertson. Sometimes she transacted the business affairs incident to the management of the farm and sometimes he looked after the business. Once he executed a memorandum lease of this farm in his own name without her signature. The farm, however, was always retained in her name alone. She paid all the taxes on this property. This ranch became quite valuable.

The evidence indicates that Mrs. Robertson acquired in the course of a number of years notes, stocks, bonds, and money in bank amounting to a considerable sum. There is no definite evidence that Jonathan Robertson ever acquired any specific property with the exception of some lots of uncertain value. In 1914 he was stricken with paralysis, and and gradually became helpless, until it was necessary to move him about in a wheel chair. March 23, 1914, he executed and delivered to his wife deeds of conveyance to these lots standing of record in his name, which were situated in Brookdale and Hydesville, Humboldt county.

The history of the existence of several different bank accounts standing in the names of the spouses during their married life is revealed by the evidence. At first the record of these bank accounts appeared in the name of "J. F. Robertson or Annie Robertson." In one of these accounts there was deposited $7,000 in Liberty Loan bonds "for safe-keeping." Before the death of Jonathan Robertson, these bank accounts had been closed, with the exception of two of them, which were changed during Mr. Robertson's lifetime to "Annie Robertson or J. F. Robertson, or the survivor." Mr. Trollnes, the manager of the Home Savings Bank of Eureka, testified regarding the record of this account, "The account is (in the names of) Annie Robertson or J. F. Robertson, payable to either survivor." There remained in this account after the death of Mr. Robertson a balance of $10,204.51, which was withdrawn upon the check of Mrs. Robertson May 7, 1924. There was another account in the Fortuna bank which was carried in the names of "J. F. Robertson or Mrs. J. F. Robertson." Mr. Newell, an officer of that bank, testified that this account was also changed to a joint and survivorship account before the death of Mr. Robertson.

The inventory which was filed in this estate shows the possession of notes, stocks, bonds, money in bank, and personal effects of the total appraised value of $24,780.81. It is contended by the appellants that, with the exception of the first three items which appear consisting of bonds and cash in bank amounting to the sum of $8,999.57, the respondents failed to account for the source of the funds with which the remaining notes, bonds, and personal property were acquired.

Jonathan Robertson died February 2, 1922. His estate was never probated. Annie Robertson married William Nelson in June, 1926. She died intestate June 30, 1927, leaving surviving her as her only heirs William Nelson, her husband, two sisters and a brother, all of whom joined in the petition for partial distribution. The brothers and sisters of Jonathan Robertson contested this petition and prayed that they be permitted to participate in partial distribution of this estate on the theory that the estate of their deceased brother owned a community interest in the property of Annie D. Robertson Nelson, deceased.

The court found that the contestants were not heirs of Annie Robertson Nelson, deceased, and were therefore not entitled to participate in her estate, and that the estate of Jonathan Robertson had no community interest in said estate.

[1] It would be an arduous task to attempt to follow the intricacies of the numerous business transactions of Mr. and Mrs. Robertson through a period of thirty-one years of married life. It is sufficient to say that the evidence satisfactorily shows that Jonathan Robertson was without means when he was married, and that, beyond the cost of their living, he never succeeded in accumulating any specific property except the lots which he voluntarily deeded to his wife shortly before his death. Upon the contrary, it satisfactorily appears that all of the money with which the spouses secured their accumulation of money, stocks, bonds, notes, and real property, except as hereinbefore stated, came from gifts and legacies to Annie Robertson Nelson and which therefore became her separate property. We are of the opinion that the findings of the court to the effect that the estate of Jonathan Robertson had no community interest in the property of this estate, and that the contestants are therefore not entitled to participate in the distribution of the estate, is amply supported by a preponderance of the evidence. The burden is on one who asserts a community interest in property to establish his claim by a preponderance of the evidence.

[2] The fact that money was originally deposited in a bank in the joint names of Mr. and Mrs. Robertson does not conclusively determine the title thereto, nor necessarily signify that it was community property. In 4 California Jurisprudence, 199, § 89, it is said: "Neither does the separate property of the wife become joint property, with a right of survivorship, merely because of a deposit in a bank in the name of the wife and her husband, in the absence of evidence respecting the purpose of making the deposit or the circumstances under which it was made, for such a form of deposit may be entirely consistent with the desire on the part of the wife to give her husband mere authority to withdraw money from the bank for her from time to time as she might need it." Denigan v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, 127 Cal. 137, 59 P. 389; Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Clark, 81 Cal. App. 546, 254 P. 306.

[3] When a joint account of a husband and wife is changed with the knowledge and the consent of the parties so that it becomes payable to either "or the survivor," the title to that portion of the account which remains at the death of one spouse absolutely vests in the survivor, regardless of which one originally held title to the money. 4 Cal. Jur. 195, §§ 87, 88; 3 R. C. L. 527, § 155; Estate of Gurnsey, 177 Cal. 211, 170 P. 402; Conneally v. San Francisco S. & L. Society, 70 Cal. App. 180, 232 P. 755. In the present case the evidence satisfactorily supports the assumption that it was the intention of the spouses to vest the title to the bank accounts in the survivor. It follows that, regardless of whether Jonathan Robertson may have held a community interest in these accounts during his lifetime, that interest terminated at his death, and Annie Robertson Nelson, as the survivor, became vested with the exclusive title thereto.

[4, 5] Even though it be true that the testimony fails to show the times when many of the items of personal property which are listed in the inventory were acquired, or the source of the revenue from which they were derived, it does not necessarily follow that therefore these items must be deemed to be community property. Our attention is called to no evidence which shows that they were acquired by the spouses during their marriage. The appellants have failed to sustain the burden placed upon them in this regard. Jonathan Robertson died in February, 1922. His wife married Nelson in 1926, and she died June 30, 1927. So far as the record discloses, all of these items may have been acquired from the unchallenged separate funds of Mrs. Annie Robertson Nelson after the death of her first husband. Indeed, it may be true that these items were acquired after her marriage with Nelson, with the exception of two small notes which she secured after her first husband's death in March, 1924, and December, 1925, respectively. It is true that property acquired by a wife after marriage, except such separate property as comes within the definition of section 162 of the Civil Code, is deemed to be community property. But this does not necessarily include such property as is acquired after the death of her husband, nor after she has remarried. Of course, under such circumstances, the property may still belong to the community interests, but to establish that fact it would require evidence that it was purchased with community funds. No such showing appears in the present case. There is no sufficient evidence upon which to base a finding that any of the personal property which is described in the inventory is community property.

[6] Regardless of the source of the funds from which the lots were purchased which Jonathan Robertson voluntarily deeded to his wife in 1914, those instruments effectively conveyed to her an absolute title to the property. In the absence of fraud, undue influence, or evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that a voluntary conveyance of real property from a husband to a wife is intended as a gift to which she takes title as her separate property. Section 158, Civ. Code; 5 Cal. Jur. 349, § 30; 13 Cal. Jur. 850, § 49.

[7-11] So also with respect to the purchase of the Walker ranch, the title to which was taken in the name of Annie Robertson. The weight of the evidence indicates that this ranch was purchased with the separate funds of the wife. But appellants contend that some of his money was contributed to the purchase price and that community funds were subsequently applied upon the purchase price of the ranch. Even though this be true, in the absence of evidence that it was the intent of the spouses that it should become community property, it will be deemed to be the separate property of the spouse to whom it is deeded. If a conveyance of real property is made from a third party to the wife with the husband's knowledge and consent, the property is deemed to be her separate property. Section 164, Civ. Code; Stafford v. Martinoni, 192 Cal. 724, 221 P. 919; Donze v. Donze, 88 Cal. App. 769, 264 P. 294; 13 Cal. Jur. 854, § 50. The intention must be inferred from the surrounding circumstances, declarations, and conduct of the parties at the time of the transfer. Gilmour v. North Pasadena Land Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 P. 1066; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 P. 308; Cohn v. Smith, 37 Cal. App. 764, 174 P. 682. Where the conveyance is made from a third person to the wife with the knowledge of the husband, regardless of whether it is paid for from the community funds or from his separate funds, in the absence of fraud or undue influence, it will be presumed to have been intended as a gift.

Miller v. Brode, 186 Cal. 409, 199 P. 531; Estate of McCauley, 138 Cal. 546, 71 P. 458; Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 358; 13 Cal. Jur. 855, § 50. Nor does it destroy the separate character of the wife's title to farming land even though the husband may conduct much of the business of operating the ranch, or even though he assumed the authority to rent the place by executing a lease in his own name. This effort on his part was unexplained, unauthorized, and futile. The assistance which he rendered his wife in operating the farm is entirely consistent with her absolute ownership of the property on the theory that in so doing he was acting as her agent. Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 358.

In view of the foregoing conclusion that the findings of the court to the effect that the estate of Jonathan Robertson had no community interest in the estate of his wife, it becomes unnecessary to construe the application of subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code, upon which the appellants rely as authority for distribution to them.

The decree of partial distribution is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mono County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Title Insurance & Trust Company against Wallis D. McPherson.

son and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Frank Bryant, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Law & Overholt and R. E. Hobbs, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J.

The plaintiff brought this action to quiet its alleged title to real estate in the possession of the defendants, Wallis D. McPherson and Venita Reche McPherson, his wife. The court found that plaintiff "paid no consideration of any kind or character for any of said property"; that such property "belonged to and was owned by the defendants * * * and one O. F. Brant, now deceased, and that said Wallis D. McPherson and said O. F. Brant were copartners and owned all of said real property jointly, and that said property was deeded to said plaintiff as trustee and as trustee only for the use and benefit of said copartnership," and that the plaintiff "holds only the naked legal title thereto in trust for the use and benefit of the defendants * * * and the estate and heirs of said O. F. Brant, deceased." Judgment was entered in accordance with the findings, and the plaintiff has appealed.

[1,2] The uncontradicted evidence supports the findings. The plaintiff made no effort to meet the case proved by the defendants, except by the introduction of deeds conveying the lands in question to it. The partnership agreement referred to in the findings was at first oral, and later it was reduced to writing. The written agreement purports to be an agreement between D. O. Brant, a son of O. F. Brant, and the defendants, and to be signed by D. O. Brant. The testimony shows, however, that O. F. Brant was the real contracting party. It is wholly immaterial in this case whether the agreement was with the father or the son. Neither the son nor the father's executor nor his heirs are parties to this action, and obviously the judgment is not binding upon them. It is sufficient in this action for the defendants to show that they have an interest in the partnership property, and that the plaintiff holds only the naked legal title thereto in trust for the partnership, or for those interested in the property thereof. The respective rights therein of the defendants and D. O. Brant or the heirs of O. F. Brant can only be determined in an appropriate action to which they are parties. The complaint was filed March 5, 1926. O. F. Brant died in March, 1922. It is alleged in the answer and found by the court that the "plaintiff herein was the duly qualified and acting executor of the estate of said O. F. Brant, deceased." One of the officers of the plaintiff testified that it "was executor of the will and estate of O. F. Brant, deceased."

The same officer further testified: "I have been informed it (estate) was closed." This testimony was stricken out. Disregarding the testimony so stricken out, the only reasonable inference from the pleadings, proof, and findings is that the plaintiff had ceased to be executor of the will of O. F. Brant, deceased, at the time the action was commenced. Whether this be true or not, the plaintiff was not named as a party to the action as such executor, but only in its individual capacity, and therefore the judgment herein is not an adjudication of the rights or interests of the estate or of the heirs of O. F. Brant in the property.

[3] Appellant argues the case upon the erroneous theory that the court admitted parol evidence to modify the terms of the written instruments by which title was conveyed to the plaintiff. The parol evidence was admitted to prove a partnership. A partnership in lands may be formed by a parol agreement. Perelli-Minetti v. Lawson (Cal. Sup.) 272 P. 573.

The other points made by appellant are manifestly without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARRETT, Building Inspector, v. SUPERIOR COURT OF ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.

Civ. 7335.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 24, 1930.

1. Contempt $\S$ 28(1) — New ordinance — Invalidity of prior ordinance — Contempt proceedings.

Passage of new ordinance after judgments declaring zoning ordinance invalid held immaterial in proceeding for contempt in again denying building permit, where neither new ordinance nor stipulation as to effective date thereof was before court.

2. Judgment $\S$ 650 — Final judgment — Determination of facts and law.

Final judgment determines facts and law of case, regardless of validity of statutes on which based.

3. Constitutional law $\S$ 110 — Final judgment — Power to alter.

Neither court nor city lawmaking power may alter final judgment, except in statutory manner.

Contempt proceeding by F. A. Andrews against R. H. Barrett, as Building Inspector of the City of Piedmont, and such city. To review a judgment of contempt, defendants apply for a writ of certiorari to the Superior Court of the County of Alameda, and James G. Quinn, Judge.

Affirmed.

Girard N. Richardson, City Atty., of Piedmont, and Joseph C. Prior, of Oakland, for petitioners.

Breed, Burpee & Robinson, of Oakland, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J.

After the remittiturs were filed in Andrews v. Barrett (Cal. App.) 281 P. 79, and Andrews v. City of Piedmont (Cal. App.) 281 P. 78, two companion cases, the plaintiff again applied for the building permit which was the subject-matter involved in those two actions. His last application was not granted because a new ordinance had been passed. He then commenced a contempt proceeding. The trial court entered a judgment of contempt against R. H. Barrett, as building inspector, and against the city of Piedmont. Thereafter they applied to this court for a writ of review.

The ordinance under consideration in the two cases above cited was No. 268. Those cases were commenced on March 29, 1928. On March 21, 1929, Ordinance No. 315 was passed. The questions before the court in the case at bar turn on the effect, if any, that the provisions of the new ordinance have on the rights of the parties in the two cases cited.

[1-3] As stated above, the city of Piedmont and its officers rely on the provisions of the new ordinance. The property owner, F. A. Andrews, contends that the latter ordinance has no effect whatever, that his application for a permit should have been granted, and that the judgment of contempt was properly entered. That the latter ordinance has no effect whatever is predicated on the contention that whether said ordinance is valid or invalid there is nothing in the record to the effect that it contains any word or words showing that any of its provisions were retroactive. The point must be sustained. Counsel have stipulated to the facts which were before the trial court. Neither Ordinance No. 315 nor any section thereof was before that court. Nor was there before the court any stipulation as to when said ordinance took effect. It follows that the trial court did not err in holding, in effect, that the passage of Ordinance No. 315 was immaterial as to anything before the court. As will presently appear, the fact that said ordinance was not retroactive is not necessarily determinative of the question of its materiality in the case at bar. If the lot owner did not hold a final judgment, and if this were an initial proceeding to compel the issuance of the permit, it might well be contended that Ordinance No. 315 was the controlling law and therefore the city of Piedmont and its officers had the right to refuse the permit. Brougher v. Board of Public Works (Cal. Sup.) 271 P. 487. But that case rested on the doctrine that the applicant had not, by filing an application, obtained a vested right. The applicant cites and relies on London v. Robinson, 94 Cal. App. 774, 271 P. 921. But in that case the permit was issued, and there was no attempt to recall or revoke made by the municipal authorities. The real question before us is, therefore, whether this applicant for a permit obtained a vested right. As to when an applicant for a statutory permit has acquired a vested right is not expressly defined by any case cited by counsel. However, our books are full of cases to the effect that, as to the case under consideration, a final judgment, in the absence of supplemental pleadings as to new rights, determines both the facts and the law pertinent as of the date the action was commenced. Metropolis, etc., v. Barnet, 165 Cal. 449, 132 P. 833. The determination includes both the facts and the law applicable to that particular case (15 Cal. Jur. 142-146) whether the statutes on which it rests are valid or invalid (15 Cal. Jur. 147). Except in a manner authorized by statute, the court that rendered the judgment may not alter it (14 Cal. Jur. 991), and what the court may not do in this behalf, the lawmaking power may not do. 5 Cal. Jur. 755; 12 C. J. 984; 12 C. J. 956; People ex rel. Lafferty v. Owen, 286 Ill. 638, 122 N. E. 132, 3 A. L. R. 447, and extended note. Having before it a set of facts quite similar if not in all respects parallel, the Supreme Court of Louisiana came to the same conclusion. City of Shreveport v. Dickason, 160 La. 563, 107 So. 427. We find no error in the record.

The proceedings are affirmed.

McKENNA v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.
et al.
Civ. 5655.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

March 18, 1930.

1. Explosives ☞12 — Blasting — Property damage — Vibration.

Tunnel contractor held liable for damage to lot and building by vibration or concussion caused by blasting, though not negligent.

2. Negligence ☞58 — Injury from lawful act — Duty to prevent.

One voluntarily performing lawful act, which may naturally cause injury, must prevent it, or pay damages, regardless of motive or care.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by Maude L. McKenna against the Pacific Electric Railway Company, a corporation, the Twohy Bros. Company, a corporation, and another. From a judgment against the last-named company, it appeals.

Affirmed.

E. E. Morris, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, of Los Angeles (W. W. Orme and Timon E. Owens, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

ELIOT CRAIG, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by Twohy Bros. Company, a corporation, one of the defendants, from the judgment for damages in the sum of $1,979 in favor of respondent and against appellant.

The case grew out of the following facts: The Pacific Electric Railway Company owned a certain strip of land in the city of Los Angeles, running in a generally northwesterly direction from its station near Fourth and Hill streets to First street and Glendale boulevard, a distance of nearly one mile. Said company entered into a contract with appellant Twohy Bros. Company for the construction along said strip of a tunnel or subway for electric railway use. Respondent owned a lot with house thereon at Fourth and Boylston streets, about seventeen feet from the west line of this tunnel (projected to the surface). The interior diameter of the completed tunnel is approximately twenty feet, and for a distance of not less than six hundred feet each way from the junction of Fourth and Boylston streets the tunnel is seventy feet or more below the surface of the ground. The appellant in boring the tunnel used dynamite, and from the explosions the respondent's property was damaged by the shaking of the ground and building or by concussion or both.

The action was dismissed by plaintiff as to the defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company at the commencement of the trial. The judgment was that plaintiff take nothing against defendant W. R. Fontaine (superintendent of construction on the tunnel for appellant), and that she recover damages from appellant.

[1] Appellant concedes that the property of respondent was damaged, and raises no question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding as to the amount of damages. However, appellant does earnestly present its points of law upon its contention that there is no liability whatsoever from appellant to respondent.

Appellant, at the commencement of the trial, objected to the introduction of any evidence in the case upon the ground that "the complaint does not state a cause of action in that it fails to allege any negligence upon the part of defendants, or either of them, and that in the absence of that, no evidence is admissible because we are not liable for blasting unless it is negligently done." The objection was overruled. At the close of the case, appellant moved "for judgment for the defendant upon the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action in that it fails to allege any negligence." This motion was denied by the court.

Appellant states its point on appeal as follows: "The evidence on the part of the respondent follows the allegations of the complaint, as does also the findings of fact. Our appeal is based on the error of the court in overruling the objections to the introduction of any evidence and in denying appellant's motion for judgment made at the close of the case, and in holding the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applicable and placing the burden on appellant to show it was not negligent. The complaint in no way or manner alleges that the blasting was negligently done and respondent offered no evidence of any negligence, and the record is devoid of anything to show negligence in the manner of blasting unless the mere fact of injury proves negligence."

The complaint alleges that the defendants in building the tunnel continually set off blasts sufficiently severe to shake the surrounding country, including the lot on which plaintiff's house and other improvements stood, "as with a severe earthquake"; that Twohy Bros. Company and Fontaine continually set off very heavy blasts along the line of said tunnel during both the daytime and the nighttime; that said blasting continued at all hours of the day and night for several months; that many times plaintiff's building was shaken by said blasting as though with a heavy and violent earthquake, whereby her property was damaged as set forth in the complaint.

The principal California case relied upon by appellant is Houghton v. Loma Prieta Lumber Co., 152 Cal. 500, 93 P. 82, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 913, 14 Ann. Cas. 1159. The blasting complained of in that case was done in an uninhabited region, where the defendant, as an independent contractor, was engaged in constructing a wagon road, and a stump, which stood in the course of the projected road, was exploded by blasting with dynamite, whereby the deceased lost his life by being struck with a stone while passing by. We do not consider that case in point under the facts of the present case.

The principal California cases upon which respondent relies are: Colton v. Onderdonk, 69 Cal. 155, 10 P. 395, 397, 58 Am. Rep. 556; Munro v. Pacific Coast, etc., Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 P. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248; and Green v. General Petroleum Corporation (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 952, 955, 60 A. L. R. 475.

In the case of Colton v. Onderdonk, supra, the facts show that the defendant used quantities of guppowder to blast out rocks upon his own lot, contiguous to another person's property situated in a large city, and the court said this "must be taken as an unreasonable, unusual, and unnatural use of his own property, which no care or skill in so doing can excuse him from being responsible to the plaintiff for the damages he actually did to her dwelling-house as the natural and proximate result of his blasting. For an act which in many cases is in itself lawful, becomes unlawful when by it damage has accrued to the property of another. And it would make no material difference whether that damage, resulting proximately and naturally from the act of blasting by the defendant, was caused by rocks thrown against Mrs. Colton's dwelling-house, or a concussion of the air around it, which had either damaged or entirely destroyed it."

Munro v. Pacific Coast, etc., Co., supra, is an action brought to recover damages for death caused by the negligent explosion by defendant of a blast in the city of San Francisco, whereby plaintiff's intestate was killed. The complaint therein set forth a careless and negligent explosion of the blast. However, the Supreme Court did say in that case: "We perceive no error" in the following instruction: "It is no defense or answer to an action of this character that defendant, in exploding the blast in question, used and employed skillful and experienced men, and in everything appertaining to blasting, it used and exercised the highest degree of care; and I charge you that defendant is liable for damages for the death of said Michael Stanton, if you find that his death resulted from the firing of the blast in question, even if it used the highest and utmost care and skill in firing and exploding it." * * * The evidence shows clearly that this blast was exploded in a thickly-settled portion of the city. We are of opinion that no degree of care will excuse a person, where death was caused by such explosion, from responsibility for it."

Since the filing of the briefs in the case before us the Supreme Court of this state has given its decision in Green v. General Petroleum Corporation, supra. In that case plaintiffs owned certain improved real property in a residence district outside the city of Long Beach, which they occupied as a residence; defendant had leased the adjoining land, and was engaged in drilling a well for the discovery and production of oil; while bailing out the water for the purpose of testing the cement job for shut off of water, the well erupted, blowing off the control valves and wrecking the derrick. A stream of oil, gas, mud, and rocks shot into the air and upon plaintiffs' property, which was located about two hundred feet from the well. This mixture continued to pour forth for about twenty-four hours, and caused the damage complained of. The complaint contained two causes of action; one based upon liability without negligence due to trespass on plaintiffs' property, the other based upon negligence on the part of the defendant in performing the drilling operations. The trial court expressly found that the defendant had used and exercised ordinary care in the drilling of the well, and was not guilty of negligence in any particular. The court said that the evidence amply supported this finding. Judgment was in favor of the plaintiffs on the first cause of action, and the appeal presented to the Supreme Court for its determination the question whether or not, under the existing circumstances of injury without negligence, appellant was liable for the damage suffered by respondents. The Supreme Court therein said: "It ought to be, and we are of the view that it is, the rule that, where an injury arises out of, or is caused directly and proximately by the contemplated act or thing in question, without the interposition of any external or independent agency which was not or could not be foreseen, there is an absolute liability for the consequential damage, regardless of any element of negligence either in the doing of the act or in the construction, use, or maintenance of the object or instrumentality that may have caused the injury."

[2] "In general, if a voluntary act, lawful in itself, may naturally result in the injury of another, or the violation of his legal rights, the actor must at his peril see to it that such injury or such violation do not follow, or he must expect to respond in damages therefor; and this is true, regardless of the motive or the degree of care with which the act is performed." G. B. & L. R. Co. v. Eagles, 9 Colo. 544, 546, 13 P. 696, 697.

In the recent case of Feinberg v. Wisconsin Granite Co., 224 N. W. 184, decided by the Supreme Court of South Dakota on March 16, 1929, the complaint alleging that defendant stone quarry operator, in loosening rocks with high-power explosives, caused injuries to plaintiff's building near quarry by concussions through the air and vibrations through the ground, without alleging negligence or want of skill or care in blasting operations, was held to state a cause of action.

We see no reason for differentiating between responsibility for damage done by physical projectiles or missiles and responsibility for damage done by vibration or concussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Notice of intention to move for new trial, served by plaintiff over ten days after serving written notice of entry of judgment, held too late, though defendant gave plaintiff no such notice (Code Civ. Proc. § 659).

Code Civ. Proc. § 659 (St. 1915, p. 201, as amended by St. 1929, p. 841), requires party intending to move for new trial to serve notice of intention on adverse party within ten days after receiving written notice of entry of judgment.

2. Appeal and error ⇨345(1) — Time for appeal — New trial — Late notice.

Notice of appeal held too late, where notice of intention to move for new trial was not served in time (Code Civ. Proc. § 659).

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an application for a writ of prohibition to stop the respondent court from settling a bill of exceptions in the case of Hechtman v. Isleton Canning Company. The basic case was tried before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and a judgment was entered thereon. Written notice of the entry of the judgment was given by the plaintiff to the defendant August 23, 1929. The defendant did not give the plaintiff a written notice of the entry of the judgment. On September 18, 1929, the plaintiff served a notice of intention to move for a new trial. September 27, 1929, the defendant made a motion to strike said notice from the files. Apparently at the same time the trial court heard the motion for a new trial. Whether it made any order on the motion to strike does not appear, but it does appear that the trial court denied the motion for a new trial. On October 31, 1929, the plaintiff served a notice of appeal. The defendant asserts that the plaintiff's notice of intention to move for a new trial came too late, and that it is a nullity. Continuing, it claims that the notice of appeal also came too late and that it is a nullity, and, therefore, it asserts the trial court is exceeding its jurisdiction by proceeding to settle a bill of exceptions, and that this application should be granted. In reply, the plaintiff calls attention to the wording of section 659, Code of Civil Procedure, and argues that it was the duty of the defendant to have given the plaintiff notice of the entry of the judgment, if the defendant would complain that the acts of the plaintiff are dilatory.

[1,2] The provision of the statute, the meaning of which is in controversy, is as follows: "The party intending to move for a new trial must, either before the entry of judgment or within ten (10) days after receiving written notice of the entry of the judgment, file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention to move for a new trial. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. § 659. The requirement that a notice of intention be given was in the statute when the codes were adopted in 1872. As to when that notice should be given, has been the subject matter of many disputes. In 1915 (St. 1915, p. 201) the Legislature enacted that it should be given " * * * within ten days after receiving notice of the entry of the judgment, or within ten days after verdict. * * *

After the statute was so amended, the disputes continued, but they took the form as to what was or was not notice. In 1929 (St. 1929, p. 841) the word "written" was inserted before the word "notice." Several sections were amended in the same manner. From the foregoing history, it seems to us that it is clear that the Legislature never contemplated that a written notice should be given by each party. Such a contention was not the subject-matter of any of the former decisions. However, that a written notice should be given and a written record of the notice should be preserved, and thus remove the disputes that had theretofore arisen, was manifestly the intention of the Legislature. When a written notice is prepared by one party and signed by him, and is served on the other party and the service is admitted in writing, it is but reasonable to look upon the document as a written notice to both parties. As the law does not require the performance of idle acts, no good reason appears for construing the statute as requiring each party to serve on the other party a formal written notice in order to cut out delays in litigation. Therefore, we are of the opinion that the notice of intention to move for a new trial, which the plaintiff served on September 18, 1929, came too late, and that it should have been stricken out on motion. As no new trial proceeding was legally initiated within the time allowed by law, the notice of appeal came too late and it was ineffective for any purpose. Whiting-Mead Comm. Co. v. Bayside Land Co., 178 Cal. 93, 94, 172 P. 598.

[3, 4] The question of granting or denying this writ is largely one of discretion and, in view of all of the facts, we think that in this instance the writ should issue.

Let a peremptory writ of prohibition issue.

PEOPLE v. MACBETH.
Cr. No. 1571.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 26, 1930.

I. Criminal law §549 — Negative averments — Proof.

Slight evidence is sufficient to prove negative averments in criminal case.

2. Forgery §44(1/2) — Conviction — Sufficiency of evidence.

Evidence in prosecution for forgery held sufficient to support conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Joseph M. Macbeth, alias A. W. Woodson, was convicted of forgery, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Frederick Dubovsky, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J.

In the information the district attorney pleaded five separate counts alleging five different acts of forgery. He also alleged two prior convictions. On his arraignment the defendant pleaded not guilty to each of the five counts alleging forgery, but admitted the prior convictions. The jury returned verdicts of guilty on counts 1, 3, 4, and 5. The defendant moved for a new trial. The motion was denied, and from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial the defendant has appealed.

[1, 2] It was the theory of the prosecution that the defendant wrote the instruments pleaded in the information and signed the names, but the names so signed were names of fictitious persons, natural or artificial. The defendant contends that the evidence was wholly insufficient to show that any of the persons, natural or artificial, were fictitious names. The district attorney called Martha E. May. She testified that the instrument set forth in the first count was cashed by her at the request of the defendant and that the instrument set forth in the second count was likewise cashed by her. He called Henrietta Rudawsky, who testified that the instrument set forth in the third count was at the request of the defendant cashed by her. He called Marguerite Pius, who testified that the instrument set forth in the fourth count was at the request of the defendant cashed by her. He also called Arabella Clark, who testified that the instrument set forth in the fifth count was cashed by her. Each of these passings occurred in Berkeley, Alameda county, all within a space of a few blocks of each other and within a period of four days and under almost identical circumstances. Except as to the amount and the date each instrument was as follows:

"May 20, 1929.

"Security Bank & Trust Co. of Long Beach, Calif., Pay to the order of A. W. Woodson, Thirty five and no/100 Dollars. Value received and charge the same to account of "W. J. Sutherland, Cashier.

"To Southern Bond Corp.,
"No. 3372 Long Beach, Calif."

Each draft, together with indorsements thereon, was offered in evidence. Mr. C. C. Jameson was called as a witness. He testified that he is assistant cashier of the Security First National Bank of Long Beach; that on April 1, 1929, Security Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach was merged with Los Angeles First National Bank and thereafter it was called Security First National Bank. He further testified that there has never been at Long Beach a bank named Security Bank & Trust Company; that there is not now, and has not been for seven years, a concern called Southern Bond Corporation; and that he had made inquiry and that there is no person at Long Beach by the name of W. J. Sutherland, and that there is no W. J. Sutherland acting as cashier of any bank at Long Beach. The next witness called was R. W. Foraker, an officer of the Berkeley Police Department, who identified a signature "J. M. Macbeth" and that signature was received in evidence as an exemplar. Mr. E. O. Heinrich qualified as a writing expert. That witness was shown the drafts pleaded in counts 1, 3, 4, and 5 and also the exemplar. He testified that the handwriting on each of said drafts was written by the same person who wrote the exemplar. The next step taken by the prosecution was to call Mr. W. J. Wilson, an inspector of the Berkeley Police Department. That witness testified that on the 26th day of December, 1929, he and Officer Woods of his department and Inspector Becker held a conversation with the defendant in the Berkeley City Hall. At that time the witness showed the defendant the drafts pleaded in counts 1, 3, 4, and 5, and the defendant stated that he wrote each one, and further stated that "the drafts were all fake—names and everything." Continuing, the defendant stated that in his room in the Hotel Galt in San Francisco could be found certain red rubber stamps. Thereupon the officers went to the room and obtained certain stamps which the witness offered in evidence. The foregoing evidence shows a complete case against the defendant on the theory that the names were names of fictitious persons. Before the confession was offered in evidence there was some evidence of the corpus delicti. There was also prima facie evidence that the names were the names of fictitious persons. People v. Carmona, 80 Cal. App. 159, 165, 251 P. 315. The latter evidence was in the nature of negating the fact that W. J. Sutherland was at Long Beach. It may be granted, as the defendant contends, that no witness had testified that W. J. Sutherland was not in Alameda county. The prosecution was in the act of proving a negative. It will hardly be contended that the prosecution was bound to produce a witness who had searched every spot on earth. However, it will be conceded that the prosecution was bound to introduce some evidence tending to support the negative. When a party is attempting to prove a negative slight evidence is sufficient. 10 Cal. Jur., pp. 789, 1149, and 1158. We are unable to say that the showing made by the prosecution in the instant case did not meet that rule prior to the introduction of the evidence of the confession, and, when the confession was introduced, the proof was abundantly sufficient to support the verdict rendered by the jury. We find no error in the record.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Action by Anton Relovich against S. L. Stuart and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

J. L. Murphey, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clarke & Bowker, of Los Angeles, and James C. Hollingsworth, of Ventura, for respondent Mary Perkins Raymond.

HOUSER, J.

Defendant Stuart was the owner of about 130 acres of land upon which he had developed water. He sold to plaintiff, Relovich, 20 acres of such land. Contemporaneously with the delivery of the deed thereto Stuart gave to Relovich an instrument in writing, signed by Stuart alone, by which he agreed to furnish to Relovich, for the price of 20 cents for each 1,000 gallons, water to be used by him upon the land described in the deed. The "agreement" contained the further provision that water to be furnished was to be supplied from the water system owned by Stuart, but that Relovich was to pay the expense of "making the connection to and with said system of pipes and conducting said water to said land." During each of several succeeding years Relovich improved portions of the land purchased by him from Stuart, and in so doing used water which was furnished to him in accordance with the terms of the "agreement." Thereafter Stuart sold his remaining interest in the original 130 acres, together with the water rights therein. After such land and such water rights had passed into the ownership of several successive purchasers thereof, the title thereto finally vested in the defendant Raymond, who thereupon broke and disconnected the pipe theretofore installed by Relovich at its connection with the water system theretofore maintained by Stuart and the several succeeding owners thereof, and thereafter refused to furnish Relovich with any water. Thereupon Relovich instituted a suit by which he sought an injunction to compel Raymond to again connect the water system owned by Raymond with the pipe installed by Relovich in connection with said water system, and thereafter to furnish water to Relovich as provided in the agreement to which reference has been had. By his action Relovich also demanded compensation from Raymond for damages caused by her refusal to furnish water in pursuance of the provisions of said agreement. By order of the lower court a demurrer interposed by the defendants to the complaint in the action was sustained without leave to amend. It is from the ensuing judgment that this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] From a consideration of the foregoing statement of facts it becomes apparent that the right, if any, in the plaintiff to the relief demanded by him primarily depended upon whether the "agreement" was capable of either legal or equitable enforcement. Speaking generally, it is well established by numerous authorities that, where by the terms of a writing but one of the parties purportedly interested therein is bound by its terms, the instrument cannot be enforced as a contract, either specifically or by way of compensation to be awarded as damages to one of the parties to the quasi contract on account of its supposed breach or the nonperformance of its apparent requirements by the other party thereto. As in substance is stated in 6 California Jurisprudence, 211, if no definite obligation is created as to one of the parties, the contract lacks mutuality, and is binding upon neither of the parties. And in 9 Cyc. L. & P. 618, the same thought, with an illustration thereof, appears in the following language: " * * * One who promises to do a thing only if it pleases him to do it, is not bound to perform it at all. * * * So where a person agrees to furnish lumber in such quantities as he may 'deem fit and advisable,' it has been held that he may cease furnishing the lumber whenever he pleases." In the case of Doe v. Culverwell, 35 Cal. 291, it is held that, in order that a writing between two persons may have binding force, it is essential that it contain obligations which are reciprocal as to each of the parties thereto. That equity will not decree the specific performance of an act agreed to be performed by one of the parties to a purported contract, unless by its terms a reciprocal obligation is created as to the other party thereto, is held in Archer v. Miller, 73 Cal. App. 678, 239 P. 92. And in volume 23, page 445, of California Jurisprudence, where many authorities are cited in its support, the rule is thus stated: "A contract will not be specifically enforced unless it has such mutuality that it may be so enforced by either party; and this mutuality must exist at the time the action is commenced. It results that when, from personal incapacity, the nature of the contract, or any other cause, a contract is incapable of being enforced against one party, that party is equally incapable of enforcing it specifically against the other." And by section 3386 of the Civil Code, in part and in substance, it is provided that neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party is compellable specifically to perform it.

[3] Adverting to the "agreement" here under consideration, it will be remembered that it was signed by Stuart only, and that he agreed to furnish water to Relovich at a stated rate, but that there was no agreement either as to the total quantity of water which would be furnished, nor the time during which any flow (however uncertain as to quantity or volume) of water should continue. For example: As far as the language of the "agreement" is concerned, the 1,000 gallons mentioned therein might be so furnished that it would come as a mere trickle and possibly take many hours to accumulate; or, again, the 1,000 gallons might be supplied in a comparatively large volume and require the space of one minute or less; and the flow of water last suggested might be continuous; or it might be intermittent, and thus the several flows thereof separated by days, weeks, or months. But of greater importance, as far as the binding force of the agreement was concerned, was the fact that the agreement contained no covenant on the part of Relovich that he would ever require, or take, or purchase, from Stuart any water whatsoever. It is therefore clear that the "agreement" was lacking in mutuality, in that, although, apparently, it obligated Stuart to the performance of an act (however uncertain), in no wise did it impose any reciprocal or other duty on Relovich.

In the case of Schimmel v. Martin, 190 Cal. 429, 213 P. 33, 34, it appeared that Martin, who was the owner of "150 inches of water," agreed with one Uzzell to let him "have this water continuously at 1½¢ per inch," to be delivered on certain land. Later, the rights of Uzzell in the contract were assigned to Schimmel and one Anderson, and immediately thereafter Martin refused to furnish any water to either of them. In an action for damages resulting from such refusal, judgment was rendered against the defendant. On appeal to the Supreme Court it was held that the contract was void because it was lacking in mutuality, in that it contained no covenant on the part of the proposed user to buy the water offered for sale by its owner; also that a contract to allow the use of water where no time was specified during which an agreed rate was applied was void for uncertainty. In part the court said:

"The contract is lacking in mutuality. Considered as a contract for the sale of personal property, as the parties to the action treated and considered it, and as the trial court in effect found it to be, there is clearly no mutuality in the absence of an agreement by the plaintiffs to buy the water offered for sale by the contract. * * * But in the instant case we are unable to find in the contract any obligation or promise on the part of the plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest to take or purchase any water at all.

"The lack of mutuality in the contract is the principal point made in support of the appeal. Incidentally, however, it is contended that the contract was void for uncertainty. This point, even though it be indifferently made, is well taken." And the court then took pains to point out in what respect the uncertainty existed, and reversed the judgment.

That case and the instant case are very similar. It is clear that, if no recovery of damages could be had in the cited case, none should be recovered in this case; and since by general authority, to which reference heretofore has been had herein, it is manifest that, before specific performance of a contract of the nature of that here under consideration will be decreed, it must appear that by the covenants therein a mutuality of remedy for its breach exists in favor of each of its parties, it follows that the judgment rendered herein by the lower court should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

FIRST BANK OF JAMESTOWN v. GILLIS
et al.
Civ. 4033.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 17, 1930.

1. Vendor and purchaser — Prospective purchasers — Possession.

Prospective purchasers who entered premises with knowledge of owner did not have rights of tenants in possession.

2. Vendor and purchaser — Prospective purchasers — Liability — Taking crop.

Prospective purchasers taking possession without authority from owner, and picking and marketing fruit crop, held liable for value of crop when negotiations for purchase fell through.

3. Vendor and purchaser — Prospective purchasers — Liability — Taking crop.

Where value of crop taken by prospective purchasers was not set forth, their liability was determined by reasonable value (Civ. Code, § 1611).

Civil Code, § 1611, provides that when contract does not determine amount of consideration, nor method by which it is to be ascertained, the consideration shall be so much money as the object of the contract is reasonably worth.

4. Vendor and purchaser — Prospective purchasers — Taking crop — Liability.

Right of prospective purchasers of land to market crop would not necessarily relieve them from paying value of crop when negotiations for purchase failed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by the First Bank of Jamestown against Charles L. Gillis and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

C. K. Bonestell and Finlay Cook, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Rowan Hardin, of Sonora, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

Plaintiff had judgment against the defendants for the sum of $950, as the value of a certain apple crop taken possession of and sold by the defendants. From this judgment, the defendants appeal.

The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury, and at the conclusion thereof the court found, among other things, as follows, to wit:

That in the month of February, 1924, J. P. Gibbons, T. E. Hunt and Marion Hunt, his wife, executed and delivered to J. B. Ryan and W. E. Booker, for the benefit of the plaintiff, a certain deed of trust, wherein and whereby they conveyed to Ryan and Booker, as trustees of plaintiff, certain premises described in the deed of trust, including about 300 acres of land; that upon the land so included in the deed of trust was a bearing apple orchard; that the indebtedness secured to be paid to the plaintiff by the deed of trust just mentioned became due and payable in the month of January, 1926; that the guarantors in said deed of trust defaulted in the payment of the amount secured thereby, and in said month of January, 1926, they delivered to the possession of the plaintiff all of the property described in said deed of trust; that thereafter, and on or about the 2d day of June, 1926, proceedings were begun for a foreclosure of said deed of trust, and the same was thereafter foreclosed and a conveyance made of the premises included in said deed of trust to the plaintiff, on or about the 23d day of October, 1926; that prior to said conveyance by said trustees under the sale referred to, to the plaintiff, the guarantors in said deed of trust granted and quitclaimed to the plaintiff the same premises; that at the time of the commencement of this action the plaintiff was the owner of the premises referred to herein, and during all the times mentioned in this complaint was entitled to the possession thereof, and to the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and to all crops raised or grown thereon; that after the plaintiff had taken possession, as aforesaid, under an agreement with the guarantors in said deed of trust, and on or about the month of June, 1926, said defendants offered to purchase said property under a verbal agreement and understanding with the plaintiff that the purchase was to take place and be completed at such time as the plaintiff could give a good and sufficient title thereto, and it was understood and agreed that conveyance would be made only after sale of said property was had under the terms and provisions of said trust deed; that this proceeding was completed and title perfected on or about the 23d day of October, 1926, and the plaintiff offered to convey said property to the defendants. It further appears in the findings that a dispute arose between the parties as to the amount of the purchase price to be paid therefor, and that the defendants refused to purchase the same, and have neglected, failed, and refused to purchase said property, and that said defendants did not at any time become the owners of said property, or entitled to any right, title, or interest therein. That in the month of June, 1926, and pending the time that said property was being sold under the trust deed referred to, and without any agreement or understanding between the plaintiff and the defendants relative to the possession of said property, the defendants entered upon the property and remained in possession thereof until about the 6th day of November, 1926. The court further found that at the time said defendants went into possession of said property in June, 1926, there was an apple orchard upon said property with a crop of apples nearly matured; that the defendants did not have anything to do with the production of said crop of apples, but that beginning in the month of July, 1926, the defendants commenced picking and selling said apple crop, and continued picking the same and shipping and selling said crop of apples until about the 6th day of November, 1926. The court further found that the defendants had not paid for said apple crop or accounted for any of the proceeds thereof; that the reasonable value of the crop was the sum of $950; that the crop of apples amounted to 185,000 pounds. Judgment followed for the plaintiff for the value of the crop as it existed upon the trees at the time the defendants picked and sold the same.

A reference to the testimony shows that during the oral negotiations or conversations relative to the property, that the value of the apple crop was discussed, and, on the part of the plaintiff, there is testimony to the effect that the value of the apple crop was considered in fixing the price of the premises. On the part of the defendants, while it is admitted that the value and condition of the apple crop was discussed, it is contended that nothing was said as to the value thereof, entering into the purchase price of the premises. It is not claimed by either party that the defendants entered into the premises in pursuance of any agreement, lease, or understanding that they were to pay so much for the use and occupancy of the premises, or that they were acquiring any interest or ownership therein, or to anything standing or growing thereon.

[1-3] Upon this appeal it is contended, however, that the defendants were tenants in possession, and that the law relative to the right of a tenant to crops planted, growing, and harvested prior to surrendering possession of the premises should be applied to this case. However, the facts show, and the findings of the court show, that the defendants did not enter as tenants of the plaintiff; that they did not lease the premises; that they had not acquired any interest or ownership therein. All that appears is that there was an oral agreement to purchase the premises, the purchase and transfer to take place at a certain date, and that thereafter the defendants entered upon the premises, of which fact the plaintiff had knowledge, and no objection was offered thereto. There is testimony in the record to the effect that the plaintiff considered the value of the apple crop to be of the sum of about $2,000. The record shows that the apple crop was about matured, and there is nothing in the record indicating that the defendants ever did anything in relation to the care of the trees or of the apples growing thereon, until they began picking the same. That the value of an apple crop about matured, consisting of 185,000 pounds, would enter into the calculations of the parties in negotiating for the sale and purchase of a tract of land upon which stood trees loaded with that quantity of fruit appears to us almost self-evident, and that upon a failure of the parties to come to an understanding and completion of the purchase and sale, as orally agreed upon, would entitle the owner of the premises to the value of the crop gathered and sold by the intending purchaser who had refused to complete the purchase. The facts of this case are clearly distinguishable from instances where a tenant, or even where a trespasser, has entered upon real estate and planted, cared for, and harvested a crop, and likewise distinguishable from instances where a tenant or a trespasser has entered upon a tract of land containing an apple orchard, and has cared for, cultivated, and performed all of the work necessary to protect fruit-bearing trees, so that the fruit grown thereon will be of a marketable quality. This renders it unnecessary to review the cases cited by the appellants having to do with the rights of tenants under such circumstances. This is an instance of intending purchasers taking possession of property, which is rendered more valuable by reason of a crop of fruit thereon, without any understanding or agreement whatever that such possession may be taken and the crop of fruit picked and marketed without any protest. Being a part of the value of the premises as they stood at the time of the negotiations, we think when the negotiations fell through, the defendants were properly held liable for the value of the crop. It is true that the value of the crop as separable from the value of the real estate, was not set forth. Under such circumstances, section 1611 of the Civil Code applies. In this case, the defendants accepted and took possession of a part of the property without any understanding as to the price to be paid for such portion. Under such circumstances the case of Dickerman v. Ohashi Importing Co., 63 Cal. App. 101, 218 P. 458; 22 Cal. Jur., p. 939, also, p. 1093, would apply.

We think the evidence shows that the defendant Hoefer was equally liable with the defendant Gillis for the value of the crop.

[4] If it be conceded that the defendants, under the circumstances, had the right to pick and market the apple crop, it does not follow that when the sale fell through and the defendants refused to purchase the land upon which the trees bearing the apple crop stood, that they should be relieved from compensating the plaintiff for the value of the crop.

The judgment is affirmed.

ÆTNA CASUALTY & SURETY CO. v. EXNICIOS. (Civ. 6433.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California.

Rehearing Denied April 26, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 26, 1930.

Receivers §212 — Qualifying bond — Attorney's fees — Receiver's liability.

Under receiver's qualifying bond, surety held entitled to recover attorney's fees from principal in defending action by trustee in bankruptcy against receiver and surety based on void order appointing receiver.

The qualifying bond provided that indemnitor will at all times indemnify surety from any and all damages, losses, costs, charges, and expenses incurred by reason of suretyship, and that counsel and attorney's fees shall be deemed proper charge or expense within meaning of such provision.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by the Ætna Casualty & Surety Company against John Exnicios. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Frank L. Guerena, of San Francisco, for appellant.

James M. Wallace and Lovell & Lovell & Wallace, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Appellant, in an action filed in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, numbered 94,314 and entitled "Charles H. Goewey, Plaintiff, v. Herbert Goewey and Goewey Investment Co., a Corporation, Defendants," was duly appointed receiver of the property of the corporation. Following the order he filed a qualifying bond which was furnished by the respondent surety company. He entered upon his duties, and during the period of his active receivership was paid by order of the court certain sums as fees for his services and those of his attorney. Subsequently the investment company was adjudged a bankrupt and its property was surrendered by the receiver to the trustee in bankruptcy. Thereafter the trustee brought suit in the above superior court against appellant and respondent surety company to recover the amount received as fees by appellant and his attorney and for a further sum alleged to have been lost while the business of the investment company was being conducted by the receiver. The action last mentioned was numbered 129,253 and entitled "Charles W. Taylor, Trustee in Bankruptcy for the Goewey Investment Co., a Corporation, a Bankrupt, Plaintiff, v. John Exnicios and Aetna Casualty and Surety Company (a Corporation), Defendants." The complaint alleged that the superior court was without jurisdiction to appoint appellant receiver of the investment company and that the order was consequently void. A demurrer filed by appellant was overruled, and after a trial upon the merits, a judgment, which has become final, was rendered in appellant's favor. Respondent surety company also demurred to the complaint, and its demurrer was sustained. Following this ruling judgment was entered therein in its favor and was affirmed on appeal. Taylor v. Exnicios, 197 Cal. 443, 241 P. 397. The trustee in the action last mentioned sought to hold the surety company liable upon the bond for the portions of the estate of the bankrupt alleged to have been unlawfully received and lost by appellant, it being his contention that notwithstanding the allegation that the order of appointment was void, the bond having been given to enable appellant to exercise the functions of the office, the surety was not relieved from liability thereon because of the invalidity of the appointment. The court held, however, that if the order of appointment was void as alleged, a material consideration for the execution of the bond had failed and the same was unenforceable; consequently that the demurrer of the surety company was properly sustained. Taylor v. Exnicios, supra.

Appellant in his application for the bond in question, wherein he is designated as the indemnitor, agreed as follows: "That the indemnitor will perform all the conditions of said bond on the part of the indemnitor to be performed, and will at all times indemnify and keep indemnified the surety from any and all damages, loss, costs, charges and expenses of any kind or nature whatsoever, which it may at any time sustain or incur by reason of its suretyship, and will pay over to the surety, its successors or assigns, all sums of money which may be paid by or for the surety, or which it may become liable to pay by reason of such suretyship. Counsel and attorney's fees, whether incurred under retainer, or salary, or any other expense incurred by the surety at any time in any litigation, investigation, collection of premiums due on this bond, or in seeking its discharge as surety, shall be deemed a proper charge or expense within the meaning of the preceding sentence, and the surety is hereby authorized to prove such costs or expenses in any action or proceeding against the indemnitor, and include the same in any judgment or decree which may be recovered against said indemnitor, and the company may bring as many actions hereupon as there are defaults, the recovery of each judgment not to be a bar to the recovery of any other judgment. That in any accounting which may be had between the indemnitor and the surety the surety shall be entitled to credit for any and all disbursements in and about the matters herein contemplated, made by it."

The condition of the bond was that, "If the said John Exnicios as such receiver shall faithfully perform the duties of his office according to law and the orders of said court, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect." The present action is one to recover from appellant sums expended by respondent surety company for attorney's fees in the defense of the action brought against it by Taylor, the trustee, and for like fees a liability for which it has incurred in the prosecution of the present action.

The trial court found for respondent and entered judgment accordingly.

Appellant claims that the attorney's fees expended by respondent in the action brought by the trustee were not an expense sustained or incurred as provided in the application for the bond, and that consequently he is not liable therefor nor for attorney's fees in the present action.

In support of this contention it is urged that the agreement to save the surety company harmless from all damages, loss, costs, charges, or expenses of any kind or nature which it might sustain by reason of its suretyship can only refer to such expenses, etc., sustained or incurred by reason of its guaranty that the receiver would faithfully perform the duties of his office; that the suit by the trustee did not involve the question of the failure of the receiver to faithfully perform the duties of his office; and that consequently the surety was not sued and did not defend by reason of its suretyship.

As stated, the object of the trustee's suit was to recover funds of the bankrupt's estate to which, it was claimed, the receiver, owing to the invalidity of his appointment, had no right; and it was also sought to hold respondent liable therefor upon its bond. While, as the court held, if the order of appointment was void as alleged, no action would lie as against the respondent surety company, nevertheless the trustee sought to hold it responsible "by reason of its suretyship" and upon no other ground. This being true, the surety was clearly entitled under the terms of its contract with appellant to recover the expense incurred in the litigation, notwithstanding the complaint as against it was legally insufficient. The liability of appellant for attorney's fees in the present action, in case the right of respondent to recover in the above particulars is sustained, is undisputed.

We agree with the conclusions of the trial court, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

NUNZIATO v. PROUT.★

Civ. 3982.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 19, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 18, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨907(2) — Presumption — Findings — Absence of evidence.

In absence of evidence, appellate court must presume trial court's findings are supported by evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⇨907(2) — Presumptions — Findings — Interference with judgment — Absence of evidence.

That court found against plaintiff on special defense to cross-complaint did not justify appellate court in interfering with judgment that neither party take anything, in absence of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

Action by Salvatore Nunziato against W. I. Prout to rescind a contract, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Sherman & Sherman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John L. Schaefer and Roy C. Kaiser, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff commenced this action to rescind a contract, by the terms of which he agreed to purchase, and the defendant agreed to sell, certain machinery used in the manufacture of macaroni. The defendant denied the allegations of the amended complaint upon which the rescission of the contract was based, and by a cross-complaint set up two causes of action, one for the recovery of $4,500 for goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been purchased by plaintiff from the defendant, and one to recover the sum of $1,500 alleged to be due him for labor and materials furnished to plaintiff within two years last past. The plaintiff denied the allegations of the cross-complaint, and as a special defense, set up the same facts alleged in the original complaint for a rescission of the contract. The court made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered its judgment that the plaintiff take nothing by his complaint, that the defendant take nothing by his cross-complaint, and that neither party was entitled to his costs. The defendant appeals from that portion of the judgment which provides "that plaintiff and cross-defendant is not indebted to defendant W. I. Prout, that defendant W. I. Prout take nothing by his cross-complaint, and that neither party is entitled to his costs herein." The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone.

The court found the following facts alleged in plaintiff's amended complaint to be true: That, on or about the 9th day of February, 1925, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement wherein the plaintiff agreed to purchase, and the defendant agreed to sell, one double cylinder hydraulic macaroni press, one double cylinder horizontal short goods hydraulic macaroni press, and one kneading machine, as per specifications set forth in said agreement, and wherein plaintiff agreed to pay therefor the sum of $7,500; that at the time of entering into said agreement the defendant represented to the plaintiff that he was a manufacturer of macaroni machinery, and that he could manufacture the machinery described in the contract, and that he would make a first-class job; that plaintiff relied upon said representations, and, believing them to be true, signed the contract and paid $3,000 on the contract price; that on January 30, 1926, plaintiff notified the defendant that he could not make either the macaroni presses or the kneading machine function according to their capacity provided in the contract, and notified the defendant to come to plaintiff's factory and place all three of said machines on a satisfactory working basis; that defendant agreed to do as requested, provided plaintiff would send defendant transportation costs from Denver, Colo., to Los Angeles, Cal.; that plaintiff did send defendant $100, which was in excess of the sum required for transportation, as aforesaid; that defendant arrived in Los Angeles, February 26, 1926, and took full charge of all of said machinery for the purpose of putting it on a satisfactory working basis; that the two macaroni presses have never been put on a satisfactory working basis, and are not as represented by the defendant in the contract of purchase; that the kneading machine has been used by the plaintiff in its business since its delivery to plaintiff, and was so used after the notice of rescission; that on the 6th day of May, 1926, and as soon as plaintiff had ascertained that the representations were untrue, he tendered to defendant a duly executed notice of rescission of said agreement; and that defendant refused, and still refuses, to rescind said contract. The court further found that the plaintiff was not indebted to the defendant either upon the first or second count contained in his cross-complaint.

[1] The appellant contends that the trial court erred in adjudging that the respondent was not indebted to appellant and that the latter take nothing by his cross-complaint. He claims that the special defense set out in the amended answer to the cross-complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense; that the fraud alleged in said amended answer does not show any damage, and therefore is not actionable. It becomes unnecessary to examine this question. The court refused respondent any relief, and there is no appeal by him. The appellant alleged in his cross-complaint that plaintiff within two years last past became indebted to the defendant in the sum of $4,500 for a balance due for goods, wares, and merchandise. In the second count of said cross-complaint it is alleged that plaintiff became indebted to the defendant in the sum of $1,500 for labor done and materials furnished. These allegations were both denied. The court found that said allegations were untrue. In the absence of the evidence, it must be presumed that these findings of the court are supported by the evidence. In 2 California Jurisprudence, p. 689, § 395, it is said: "Where the evidence is not included in the record, the findings, * * * are conclusive, for there is nothing to enable the appellate court to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence."

[2] The mere fact that the trial court found against the respondent on the special defense to the cross-complaint is not sufficient to justify this court in interfering with the judgment. It is said in 2 California Jurisprudence, p. 879, § 515, as follows: "Because of the presumption in favor of the verdict and findings and judgment, the appellate court when receiving the evidence in support of a verdict or finding, or, in the absence thereof, in support of the judgment, must take into consideration all the evidence rather than certain disconnected portions thereof. It must accept as true all evidence tending to establish the correctness of the finding or verdict and it must consider it in most favorable aspect toward the prevailing party, and give to him the benefit of every inference that can reasonably be drawn in support of his claim. A mere doubt as to whether a finding is justified by the evidence does not authorize the appellate court to set aside the finding."

No sufficient reason has been shown why the judgment should be disturbed. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a judgment upon a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff when she was run over by one of defendant's trains on January 10, 1927.

The complaint contains three causes of action. The first in substance alleges that on January 10, 1927 and for some time prior thereto, at the intersection of Shattuck avenue and Blake street, in the city of Berkeley, defendant failed and neglected to pave or fill in the ground between its tracks or to keep the same flush with the surface of the street; that there were depressions and holes alongside the track; that by reason thereof the tracks, street, and station were unsafe and dangerous; that on the date mentioned plaintiff walked toward the track for the purpose of taking passage on one of defendant's trains and tripped and fell by putting her foot in a depression and hole so that the wheels of the first car passed over both her legs, mangling and crushing them to such a degree that both had to be amputated.

The second cause of action alleges that by virtue of an ordinance of the city of Berkeley defendant was required to plank, pave, or macadamize that portion of the street used by its tracks and between the rails and for two feet on each side thereof, and to keep the same constantly in repair and flush with the official grade of the street, which it failed to do.

The third cause of action alleges that defendant carelessly and negligently operated one of its trains along and upon Shattuck avenue at its intersection with Blake street, causing the injuries complained of. Damages were claimed in the sum of $200,000.

Defendant by its answer denied the allegations contained in all the causes of action except the allegation concerning the ordinance and except the fact of an accident, and set up as an affirmative defense contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff.

Trial was had, and a verdict in the sum of $75,000 was rendered in favor of plaintiff. It is here claimed that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict and judgment. It is further claimed that error in the instructions, prejudicial misconduct of plaintiff's counsel, and the admission and rejection of certain evidence, justify a reversal of the judgment.

The evidence in substance shows that defendant is a public service corporation and in the operation of its business it maintains interurban tracks in the city of Berkeley at the place mentioned in the complaint, over which it operates its trains. At this place no station facilities are maintained by it of any kind or description. Passengers board the cars from and alight upon the public streets. The cars may be boarded from either side. Plaintiff, a young married woman, lived in Berkeley, but was employed in San Francisco as a stenographer. On the morning of the accident she drove with her husband to the train. She alighted from her machine and proceeded in the direction of defendant's tracks. She looked to see if her train was approaching. She noticed it some two hundred feet away. The train was traveling at a rate of speed variously estimated at between ten and fifteen miles an hour. In stepping over one of the tracks, so plaintiff testified, her foot caught in a hole adjacent thereto and she was unable to extricate it. As the train continued to approach her, she struggled to release her foot, but was unable to do so; she fell on her side and lost consciousness and was run over by the train. She was taken to a hospital, where both her legs were amputated, one above and the other below the knee.

[1] It was defendant's theory of the case that plaintiff did not catch her foot in a hole between the rails, but was on her feet when she was struck and knocked down by the front end of the train as she negligently stepped upon the tracks without looking. It was the theory of plaintiff, as above indicated, that she caught her foot in a hole in the street and was stretched out on the ground and across the car tracks, prior to her being hit by the car. Upon this question, the evidence is conflicting. Plaintiff is supported in her evidence upon this subject by the testimony of a certain witness, and by physical facts inconsistent with defendant's claim that plaintiff was struck and knocked down by the train. A review of all the evidence upon this subject is not necessary, as it is conceded by appellant company that there was evidence on the part of plaintiff to support her theory which justified the trial court in submitting the case to the jury as to just how the unfortunate accident happened, assuming the negligence of the defendant to have been established. That negligence was established there is no question. It was admitted by the pleadings that defendant was obligated by ordinance to maintain the surface of the street adjacent to and between its rails constantly in repair, flush with the official grade and with good crossings. The evidence shows that defendant neglected this duty. Then again there is evidence to show that the engineer failed to observe plaintiff in her perilous position in time to avoid the accident. Appellant does not seriously contend that the evidence upon the subject of negligence is insufficient, but it does contend that the evidence which could be construed as showing negligence on the part of the defendant is so slight that this court will review the conflicting evidence, as the many errors committed by the trial court constitute prejudicial error, resulting in a miscarriage of justice which requires a reversal of the judgment. In this connection it is first claimed that the trial court erred in the giving of several instructions to the jury. All but one of these instructions have to do with the duty of an interurban railroad relative to the safe maintenance of stations or stopping places on its line.

[2, 3] The court instructed the jury, in substance, upon this subject that a railroad, whether steam or urban, which maintains stations or regular stopping places along its line, thereby invites the public to patronize the line, and, in the exercise of ordinary care, it must afford protection to the public commensurate with the risk involved; that such a company is required to use a greater degree of care at such places for the safety of intending passengers than at other points along its line; that a station in this connection means any point where cars are customarily stopped to take on passengers and that such passengers, while not absolved from the duty of exercising care for their own safety, have a right to presume that the ground and tracks admit of their getting safely on and off the trains, and they are not necessarily, as a matter of law, negligent in failing to observe a hole. The objection urged against these instructions is that they only apply in steam railroad cases where the station ground and platform belong to and are controlled by the company, and have no application where cars are operated on a public street. In Wilkinson v. United Railroads, 195 Cal. 185, 232 P. 131, it is expressly held that there is no reason why the operation of trains with relation to stations should not be the same in both steam and interurban trains; nor should there be any distinction as to the relative degree of care of common carriers and passengers at the stations of a steam railroad and of an interurban train; that the word "station" covers any place where trains usually and ordinarily stop. It is admitted that the place where the accident occurred was a usual stopping place of the train, and a higher degree of care was required at such a place in the operation of the train than at other points along the line. It was the duty of defendant to keep the portion of its tracks ordinarily traversed by intending passengers in a safe condition, and its franchise required that it do so. The instructions find full support in the Wilkinson Case, supra.

[4] The remaining instruction objected to refers to the elements of damage. The court instructed the jury that in determining the amount of damage it might take into consideration plaintiff's age, sex, condition of life, health and physical condition before as compared with her condition after the accident. It is claimed that by the inclusion of the term "condition of life" the jury was in effect told that they might consider plaintiff's financial condition, for which reason the instruction was improper and prejudicial. This identical instruction was considered in the recent case of Roher v. Leonard & Holt (Cal. App.) 276 P. 357, and it was held that it was not necessarily susceptible to the construction here claimed and the giving of the same did not constitute reversible error.
